The disposal of waste needs attention now, because waste is with us. It has been with us for many years. Indeed, when the Labour party was in power it did not face the problem as it should have done. I did not hear the hon. Member for Bootle tell us that up to 1979—during a Labour Government—low and intermediate-waste was in fact put in drums and disposed of in the north-east Atlantic.

The debate is mainly a political one, and it is used by those who oppose nuclear power and energy in principle. The Government have clearly and unambiguously accepted their duty to ensure that nuclear waste is properly dealt with. I shall quote from the Government's response to the Environment Select Committee's report. It says:

"It is Government policy that wastes should be disposed of under strict supervision to high standards of safety and that the periods of storage should be the minimum compatible with safe disposal."

Our nuclear industry directly supports at least 100,000 jobs. Any threat to those jobs is to be deplored. The Labour party's policy of phasing out nuclear power and replacing it with more coal-fired production will be vastly more expensive if the new generating capacity estimated by the CEGB by the mid-1990s is to be met. Coal-fired energy production is not without its own environmental effects, as many hon. Members have pointed out. For example, it produces carbon dioxide, which adds to the greenhouse effect, and sulphur dioxide, which, with nitrous oxide, produces acid rain. What we are not told is that even coal-fired power stations emit radiation. For example, when a 1,000 MW coal-fired power station creates 1 million tonnes of ash a year, the ash contains about 5 tonnes of uranium, according to the Nuclear Electricity Information Group.

The waste is with us now and needs to be dealt with today. The decision should not be postponed for future generations. Most groups which have involved themselves with this problem agree that indefinite storage above ground presents unacceptable risks. Before Opposition Members leap to their feet, I remind them that the TUC nuclear energy review body report published in April this year firmly states that storage at nuclear sites should be seen only as a short-term option until an agreed strategy is found.

Mr. Allan Roberts: That is right.

Mr. Moss: But the hon. Gentleman said that that was an option that his party would consider. We have evidence over a long period that that could lead to greater risks to workers in nuclear installations.

Mr. Allan Roberts: I wish that the hon. Gentleman had listened to me. I made it clear that storage on site at nuclear power stations where the waste is reproduced was not a solution because that would proliferate storage sites throughout the country and would be unacceptable to the public. When I talk about retrievable and monitorable under-surface storage, I am talking about one facility. We could afford only one facility because of the cost of building it safely and acceptably.

Mr. Moss: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that clarification.

I wish to put the problem in perspective. Hon. Members have described the size of the waste. By the year 2030 we shall be looking at 1·5 million cu m of low-level and intermediate-level waste, which is equivalent to 2 million tonnes of packaged material over 40 years. I ask the House to compare that with the 30 million tonnes of domestic waste each year and the 60 million tonnes of coal-mining waste. I read somewhere that the total waste would fill Westminster Hall 20 times. It would probably equate to the cubic capacity of the Palace of Westminster, but I am not proposing it as a site.

We must get the radiation problem into perspective. The overall effective dose equivalent from radiation of natural and artificial origin is about 2,150 microSieverts a year. Ninety per cent. of that is natural radiation through cosmic and gamma rays, and radon and thoron gas. Only 10 per cent. is artificial, of which less that 1 per cent. comes from the nuclear industry. The annual risks of death from accidents in various industries compared with cancers induced among radiation workers are, one in 800 in the fishing industry, one in 6,000 for coal mining and one in 57,000 in the radiation and nuclear industries. Let us take the matter nearer to the mundane. The annual risk of death in the United Kingdom from a common cause, such as smoking 10 cigarettes a day, is one in 200, compared with that exposed to radiation of a worker in a nuclear power station, which is one in 35,000.

What policy should we adopt for the disposal or storage of low-level and intermediate-level nuclear waste? Dumping at sea is not an option at present and the Secretary of State has issued a policy statement on that recently. There is a tendency in the evidence so far to favour disposal rather than storage, but we need to do a great deal more research on that matter. A single deep disposal or storage site appears to be preferable to a proliferation of small storage sites across the country, either at or near existing nuclear locations.

The safety factor is the most important of all and should override the ability to retrieve or recover, but, if a guarantee of safety cannot be given without retrieval, that option should also be considered. The site should not be within an area of dense population and should have an adequate transport infrastructure. The support of local people and councils is essential if the policy is to be adopted smoothly and without too many problems.

We must also set radiological protection criteria. The standards being adopted by the Department of the Environment and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food are extremely tight. They set a target of an annual risk of no more than one in 100,000, but if a single repository is chosen, that target goes up to one in a million.

The Nirex report shows that 30 per cent. of the United Kingdom land area could possibly provide acceptable geological formations. As we have heard today, that includes many sites in East Anglia, the midlands, the north-east, Scotland and Wales. As my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) said, people from my constituency, which borders the Wash, will visit the House next Wednesday to present their petition.

East Anglia does not meet many of the criteria that I mentioned earlier. It is an area of increasingly dense population and, as my hon. Friend said, of outstanding natural beauty. In the case of Sellafield and Dounreay, the two sites on which Nirex is concentrating, there is some local acceptance. Both local councils—Copeland district council and Dounreay district council—have written to Nirex confirming a positive response to further investigation in their areas. There are already nuclear sites at both locations and the geology appears suitable. They have relatively sparse populations and meet the transport criteria.

Although the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) said that she might lie in front of the bulldozer when it arrives in Dounreay, I ask her not to take such severe measures. However, there will be job losses if the fast-breeder reactor at Dounreay closes down, and opportunities for new jobs in a new form of the nuclear industry would be welcome to people in many areas.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Does the Minister have the leave of the House to speak again?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mrs. Bottomley: I should like to respond briefly to some of what has been said in this important debate.

The day has been distinguished by fulsome tributes to the Chairman of the Environment Select Committee, and I should like to repeat my appreciation of the way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) introduced the subject on the basis of the Committee's report. We have finished by hearing my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) presenting a balanced review of the subject without emotion. He set out clearly the main points.

[Mrs. Bottomley]

I fear that I must tell the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) that I am not sure that I can imitate his amicable style, but perhaps I may say quietly and courteously that we believe that indefinite storage below ground is safer than risking keeping radioactive waste on the surface. We believe that we should have barriers to the atmosphere to protect all. As the Environment Select Committee and the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities have concluded, safe disposal of radioactive waste can be developed in the United Kingdom. That is why the Government have asked Nirex to make proposals on low-level and intermediate-level waste. In its conclusions, the Environment Select Committee supported the Government's view that early disposal is the right answer. We expect Nirex to make progress as quickly as possible.

For heat-generating waste, the Government's policy is still for disposal deep underground. Research has demonstrated the potential advantages of storing such wastes for at least 50 years to enable a reduction in heat and radioactivity to take place before disposal. Current research is aimed at confirming the applicability to the United Kingdom of findings made in other countries.

Several hon. Members have mentioned Drigg. The Environment Select Committee rightly drew attention to the deficiencies of the waste management arrangements it found there in 1985-86. The Government's response recorded improvements that were already in place two years ago, and since then a new authorisation for the site issued by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Pollution, has helped to secure further progress. The current investment programme by BNFL, amounting to some £20 million, includes capping trenches, improving drainage systems, compaction of Sellafield waste where possible, containerisation of waste and provision of concrete-lined walls. The inspectorate will keep the authorisation under regular review.

The hon. Members for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), for Bootle, for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams), for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley) and others have mentioned reprocessing, which recovers valuable uranium and plutonium which can be used again in our AGR and PWR installations, even if we have no fast reactors. That reduces the amount of radioactivity in the waste which requires disposal. The long-term risks associated with disposal of spent fuel could be greater than those associated with disposal of vitrified waste. Since 1976, all United Kingdom contracts for reprocessing overseas spent fuel have contained options for the return of waste. The Government have made it clear that BNFL will be expected to exercise those options.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) drew attention forcefully to the views of her constituents about the proposal for the storage of spent fuel from AGRs prior to reprocessing. Any decision to construct an AGR dry fuel store is a matter for the commercial judgment of the CEGB and the South of Scotland Electricity Board, but they would need to seek formal planning and investment approval before construction can begin. As with any planning application, opportunity for formal objections will be given. Construction will be subject to the formal approval of the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate, which licenses operations, and any discharges will require authorisation from Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Pollution.

I hope that that reassures my hon. Friend. I know that she will come back to me later.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman rose——

Mrs. Bottomley: My hon. Friend made her point powerfully and I heard it most strongly.

Several hon. Members mentioned the Irish sea. Intensive monitoring around British nuclear sites has shown that levels of radioactivity pose no risk to human health. The latest monitoring results published by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food show that marine radioactivity levels, as a result of liquid discharges from Sellafield, are continuing to fall and that radiation exposure to consumers of fish and shellfish throughout the country remains within internationally recommended levels.

The hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) may like to know that the independent study into the medical effects on the east coast of Northern Ireland have not found any correlation between Sellafield discharges and leukaemia or any other conditions.

Several hon. Members have mentioned the medical aspects. It is an extremely important subject, but it is necessary to see it in the light of the scientific evidence. No analysis so far has shown a clear link between cancer clusters and radiation, but cancer clusters occur in other parts of the country where there are no nuclear installations of any kind. That is a subject for the Committee on Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment, and is on which we follow closely.

The hon. Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) referred to anxiety in his constituency about reports of increased cancer incidence near the Capper Pass smelter. Discharges were sanctioned because levels were calculated to present no health risk. Inspectors have made a full assessment of the discharges from the smelter, and I understand that neither chemical discharges nor the small quantities of natural radioactivity which are emitted——

It being half-past Two o' clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motor Rallies

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): Although I am grateful for the opportunity to raise this matter, it is not necessarily the stuff of which tomorrow's headlines are made. I have sought this debate in my capacity as chairman of the rights of way review committee, which is a non-statutory committee composed of all the bodies concerned with public rights of way, such as farmers, landowners, all the different user groups—whether they wish for access to the countryside on foot, on horseback, on cycles or in four-wheeled vehicles—local authorities and representatives of three Government Departments.

The committee existed in its present form since 1981 when, under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer), the Under-Secretary of State for Energy, it played a key role in securing agreed changes to part III of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 during its passage through the House.

My purpose in raising the matter is not to ban motor rallies from rights of way, as could possibly be inferred from the title which has been applied to the debate: I simply want to draw attention to an anomaly, contradiction, confusion or lack of clarity in the law. The matter first came to the attention of the rights of way review committee in 1985. It arose out of two incidents. One occurred on a bridleway in Nottinghamshire when members of the Cyclists Touring Club narrowly escaped injury when encountering, entirely without warning, an unauthorised car rally. The other has been a continuing saga in mid-Wales where conflicts have led to a local rambler, who sought to have the law enforced, being obliged to leave his home and move to a secret address following threats and intimidation.

The problem is whether a rally, which is race or trial of speed, can or cannot be authorised on those highways which are public footpaths or bridleways. I do not want to exaggerate the problem, nor do I wish to pillory those who organise or take part in motor rallies. I am happy to acknowledge that the standard of organisation of United Kingdom events is high, with proper regard for safety and the public. Of course, many rallies take place with no practical problem arising.

Nevertheless, the present state of the law has led to trouble, and it may lead to trouble again. I believe that it ought to be put right in a calm atmosphere, unprompted by any fresh incident. The present uncertainty is no good for anyone except hard-pressed Ministers who probably think that other matters affecting safety have higher priority, and I appreciate that.

The relevant legislation where the anomaly occurs is the Road Traffic Act 1972, although provisions in it come from previous legislation, going back as far as the Road Traffic Act 1920. A consolidation measure, presently before the House, will become the Road Traffic Act 1988. The anomaly is transferred almost wholly and completely from one statute to the proposed statute. Therefore, I propose to use the nomenclature of the 1972 Act, as I believe that that is still the extant measure.

There is a conflict between the wording of different sections of that Act. So far, the Department has been unwilling to give guidance on interpretation or to introduce amending legislation. Section 14 of the 1972 Act makes it an offence to promote or take part in a race or trial of speed between motor vehicles on a public highway. Section 15 makes it an offence to promote or take part in a competition other than a trial or race of speed on a public highway, unless the competition or trial is authorised.

The Secretary of State is given power to make regulations governing the authorisation of trials, and I shall come to that. Section 35 makes it an offence to promote or take part in a trial of any description between motor vehicles on a footpath or bridleway, unless the holding of the trial has been authorised by the local authority. Section 36 makes it an offence to drive a motor vehicle on a footpath or bridleway without lawful authority.

The problem of interpretation that has arisen is that section 14 places an absolute ban on races or trials of speed on a "public highway" without making it clear whether the term "public highway" includes footpaths and bridleways. Neither the word "highway" nor the words "public highway" are defined in the Act. Section 35 refers to trials "of any description" without making it clear whether it was intended to exclude races or trials of speed as being prohibited under section 14.

The regulations to which I have referred are made under section 15 and are called the Motor Vehicles (Competitions and Trials) Regulations 1969. In schedule 2 the regulations refer to "lengths of any public highway which are footpaths or bridleways"

That would seem to suggest that in 1969 the House believed that footpaths and bridleways came within the definition of "public highway".

Section 15 of the Act was first introduced as section 36 of the Road Traffic Act 1962, and the then Minister responsible, Ernest Marples—a name which is no doubt remembered with great affection—appointed a committee under Lord Chesham to advise him on the exercise of his powers under the section. The committee's report led to the framework which was subsequently set out in the 1969 regulations. Paragraph 70 of the report refers to advice given to the committee—one assumes it was given by the then Ministry of Transport—that "section 36 should be regarded as applying to footpaths and bridleways, because they are public highways."

More recently, an effort to obtain clarification was made in another place when the noble Lord Melchett tabled a question about whether the words "public highway" in section 14 of the 1972 Act included public footpaths and bridleways. In what amounts to an almost Gilbertian passage, my noble Friend Lord Brabazon of Tara admitted in his reply that there was uncertainty about the precise meaning of the term and went on to suggest that bridleways and footpaths were highways but not necessarily public highways. If the Department believes that there is a real distinction, in apparent contradiction of the previous advice given to Lord Chesham, it should say why.

This is not just an academic point of law, although it may seem that way because of the many references that I have had to make to statutes and parts of statutes. Users of the countryside need to know where they stand. At present, the situation is productive of potential danger, even if in most instances common sense and good management prevail. I have not come to the House to offer the Minister the precise formula that he should adopt and I am certainly not suggesting the exclusion of any interest from access to the countryside.

It should be obvious from what I have said that a degree of regulation is necessary to ensure that different users have access to the countryside without detriment to others. That cannot be absolutely guaranteed while there is uncertainty in the law. It should be equally obvious that, because an anomaly has been exposed, it should be corrected.

I should like my hon. Friend the Minister to give an assurance that the matter will be tackled at the first convenient opportunity. If he feels that this is a classic matter that should be thrashed out unofficially within the rights of way review committee, I hope that he will say that, if the committee can reach agreement on how the law should unambiguously be written, he will be prepared to adopt such a formula when there is next an opportunity to legislate. This is not an earth-shattering problem, but it would do good if, in a spirit of calm and rationality, it could be resolved once and for all.

2.40 pm

The Minister for Roads and Traffic (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) for the work that he does on the rights of way review committee and for the way in which he put the argument. When I have finished, he may regard me as Sullivan to my noble Friend's Gilbert, although I shall try to be helpful as well.

I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would pursue his offer of getting the various interests together in his committee or through its good offices to consider what the law might be. I cannot guarantee to adopt any agreed conclusion, but I shall give it serious consideration.

I go around the country praising much of the work of groups within the Department of Transport. I have not yet had an opportunity to praise the work of the lawyers, and I should like to do that now. They are asked to give definitive views or declarations of what the law means. My hon. Friend spelt out plainly that nobody knows what the law means. He will agree that it would be fruitless—unless a case goes to court, when it would necessarily have to make a decision—to try to decide what the law is intended to mean. We must take the various sections of the law and non-definitions and mix them with what has been decided by definition or case law. It is generally agreed that there are no obvious conclusions to which a court could come; it would be a matter of arguing it out, if the case went that far.

The good news is that there are relatively few conflicts. Those concerned about rights of way may want to spell out the position in advance so that conflicts do not arise, but the best that I can do is to echo my hon. Friend's words about common sense and good management at rallies.

A number of issues affect rights of way, footpaths, bridleways, highways and public highways. I am the last person to try to distinguish all the differences between them, but the Department and I, as the Minister for Roads and Traffic, are concerned not only about main trunk roads but about the effects of roads on people's rights of way, footpaths, bridleways and highways. I remember saying at the opening of the Bridport bypass that it was our policy, wherever possible, to ensure that footpaths are not unnecessarily diverted. Pedestrians, cyclists and horse riders prefer the option of going in straight lines or on historic paths without unnecessary disturbance. It is not always possible to arrange that, but it is right to say that we in the Department, although we must cater for the needs of heavy goods vehicles, buses, cars and motorbikes, do all we can to maintain the rights of way that traditionally people have built up.

My hon. Friend mentioned a member of the Ramblers Association. Although 50 years ago it might not have been the most popular of bodies with landowners or the Government, one can pay tribute to the work that it has done to preserve rights of way and footpaths throughout the country. I have had the experience of trying to follow a path that has been available to me for 20 years and to others for generations, only to discover that it has been ploughed up with no provision for people to take the traditional route. In my case, it was distressing because it was the route to church.

My hon. Friend referred to motor rallies. I acknowledge that he has been concerned about them for some time. A small number of motor rallies cause public disquiet, especially when they make use of quiet country paths. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for acknowledging that there is no evidence of a major safety problem. None of the 5,200 road deaths last year happened because of motor rallies on public rights of way. That is not to say that one will not happen this weekend, but the overall pattern shows that there is not a major safety problem at the moment.

The Government's attitude to motor rallies must remain balanced. There are 12,000 rally drivers. Rallies give pleasure to many people. They are a traditional and helpful offshoot for our motor industry. Sometimes rallies provide test conditions, allowing the development of approved vehicle and component design. They should not be organised in ways which cause distress to others or which compromise the safety of either participants or people who are in no way involved. Underlying my hon. Friend's interest, besides the wish to protect rights of way, is the view that those who are not involved should not be put at risk. There is no perfect way of ensuring total safety on the roads, as members of the Cyclists Touring Club acknowledge, but it is important to ensure that unnecessary risks are not added to by the activities of others.

For many years, the Department has appointed the Royal Automobile Club as its agent for acting as the governing body for motor sport under the terms of the Motor Vehicle (Competitions and Trials) Regulations. I pay tribute to the RAC. This is a good example of agency agreement or privatisation, call it what one will. The system has been acknowledged to work well because of the common sense, goodwill and professionalism of those involved.

The Government are satisfied that rallies are organised in a way that minimises disturbance to the public and does not exceed a tolerable level of nuisance. These events are rationed to a maximum level of one night event every three weeks, or a day event every three weeks, with a minimum of three weeks between any two events. In practice, in few areas is this maximum level of activity approached.

Rallies are authorised only after consultation with the local police and, where appropriate, with representatives of local authorities and national parks. The RAC Motor Sports Association has regional route liaison officers to assist in alleviating any local difficulties. All involved are well aware that events can take place only with the kind co-operation of many residents along the route. Today I met with the RAC-MSA for a photograph with a 1904 French car with which I hope to travel down to Brighton. I was glad to be able to put my chauffeur, Mr. Stan Wyatt, behind the wheel. Although he will not drive to Brighton with me, he has driven me safely around the country over the past four and a half years.

Some minor events are automatically authorised, such as those involving fewer than 12 vehicles. Organisers of those events are made aware of the legislation for running events on public highways. Events are allowed only within the confines of the road traffic law, so, for instance, cars and motor cycles cannot break the speed limits. Rally events are divided into stages. Competitions are judged on merits of regularity. Any improvements to a given time for the stage receive no extra points. There is no incentive to speed.

There is no place for improperly organised rallies. I am pleased to understand that, earlier this year, a Buckinghamshire motor club was found to have contravened the regulations and was banned from organising rallies for three years. My hon. Friend said that one example which prompted this debate was an unauthorised rally.

Rules are important. We recognise that they need to be up to date. Earlier this year we suggested to the RAC that it should review its code of practice to see whether it needs amendment or tightening. The RAC is now discussing its initial conclusions with us.

There is a long-standing question, which prompted the debate, about the legality of authorising motor rallies on footpaths and bridleways. I have before me some words which I would prefer to spin into a sentence of about 180 words so that it cannot be interpreted. I shall leave it because that would take me into a partial interpretation of the law which my hon. Friend has clearly spelt out as being uninterpretable. In other words, I shall stop digging.

There is one final aspect which has not been touched on, but which I trust is important because it relates to safety. Dr. Peter North's major review of road traffic law, published in the spring, recommended that we should consider extending at least some of the main driving offences to driving off the public highway. That is an important point because it would provide additional protection against the rare cases of misconduct that put people at risk. We are currently considering which offences should be more widely applicable and we shall cover this point in the full response to the North review which the Government have promised for early next year.

My hon. Friend has made this a subject for public debate—not just today but on previous occasions; for example, he has referred to questions in the other place. His committee is the right body to decide whether it is possible to agree a conclusion with the various interests concerned. The Government would give interested opinions on the results. If we conclude that this is not the kind of problem in which it would be appropriate to invest much public money during our campaign to cut casualties by one third by the year 2000—to save 1,700 lives and prevent 100,000 injuries a year—we shall say so openly. We shall not expect to be praised for it. On the other hand, if it turns out to be possible not just to provide interpretation of existing law—the Road Traffic Acts of 1930 and 1972 and others—but to incorporate an agreed conclusion in a future Bill, the Government will be prepared to do that. We want to do what is sensible and proportionate, and we shall be interested in any result that my hon. Friend can present to us.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nine minutes to Three o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

Teaching Unions

2. Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met representatives of the teaching unions in Wales; and what matters were discussed.

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Mr. Wyn Roberts): I met representatives of the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers on 20 October 1988 and representatives of the Secondary Headteachers Association and the Welsh Secondary Schools Association on 21 October 1988. On both occasions a range of matters relating to the provisions of the Education Reform Act 1988 were discussed.

Dr. Thomas: During those meetings, did the Minister dicuss the work of the Curriculum Council for Wales? Did he tell the unions that he intends that the council should cover the entire range of curricula activities in Wales, that the council is on a par with the Curriculum Council for England, and that its activities will not be limited to certain aspects of Welsh culture or Welsh curriculum content?

Mr. Roberts: The work of the council arose at the meetings. I think the hon. Gentleman realises that its final remit was issued on 12 October. The council's role is to offer advice on all aspects of the school curriculum, including the national curriculum in Wales, to carry out research and curriculum development work and to disseminate information in Wales on all matters to do with the school curriculum. Initially, the council is concentrating on our proposals for mathematics and science. It is preparing early advice on the need for teacher training.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I support the general principle of the Welsh language being a foundation subject in the school curriculum, but will my hon. Friend bear in mind the concern that is being expressed in Pembrokeshire by parents and teachers in schools where there is no tradition of teaching Welsh and no demand for it? If these schools should make a request to be exempt from the teaching of Welsh as part of the core curriculum, will my hon. Friend listen with care and concern and ensure that their considerations are given the highest priority?

Mr. Roberts: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his general support for Welsh being a foundation subject. He will be aware that it is precisely because of the possibility of a situation such as that to which he referred that we have made provision for exemption under the Education Reform Act 1988. We hope that the power of exemption that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has will not been used extensively in Wales.

Mr. Barry Jones: May I tell the Minister of the dismay of teachers unions in Clwyd, and of parents and staff, concerning Ysgol Belmont, a special school where work experience for slow learners is in danger of foundering in the next year because of a lack of only £3,000? Will the Minister use his good offices with the Training Commission and the local education authority so that a valuable scheme that prepares pupils of older age for work after leaving school can survive? Will he be able to find the money to help the scheme?

Mr. Roberts: If the hon. Gentleman will write to me about the matter, as I am sure he will, I shall be happy to examine the details.

Mr. Alan Williams: When the Minister met the teachers, did he discuss the future impact on sixth forms of the preposterous and reactionary document which has been produced by the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science with responsibility for higher education—it was circulated on 25 July—which envisages the end of free higher education and the introduction of higher education vouchers based on examination results instead of ability to pay and need? The document presages the encouragement of universities to charge fees over and above the fees that are refunded by the local authorities and suggests that the shortage of teachers will be met by allowing classes to grow larger, not by training more teachers. It even suggests that there needs to be a cut in the number of youngsters who are training to be doctors, vets and dentists. What status does the document have? I notice that the letter from the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, which led to the production of the document, was addressed precisely to the Minister.

Mr. Roberts: The right hon. Gentleman's interpretation of that document is completely at variance with its actual content. He will not be very surprised to learn that none of the unions that I met raised the subject of that document.

Sir Raymond Gower: Has my hon. Friend noticed the remarkable progress of Welsh-medium schools in Anglicised areas such as parts of my constituency and around Cardiff and Newport? To what extent is that an extra consideration for assisting those schools?

Mr. Roberts: I welcome, with my hon. Friend, the development of Welsh-medium schools. He will be aware that we tried to increase the number of teachers capable of teaching through the medium of Welsh. We are actively engaged in that. That is one positive form of help that those schools appreciate which we are pursuing.

Water Privatisation

3. Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he next intends meeting representatives of trade unions in the water industry to discuss the privatisation of the Welsh water authority.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Walker): I have received no request to do so.

Mr. Davies: Will the Secretary of State give an assurance that if he receives such a request he will accede to it? If he accepts such a request, will he discuss with the trade unions the recent Public Accounts Committee report, which was critical of the privatisation of the Royal Ordnance factories? Will he give the unions guarantees with regard to water privatisation that we will not witness another spectacle of public assets being sold off at knock-down prices to the private sector? In particular, what guarantees is he prepared to give that Welsh water authority's 100,000 acre holding in Wales, much of which consists of incomparable landscape of great recreational value, will not end up as the private playground of foreign water companies?

Mr. Walker: I am certain that there will be no question of foreign water companies having the kind of interest suggested by the hon. Gentleman. The negotiations on the manner in which it will be sold off and the price that will be paid will be made public. If there are any criticisms of the way in which that is carried out, the hon. Gentleman will be free to express his views. I am certain that the employees in the Welsh water authority will benefit from privatisation.

Mr. Livsey: Does the Secretary of State agree that the Government's proposed privatisation of water is utter folly? Is he not concerned that staff are already being transferred to the proposed National Rivers Authority before a Bill has come before the House? Is that not a cause of great concern? What mechanisms will the right hon. Gentleman provide to prevent foreign water companies taking over Welsh water authorities?

Mr. Walker: The mechanisms will emerge as a result of the detailed proposals that will eventually appear about privatisation. With regard to the hon. Gentleman's point about the National Rivers Authority, I am sure he will rejoice in the fact that a body responsible for the river system will continue with the necessary authority and with professional and skilled staff.

Mr. Rogers: How many times has the Secretary of State for Wales been consulted by the Secretary of State for the Environment about water privatisation, or must he just carry out the diktat of the Secretary of State for the Environment?

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman will be relieved and delighted to learn that I was present at all the talks and negotiations and that I played a very active part in them.

Mr. Raffan: Does my right hon. Friend agree with Mr. Gordon Jones, the chairman of the Water Authorities Association, that privatisation should give the water authorities greater freedom to manage the business better? Does he also agree that in Wales the freedom from a whole battery of Government-imposed controls and the freedom to borrow, or not borrow, as the business requires will enable the Welsh water authority to accelerate its capital programme?

Mr. Walker: One of the factors that caused great damage to our river systems was the manner in which a whole range of bodies, many of which were publicly owned, were allowed to pollute the rivers with low-investment programmes. I am glad to say that with heavy investment over recent years the situation has improved. I believe that the freedom to borrow and carry out capital investment programmes free of Government interference will be a great advantage.

Mr. Wigley: Against the background of reports of possible interest from overseas companies in stakes in the water industry, can the Secretary of State give an assurance that he has had discussions with the chairman of the Welsh water authority to try to find a formula to ensure that the control of the authority remains in Wales, even after privatisation?

Mr. Walker: I have had many talks with the chairman of the Welsh water authority, and we are agreed upon the type of formula that will be necessary.

Advance Factory Programme

4. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the progress of advance factory programmes in Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: The advance factory programmes of the Welsh Development Agency and Mid-Wales Development are responding well to the sharp upturn in demand for new industrial property. Their ability to do so is a direct consequence of the one third increase in the agencies' property resources that I was able to announce at the beginning of the year.

Mr. Butler: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the success of the Ford factory investment. Does he concur with the Leader of the Opposition when he says that too much of the outside world still believes the fiction of a gloomy and depressed south Wales?

Mr. Walker: Yes, I was very relieved that the Leader of the Opposition made such a splendid pronouncement on how well things are going in Wales. Certainly the amount of factory space that is being built and let tells a remarkable story. I am delighted that at least the Leader of the Opposition is pleased about it.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Does the Secretary of State agree that the investment recently announced by Ford was mainly due to the success of the Ford, Bridgend factory business plan over the past two years, and that that was the major factor?

Mr. Walker: Yes, of course I do. There is no doubt that without the splendid co-operation of the work force and the high productivity there, there would have been no question at all of Ford going to Wales. Of course that is right. I am also delighted that Government action and Government regional aid were able to make a contribution.

Organ Transplants

5. Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what responses he has received to the draft circular on the provision of donor organs for transplantation; and if he will state what further action he is contemplating to continue the increase in the numbers of transplant operations.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Ian Grist): The Welsh Office has consulted on the Hoffenberg report and we are keeping in touch with the Department of Health's consideration of its draft circular.

Funds have been made available by the Welsh Office to Lifeline Wales to facilitate the increased identification of potential organ donors.

Mr. Jones: In that case, can my hon. Friend state when the final draft of the circular will be in circulation, and can he confirm that the outcome will be reviewed two years later, as promised by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health, so that we may then move to a system of required request as surely the only way to make even more substantial progress in this important matter?

Mr. Grist: My hon. Friend will know that the medical Royal Colleges working party considered that effective procedures as recommended in its report were preferable to the approach envisaged in his Transplant Notification Bill. We undertake to consider legislation if the recommended procedures are not successful.

Higher Education

6. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest figures for the percentage of 16 to 19-year-olds involved in full-time education (a) in Dyfed and (b) in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Thirty-three per cent. of 16 to 19-year-olds in Dyfed were in full-time education in 1987-88. The figure for Wales was 30 per cent.

Mr. Williams: Has the Minister compared those figures with figures for France, Germany and Japan, which show that 40 per cent. of their 18-year-olds move on to higher education, and that an overwhelming majority of that age group are involved in full-time education? Is it not the truth that young people in Wales and in Britain are getting a raw deal from the Government in terms of poor education opportunities and apprenticeships being cut to one third? They are left only with state training schemes and with hardly any jobs to go to.

Mr. Roberts: First, I would have thought that the hon. Member would appreciate how well Dyfed is doing in relation to the rest of Wales and to the rest of Great Britain. As to the situation in foreign countries, of course we would like a greater proportion of our young people to move on to further education rather than leave school, and we are taking active steps to encourage that.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: Does the Minister accept that one of the problems of providing complete education provision for 16 to 19-year-olds is the lack of proper careers advice in our schools? Does he accept that careers teachers are under tremendous pressure because of the lack of adequate resources? Will the Minister consider ways in which the Welsh Office can ensure that further provision is made available to local authorities, so that proper careers advice is given to children in the age range in question?

Mr. Roberts: I have looked at and paid close attention to the careers service in Wales, and I have given it every possible encouragement during the period that I have had responsibility for education. I would not say that the careers service and careers teaching in Wales is by any means perfect, but we are doing our utmost to improve it.

Homelessness

7. Mr. Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the present level of homelessness in each district in Wales; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: The most recent figures appear to show a significant reduction in the number of cases accepted by local authorities as homeless.

Mr. Anderson: Is the Minister aware of the concern by Welsh housing authorities at the figures released by his press office to the Western Mail a few weeks ago, which appear to conflict with their experience? Is he also aware of the puzzlement of those in the voluntary housing sector in Wales at the fact that the Welsh Office figures appear to show that in Wales figures are being reduced, whereas they are increasing in England? Does the Minister, on reflection, still accept the validity of the figures given by his press office?

Mr. Grist: Oddly enough, the figures are those provided by the local authorities themselves. But, because some doubt has been expressed, I have asked local authorities to validate them.

Mr. Murphy: Will the new housing body, Housing for Wales, in any way alleviate the plight of the homeless in the Principality? Is the Minister aware of the grave concern in housing circles in Wales about the way in which the head of that body has been appointed? Is he also aware that Welsh local authorities are the proper providers of housing, not bodies that are accountable only to the Secretary of State?

Mr. Grist: That was a most extraordinary statement by the hon. Gentleman. I would have said that Mr. Allen was a notable man in Welsh life and that he had been widely accepted by local authorities, and by people in housing associations and in the housing business in Wales.

I am astonished. I would expect the hon. Gentleman to understand that the establishment of Housing for Wales has been widely welcomed for the very reason that people see that the body will have a close understanding of the needs of the people of Wales. It was extraordinary that when I announced the establishment of the body in a housing debate it was attacked by Opposition Members and welcomed throughout the Principality.

Privatisation

8. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has had on plans for the privatisation of water and electricity in Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have received very few representations on either.

Mr. Flynn: Does the Secretary of State recall from the answers that he has given to me in the past that 75 per cent. of bills paid by Welsh water rate payers are the result of direct Government policies? Does he not feel that Welsh people will not take to the prospect of being rooked by having their undertaking handed over at a bargain price to profiteers—and possibly French profiteers at that? Will he tell us how water is to be made competitive? Will we have a selection of taps so that we can pick the best buy—the loss leader of the day? Will we have three taps, one with hot water, one with cold water and one with Perrier water? Will we have compulsory metering?

Will the Secretary of State and the other Ministers perhaps interrupt for a moment their frenetic campaigns of self-promotion and self-publicity to speak out for the majority of the people of Wales, who see the proposed privatisation of water and electricity as wasteful, foolish and futile?

Mr. Walker: As I said in my original answer, I have received very few representations on either of those privatisations. Of the few that I have received, none have been so absurd as the one just made by the hon. Gentleman.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Presumably the Opposition are trying to show that they are better Socialists than Plaid Cymru.

Is my right hon. Friend aware that the misgivings felt by many of us over the privatisation of water were largely allayed by the creation of the National Rivers Authority? Is he also aware that there remain some misgivings about whether what is proposed for the Central Electricity Generating Board in the privatisation of electricity will take care of the public interest in the same way?

Mr. Walker: I understand the anxiety that is felt along the lines suggested by my hon. Friend, but I hope that such matters will be dealt with when the final details are published.

Mrs. Clwyd: Will the Secretary of State give us an assurance that when water is privatised supplies will not be cut off in any circumstances? I am sure he will agree that water is an essential commodity for life and that its non-supply would cause considerable hardship to the young, the elderly and the sick.

Mr. Walker: I am sure that water supplies will not be cut off in different circumstances from those in which they are cut off under the existing system.

Sir Raymond Gower: Is my right hon. Friend able to say whether the horrible circumstances mentioned have arisen in those parts of the British Isles where for many years water undertakings have been run by private companies?

Mr. Walker: About 10 per cent. of our water comes from private companies, and as far as I know there have been no complaints.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: Is the Secretary of State able to confirm any of the details that were given in recent press coverage about the privatisation of the electricity industry, in particular its impact on Wales, where the two area distribution boards have the characteristic of about 30 per cent. of their total sales going to two customers—Allied Steel and Wire and the British Steel Corporation in the case of the South Wales Electricity Board, and United Engineering Steels at Brymbo and Anglesey Aluminium in the case of the Merseyside and North Wales electricity board? Will he also confirm that until those area boards have a guarantee that those customers will not shop around, contrary to the Government's White Paper, they are virtually unsaleable in the view of the Government's investment advisers? Finally, will he confirm that in the case of both the water and the electricity industries the only way to solve these problems is to turn them, not into privatised companies, but into consumer co-operatives by giving the shares to all their customers, both industrial and domestic?

Mr. Walker: I am glad to say that their customers, unlike what happens under nationalisation, will be able to take advantage of such an opportunity and apply for shares. That may well happen, as it did with gas and other enterprises that we have privatised. The detailed proposals will eventually be announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Hospital Waiting Lists

11. Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what new proposals he has for reducing the waiting lists for in-patients in Wales.

Mr. Grist: The solution lies in continued action by managers and clinicians in health authorities, supported where appropriate by Welsh Office advice, monitoring and funding. This effort will continue.

Dr. Marek: Does the Minister not realise that the solution lies in his carrying out his promise that by last spring no in-patient would have to wait for more than a month to go into hospital for an urgent operation or for more than a year for a non-urgent operation? When I last asked the Secretary of State for Wales, he said that progress was encouraging. Does the Minister accept that the latest figures show that the waiting list for non-urgent operations has increased? Does he believe that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is numerate? If he is numerate, does the Secretary of State understand the meaning of the word "encouraging"? If he does, surely he should exercise a little more honesty when he speaks to the House. When will the Minister carry out the promise that he made to the people of Wales well over a year ago?

Mr. Grist: I do not deny that I was perhaps rather rash to repeat the target that my predecessor set in 1986. We cannot achieve these targets overnight, but the hon. Gentleman is a little less than generous. The number of people waiting for more than a month for urgent in-patient treatment fell between March 1987 and March 1988 by almost 30 per cent. That is a rather different figure from those that he quoted.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most important factors in reducing hospital waiting lists in Wales is nurses? If the reports in today's edition of the Western Mail are to be believed, the serious problem of nurses pay must be tackled. If the reports are true, the nurses are being treated once again as a political football by the Opposition parties. Is my hon. Friend able to say what is the position on nurses pay in Wales?

Mr. Grist: There has been a huge improvement in the position of nurses compared with what we found when we come to power. Their pay had been cut by one fifth, whereas under our proposals nurses pay will rise by over 40 per cent. My hon. Friend may be interested to know that, following the Western Mail article, final details await clarification, but we expect to sort them out shortly. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales will be in a position to make an announcement later this week. We are confident that the nurses pay settlement in Wales will be no less generous than that in England, and it is likely to be more generous.

Mr. Alan Williams: If, as the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) suggests, nurses are being used as a political football, is it not the case that at the moment it is the Government who are putting the boot in? Is it not a fact that in Wales, unlike in Scotland and in England, the Welsh Office is delaying the announcement of the final settlement of the pay review? Is it not clear from the evidence that has been submitted by the health authorities that Welsh nurses have been disadvantaged for many years because a higher proportion of nurses in Wales are undergraded than is the case in England? Why, therefore, must the Welsh Office try to enforce a settlement on the authorities that will match the settlement in England? Is the Welsh Office so impotent that the Treasury can just walk all over it? [Interruption.] The Secretary of State laughs. We know that he does not take anything very seriously. Will he explain to the nurses of Wales why, as a result of his intervention, they will not have their back pay by Christmas, whereas their counterparts in England and Scotland will?

Mr. Grist: The right hon. Gentleman has overlooked the fact that nurses are being regraded. It is a most remarkable achievement for the largest employer in Europe to be able to regrade a service of such size for the first time. The right hon. Gentleman must have missed what I was saying—that the settlement is likely to be more generous in Wales than elsewhere.

Home Buyers

12. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from district councils in Wales concerning the problems facing first-time home-seekers.

Mr. Grist: A number of local authorities have made representations on this issue. I believe that Housing for Wales will play an important role in tackling the problems of first-time home-seekers.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Minister aware that house prices in many parts of Wales, including Caernarfon, have doubled this year, making it almost impossible for many young people wishing to buy a house for the first time to hope to compete in that market? Is the Minister further aware that a price of £60,000 may be cheap for somebody who has sold a house for £250,000 in the south-east of England, but that it is far out of the reach of average wage earners in areas such as Gwynedd? When will the Welsh Office intervene in a constructive and positive manner to ensure that such people have some hope of being able to own or rent a house in the foreseeable future?

Mr. Grist: The hon. Gentleman must accept that a rise in house prices is common throughout the United Kingdom. He will also know that councils in his area have been allocated funds with which to buy houses for renting or for sale to local people, but have not spent some of that money as yet. They seem to be holding on to it for some reason. Housing for Wales will encourage local authorities, in co-operation with private funding, to go into the business of low-cost housing for those who wish to enter the housing market. That is the area in which we expect activity to take place.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Although the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) has raised a real problem, is there not another side to the medal? Many hundreds of thousands of home owners in Wales are now far better off than they have been for a long time.

Mr. Grist: I agree absolutely with my hon. Friend. He has put his finger on an important matter. Sixty-eight per cent. of people in Wales are home owners, which is a higher proportion than in England. That represents a tremendous capital saving for the people of Wales. Suggestions that property prices should be lower might imply that some people want those who own houses to sell them for a lower price than they would otherwise get.

Mr. Rogers: I assure the Minister that the Opposition understand the great difficulty of his task of providing housing in Wales. We consider it important for him to receive advice from as wide a range of sources as possible. Will he therefore explain why two gentlemen, Mr. John Allen and Colonel Geoffrey Inkin, have between them been vice chairmen of the Land Authority, chairman of the Land Authority, chairman of the Housing for Wales, chairman of Cwmbran development corporation, chairman of Cardiff Bay development corporation, and ex-vice chairman of Cwmbran district council? Why does the Minister not obtain advice from all over Wales, rather than adopt such an incestuous relationship with failed Tory party candidates and Tory placemen?

Mr. Grist: I suppose that the hon. Gentleman would prefer us to talk to Labour-controlled local authorities, which have managed to sit tight over the years with houses that have rotted and which have failed to provide the houses for which the hon. Gentleman now calls. I am sorry that he has attacked such distinguished gentlemen, who are highly acceptable to those with whom they deal, and, I imagine, respected by his hon. Friends on the Front Bench.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: We have in Devon exactly the same problem of people on low incomes needing houses, but no special provision of this kind to enable the housing to be provided. Will my hon. Friend please arrange for the surplus funds which Welsh local authorities do not apparently want to spend to be transferred to district councils in Devon, which could put them to very good use indeed?

Mr. Grist: I think that my hon. Friend can fight his own battles with his own Secretary of State.

Mr. Flynn: Does the Minister agree that the problem of first-time home seekers in Wales is formidable and represents a great mountain of human misery? There are three separate problems: those affected by cheque-book colonisation in the form of holiday homes, which now affects every part of Wales; rocketing prices, which have pushed homes out of the reach of many first-time buyers; and the slashing of council house building, which has cut choice for many of those in the greatest need. There are three crises and three problems. What are the Minister's three solutions?

Mr. Grist: We have a record build of private housing at the moment—more than 8,000 houses, which is the largest number since 1973. Furthermore, we expect housing associations to start 2,300 houses this year through the Housing Corporation. That is the sort of practical contribution that we are making.

Voluntary Organisations

14. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the value of grants from his Department to voluntary organisations in each of the past three years at constant prices.

Mr. Peter Walker: The figures are £7·31 million in 1985-86, £8·88 million in 1986-87 and £9·34 million in 1987-88.

Mr. Knox: I greatly welcome the increases in grants. Does my right hon. Friend agree that this very cost-effective form of public expenditure should be increased whenever appropriate and possible?

Mr. Walker: Yes. I think that it has had very good results in a whole range of areas, and I welcome what has taken place.

Education Establishments

15. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what visits he has made in the past three months to educational establishments in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: On Monday 26 September I visited two schools—Eglwyswen primary school and Ysgol Gymraeg Melin Gruffydd, both in South Glamorgan.

Mr. Griffiths: Would the Minister care to visit some schools in Mid-Glamorgan where, as was admitted in the HMI report, because stock is very old, and because of the problems of the mining valleys, replacement and maintenance costs are very high? Will the Minister consider giving Mid-Glamorgan extra funds, given that his own inspectors say that it has a problem in dealing with the stock? Let me cite one example from the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell). At Nantyffyllon, the Ysgol Gynradd Gymraeg TyDerwen school needed £150,000 to repair its boundary walls. Will the Minister provide extra money for the councils?

Mr. Roberts: We have increased capital allocations for local authorities, but the hon. Gentleman will know that we cannot direct the authorities to spend that capital on schools. It is for the local authorities to decide what their priorities are, but, like the hon. Gentleman, I should certainly like them to spend more of their capital allocations on school buildings.

Health Authorities

16. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to make extra funds available to the health authorities of Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: My right hon. Friend hopes to announce additional funding to meet the estimated costs of the nurses clinical regrading exercise in the next few days. This will result in an expected real terms increase in nurses pay of more than 40 per cent. since 1979.

Mr. Jones: Can the Minister say whether the consultants' report on whether north Walian people should have a satellite radiotherapy cancer treatment centre will appear in the near future? Will he bear in mind that many north Walian people have to undertake long journeys to Manchester and Liverpool for cancer treatment? No doubt the Minister will agree that if such journeys can occasionally be shortened a great deal of good will be done. We need a satellite centre at least in north Wales.

Mr. Grist: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. We are carrying out the investigation as fast as we can. We certainly have no desire to hold it up.

Mr. Raffan: Is the Welsh Office yet in a position to provide brokerage funding to Clwyd health authority so that phase 2 of Glan Clwyd hospital—the scheme to relocate obstetric, gynaecology and special care baby services at the hospital—can be brought forward to the next financial year?

Mr. Grist: No. I cannot give my hon. Friend that undertaking.

Valleys Initiative

18. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many additional houses will be built as a result of his Valleys initiative.

Mr. Peter Walker: During the three years of the Valleys programme I expect 10,000 new homes to be built and 32,000 to be improved.

Mr. Livsey: Will the Secretary of State take account of what has been said this afternoon about local people being able to live in their own communities, particularly in the valleys, where there has been a great increase in the number of people who have come in, a great rise in house prices and a great scarcity of houses to rent? Will the right hon. Gentleman invoke planning powers so that local authorities there can cater specifically for local people?

Mr. Walker: There are several ways in which local authorities can and do assist with housing local people, and I am sure that they will continue to do that. The work of the new Housing Corporation, under its excellent new chairman and board, will do the same. The figures that I have just given—10,000 new homes and 32,000 properties to be improved—represent a fairly substantial programme.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Ordination of Women

30. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners, what total sum he now estimates will be required to compensate clergymen and bishops expected to leave their orders in the event of the ordination of women; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Alison (Second Church Estates Commissioner, Representing Church Commissioners): The estimated cost per 100 men of financial provision under the proposed legislation, as at present drafted, is some £3 million spread over five years. The legislation will shortly be considered by a revision committee of the General Synod. It is too early to make any realistic estimate of how many bishops and clergy might ultimately resign.

Mr. Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the suggested compensation of £30,000 per head is very low for a young man early in his orders? Does he also agree that respect for the law is basic to the Christian faith? Does he therefore agree that back-door women priests and their congregations who break the law on premises run or owned by the Church Commissioners are simply waiting for the law to be changed?

Mr. Alison: The costs of compensation, to which I have referred, are estimates and remain subject to further revision, although there is a limit to what the Church of England and the commissioners could afford in this context. It is unlawful for a woman priest to minister the sacraments in a Church of England building, and I understand that any who do so may be prosecuted under canon law, which has the force of statute law.

Mr. Frank Field: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the aim is to get the reform through in such a way that people do not wish to leave the Church? In that respect, are not the guarantees that were first outlined crucial to reassuring people who are hesitant about the change? Does the right hon. Gentleman therefore deplore the House of Bishops' move in its latest report to undermine some of those guarantees?

Mr. Alison: I take careful note of what the hon. Gentleman has said. I believe that the provisions made for payments of the type under discussion are constructive and reasonable, although the legislation that underpins them is still far from close to enactment, and there has to be a further election to the General Synod before the Measure can be introduced in this House.

Mr. Stanbrook: Has the Church got this round the wrong way? Is it not the duty of those who want a different sort of Church to leave it, not to drive out those who wish it to stay as it is?

Mr. Alison: That is a general observation which, as my hon. Friend has stated it, has some validity. There is, however, a lot to be said for staying inside an institution which one wishes to change and trying to reform it in the direction that one prefers.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) spoke about breaking the law. If ecclesiastical law is changed and women priests are ordained so that they can minister the Communion, by what right should any reactionary elements in the Church expect to receive any compensation? Surely they should obey the law. I do not see why these reactionary old buggers should expect anything.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member will withdraw that remark.

Mr. Banks: These reactionary people should not expect anything.

Mr. Alison: The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to demonstrate whether he is reactionary or progressive when the Measure comes before the House. He will understand that, although the law may be legally enacted in the House, it can be considered oppressive by some people. For them, in those circumstances, to resign and be offered ex-gratia compensation by their fellow Christians in the Church of England is a perfectly wholesome and acceptable alternative.

Mr. Harris: Does my right hon. Friend agree with the point made by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) that the aim in making such a big change, if it comes about, must be to ensure that as few people as possible leave the Church and thereby keep the compensation down? With that aim in mind, will he heartily endorse the views of the Archbishop of York at the weekend, which are certainly supported by many of us who wish to see the ordination of women priests; and does he agree that the events in London at the weekend certainly did not help the situation?

Mr. Alison: I agree with my hon. Friend. He will have noted that the lady or ladies concerned did not seek to minister in a consecrated church. Had they done so, they would have been liable to prosecution. I am sure that the Archbishop of York's views on trying to keep within the law until the law is changed must be the right and proper advice.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Church Commissioners will need all the resources that they can get, including diocesan quotas, not only for this reason, but for many others? If they pursue a policy of irritating parishioners by selling off local parsonages adjacent to churches so that the churches have to be locked to prevent vandalism, people will not support the church financially, diocesan quotas will not be paid and they will not have the resources for this or any other purpose.

Mr. Alison: My hon. Friend has referred to the practice of selling old vicarages and parsonage residences adjacent to churches, which obviously bears upon some local phenomonen which is worrying him. I should be obliged if he would let me have details, which I shall certainly look at. He will understand that the resources of the Church Commissioners, to which he referred, depend to some extent on rationalising their property ownership and selling off old large houses so that modern vicarages can be constructed in their place.

Stipends and Pensions

31. Mr. Chapman: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners, what is the amount and proportion of the commissioners' expenditure allocated to clergy stipends and pensions in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Alison: In 1987 the commissioners spent £38·7 million on stipends and £39 million on pensions. This was 66 per cent. of their investment income.

Mr. Chapman: I welcome the fact that two thirds of the commissioners' income is allocated to clergy stipends and pensions, but does my right hon. Friend agree that it is essential to encourage the commissioners to maximise the interest that they can receive on their assets? Does he also agree that they are doing that very successfully and that they now have a very healthy stake in capitalism?

Mr. Alison: Yes. The commissioners' handling of their investment portfolio is exemplary and way ahead of the field in yield for their various investments. One principal beneficiary of that judicious and sound investment policy is the very reasonable level of clergy pensions which are now paid, with prospects of yet further improvements to come.

Mr. Skinner: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that earlier this year at the Union of Democratic Mineworkers annual conference at Weymouth it was reported that some churchmen, who said that their stipends were too low, had joined the bosses' union—the UDM? At that conference, there were four clergymen and a rabbi. Led by one from the old ASTMS, they said that they were looking for industrial action, but Roy Lynk said, "We are not having any of that here." What other advice has the right hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Alison: In view of the level of clergy stipends and pensions, I could suggest that Mr. Arthur Scargill or even Mr. Clive Jenkins might seek ordination in the Church of England.

WALES

Welsh Language Board

19. Mr. John: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to receive the first report from the new Welsh Language Board.

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Mr. Wyn Roberts): The Welsh Language Board will pass on its findings to my right hon. Friend as they emerge.

Mr. John: Given the discussions on the new Welsh Language Act and the wide consensus on what it should contain, will the Secretary of State place a six-month limit on the time in which the Welsh Language Board will report? Would it not be regarded as offensive if it were to continue indefinitely when the matters have already been discussed?

Mr. Roberts: I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman. He will know that the board is the outcome of a recommendation made by myself as head of a ministerial group which looked into the problem of legislation in connection with the language as well as other matters. As a result of that, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State set up the board. The board, in turn, has set up specialist sub-committees to look into different areas and issues related to the promotion and development of the language. One of the sub-committees, under the chairmanship of Winston Roddick QC, is looking at the legislative aspect.

Older Housing

20. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what fresh proposals he has to tackle the problems of older housing in Wales; and what new resources are available.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Ian Grist): We are continuing to encourage local authorities to adopt a strategic approach to housing renewal. I am pleased to say that the Cynon Valley borough council is increasingly doing so and is making good use of the sharply increased resources we have made available to it.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is the Minister aware that the Cynon Valley has some of the worst housing in Britain and that it will cost about £64 million to bring housing up to modern levels? Is he further aware that at the present level of Government investment in housing it will take until at least the year 2,000 before the people in the Cynon Valley can live in decent housing? Why are Welsh Office Ministers condemning the people of the Cynon Valley to live in continuing deprivation and bad housing?

Mr. Grist: It is extraordinary. In past years I have heard the hon. Lady ask similar questions, only to have it explained that her council was not spending the funds available to it on housing. Now that authority has been given as many resources as it considers it can spend during the current financial year. I do not think that we can do much more.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

European Directives

35. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make it his policy to ensure that the directives recommended for debate by the Select Committee on European Legislation are debated within a reasonable period; and if he will make a statement.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): Yes, Sir. This remains our objective.

Mr. Taylor: Does my right hon. Friend agree that a major constitution worry is that most of the regulations, directives, letters and proposals from the EC are never discussed by Parliament? Is he aware that in the most recent report of the Select Committee there were 100 such documents which had been recommended for debate but for which time had not been found? Is he further aware that in addition we have a major problem in that some of the vital directives, such as that on mergers and the six documents on health and safety, have not been discussed at all? Would my right hon. Friend be willing to look at the issue to see whether there is some way in which we could more successfully handle parliamentary matters from the Common Market so that the measures affecting our constituents are properly discussed and not simply referred to briefly at 11.30 at night?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise my hon. Friend's interest and concern in this matter. I do not think that the figures are quite as he said. As I understand it, 88 documents have not yet been debated. Of those, 38 are not at present under active consideration and nine are awaiting further documents. Of the remaining 41, several have been linked by the Select Committee and it is expected that they will require 20 debates. I am doing my best to arrange those. The position on mergers is that the documents recommended for debate early last year and before have been overtaken by a new document entitled "Control of concentrations between undertakings", No. 5963/88, which was considered by the Committee last week and recommended for debate. The Committee has now withdrawn its recommendation for debate on the earlier documents. To have debated the earlier documents would not have been the most effective use of the House's valuable time. My right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will now be considering the most appropriate time for debate on the new document.

Mr. Aitken: As the cascade of controversial and unpopular EC directives increasingly threatens our sovereignty, with even British institutions such as the pound, the ounce, the mile and the pint in danger of being swept away, surely my right hon. Friend recognises the importance of effective and vigilant parliamentary machinery to stop 1992 from becoming a 1066. Will he consider beefing up the Select Committee on European Legislation to give it proper funding, more Sub-Committees and specialist advisers and, above all, regular debates in the House in prime time?

Mr. Wakeham: It is difficult to arrange debates in prime time as my hon. Friend would like, because there are many other issues that we must debate. I should have thought that the recent speech of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister would be of some comfort to my hon. Friend. The Select Committee on European Legislation already has wide-ranging powers to consider documents published for submission to the Council of Ministers or the European Council and to take evidence as appropriate. It is open to the Committee to examine the issues involved more widely within its terms of reference. I advise a cautious approach to changing its terms of reference at this stage, which includes the need to look carefully at the effect of our scrutiny procedures brought about by the Single European Act.

Palace of Westminster (Facilities)

36. Mr. Butler: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will take steps to initiate an inquiry into what extra facilities might be desirable in the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Wakeham: I am pleased to be able to inform my hon. Friend that the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee of the Services Committee passed a resolution on 25 July this year to initiate an exercise, in consultation with the New Building Sub-Committee, to prepare a practical set of proposals to improve hon. Members' amenities and facilities. I am sure that, in the preparation of these proposals, right hon. and hon. Members' views will be taken into account.

Mr. Butler: I welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement, but will hon. Members be consulted individually by questionnaire on this matter?

Mr. Wakeham: That is a matter for the appropriate Committees to consider. I am sure that any views that hon. Members wish to put forward will be considered.

Mr. Dobson: Will the Leader of the House say when the Property Services Agency report on the replacement of the annunciator system will finally get off the Minister's desk so that hon. Members can see it? It is getting on for two years since it was asked to produce a report. If we are to have a modern electronic system, with possible access to Library information, and with information going to offices through the replacement for the annunciator system, it is about time some decisions were taken.

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman has raised this matter with me before, and I shall be in touch with him as soon as I have any news.

Working Practices

37. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Lord President of the Council what recent representations he has received about working practices in the House; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: I have received only one letter about this matter, from my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham).

Mr. Thurnham: Will my right hon. Friend ensure that the press reports of last summer making allegations of abuses and inefficiency are properly investigated? Does he think that more privatisation would improve the efficiency of services in the House and reduce abuses?

Mr. Wakeham: The second part of my hon. Friend's question goes wider than the original question. While there may be validity in the argument, I shall not be drawn on it. The matter concerning my hon. Friend was considered by the Catering Sub-Committee, which reached a conclusion only at its meeting last week. I shall reply to my hon. Friend's letter later this week.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does not the election of Chairmen of Select Committees constitute a working practice of the House? Is it not quite wrong that the Chairman of a Select Committee—and indeed the Chairman of the Select Committee on Selection—should be directors of or consultants to lobbying companies? Does the right hon. Gentleman not understand the unease that this has created throughout the lobbying and public relations industry? What will be done about it? Will it be stopped, and will the right hon. Gentleman recommend that it be stopped?

Mr. Wakeham: The membership of Select Committees is for the Selection Committee. The hon. Gentleman knows full well that if he has any serious allegations to make, there is a proper way of doing so to the Select Committee on Members' Interests. I suggest that he does that, and he should know better.

Members' Passes

38. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Lord President of the Council what is the total number of passes issued to hon. Members in respect of their personal staff; what was the figure for 1979; and how many hon. Members have two, three, four, five or more passes.

Mr. Wakeham: The latest Pass Office figures show that a total of 1,186 photo-identity passes are on issue to hon. Members' personal staff. I regret that comparable figures for 1979 are not available. The latest figures show that 149 hon. Members employ two photo-pass holders, 75 hon. Members employ three photo-pass holders, 43 hon. Members employ four photo-pass holders and 38 hon. Members employ five or more photo-pass holders.

Mr. Bennett: Is it not astonishing that 38 hon. Members need five or more staff to assist them in their role as hon. Members? Will my right hon. Friend consider putting a limit on the number of passes issued to individual hon. Members and draw to their attention the fact that perhaps one of the most effective Back Benchers this century—the right hon. J. Enoch Powell—was able to do his own research?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend is right. The Services Committee's second report, "Access to the Precincts of the House," which was published in July, is on this subject. I intend that it should be debated in the near future.

Westminster Hall

39. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he has any plans to seek to widen the use made of Westminster Hall; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: No, Sir. Any proposal to widen the use of Westminster Hall would require the agreement of the Lord Great Chamberlain, the Lord Chancellor and Mr. Speaker, in whom responsibility is vested for the use to which the Hall may be put.

Mr. Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is wrong for the large and spacious Westminster Hall to be unused for such long periods? Will he get together with the parties to whom he has referred and consider whether a swimming pool can be put in there to improve the fitness of Members—and perhaps a few could be thrown in at the deep end?

Mr. Wakeham: I cannot agree with my hon. Friend. In fact, I do not think that I can better the answer that was given by my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen), who said:

"I think that one of the great attractions of Westminster hall is how little it is used."—[Official Report, 19 February 1987; Vol. 110, c. 1082.]

Orders of the Day

Rate Support Grants Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

3.30 pm

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill provides the basis for an orderly transition from the existing system of grants to the new system which will operate from April 1990.

Amongst all the arguments about the replacement of domestic rates and the competing alternative, the important role of the rate support grant has received relatively little attention. The Bill gives us the opportunity to focus on that grant system which does, after all, account for about half of local authorities' expenditure. The decision in principle has been made. Parliament passed the Local Government Finance Act in July. That Act abolished rate support grant after next year and provided for the introduction of a new grant system, which is intended to be simpler and more accountable than the old. One particular feature is that, unlike the present system, the amount of grant paid to each authority will not depend on its expenditure. It will depend only on the assessed need of each area, taking account of the local characteristics.

My problem is that we call that the revenue support grant, so we move from RSG to RSG. I intend to call it the needs grant so that at least I can understand about which one we are talking. I hope that the Opposition will not see anything difficult in that. [Interruption.] We are dealing with a matter which is not the easiest in the world. I was told by one civil servant when I moved from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to the Department of the Environment that, as I appeared to have understood the common agricultural policy, I would have done at least the warm-up for trying to understand the rate support grant.

Under both Governments there has been a tendency throughout the country to believe that this is a matter to be left to the experts—those who are forced to understand RSG rather than those who choose to do so. I cannot believe that that is a sensible way to run local government or a proper way to arrange for taxation. I made a motto, in which I have continued to believe, that there should be no taxation without comprehension. It is important that we at least try to make this system as satisfactory as possible. One advantage of this system is that it has been widely welcomed by local authorities of differing political persuasions. I do not think that the concept of moving from this direction is a subject of controversy on either side of the House.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Although councillors of all political complexions would welcome simplification—this is recognised by both sides of the House—councillors in many areas are unhappy that the Government are basing their change on the estimated figures as opposed to the final outturn figures for 1987-88. In many instances, the final outturn figures are lower than the estimates, because of slippage and so on. Can the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that any money that is clawed back by the Government as a result of those differences will be recycled, that local authorities will not lose in total and that this money may be available in the following financial year?

Mr. Gummer: I think that that point will be covered as I proceed. I was referring to the new system, not to the interim system proposed in the Bill. The purpose of the Bill is to close down the old system before moving to the new. My remarks about simplicity related to the new system. Today's discussion, however, centres on whether the interim system in the Bill is the best way to move from the old system to the new. The hon. Gentleman has raised a reasonable point. That concern is shared by many authorities of differing political persuasions and I shall try to cover it when dealing with the new system.

If we continue with a system that is understood by so few, it is entirely understandable that people throughout the country will be unable to make a proper assessment of the efficacy of their local authorities. It is hard to decide whether a local authority is doing its job properly if one does not understand such a major element as the contribution made by the Government, and hence by the taxpayer, in terms of grant.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): My constituents have been asking about possible arrangements between local authorities under the new system in terms of moving housing expenditure around. There is a proposal in Ealing for houses to be built with payment by that local authority for three years less a day, then to move to Brent authority, then to Hounslow and then to yet another Labour-controlled authority. That is highly confusing and unsatisfactory for my constituents. Will the Bill do anything about that?

Mr. Gummer: The Bill is designed specifically to deal with the change from the present system to the new system. We shall be introducing a further Bill to deal with capital and the kind of arrangement to which my hon. Friend refers will be important in that context. That legislation will provide for the control of capital expenditure and for local aithorities to have a wider discretion in the choices that they make. However, that is really a matter for the next Bill in the new Session of Parliament as it relates to the new system rather than to the transitional arrangements under consideration today.

The transitional arrangements have been produced for two basic reasons. The first is certainty. If we allowed the old system simply to run into the buffers of the new, it would be a long time before anyone knew the final outturn of the last year of the old system. Next spring, for instance, we shall be making the final grant adjustments for 1985-86, so if we allowed the old system to continue to the end of its present run without any change we should be discussing the old system well after the new system had come into operation. Local authorities would thus not know where they stood. I am pleased to say that for that reason most authorities have recognised that special arrangements need to be made. I do not think that there is any disagreement on the principle that it is a good idea to have a stocktaking end to the old system. The question is whether the Bill constitutes the best way to do this. I am happy to accept that views will differ on that, but I hope that there is no disagreement on the principle that we should bring the old system to a close before beginning the new so that people will know where they stand.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I welcome the Minister to his new box of nails. The new system is uacceptable to many hon. Members. As a result of the cut-off in the Bill, some authorities will lose. Will there be any flexibility to allow the Government to compensate authorities which can show that they have lost badly under the new provisions?

Mr. Gummer: On the hon. Gentleman's second point, if he remains in the Chamber for the debate I am sure that he will follow my argument. I am certainly facing that issue, not ignoring it. Although some hon. Members may not like the new system, the fact is that the House has introduced it and it will operate. It would be foolish to re-argue something on which we have already agreed. Perhaps in this debate at least we can argue the issues raised by the Bill rather than a Bill that we have already discussed. I know that the hon. Gentleman takes a different view from me on the community charge, which is quite reasonable. He is in favour of having two taxes. However, we have made our decision, and we must stick to that and get on with discussing this Bill.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Can my right hon. Friend tell the House—it has always been a bit of a mystery to many of us—how those needs will be calculated? In particular, can he tell us why needs seem to be rather greater in Labour local authority areas than in Conservative local authority areas? A formula that gives more money to those with the greatest need is actually a formula for moving money from Conservative parts of the country to those maladministered parts that are appallingly run by the Labour party.

Mr. Gummer: That was true of the previous system where the needs element was mixed up with the expenditure element. An historically high-spending local authority would, even though its needs may have been similar to another sensibly run authority, obtain greater grant because of the attraction arrangements for expenditure. That will not happen under the new system because the expenditure level is no longer part of the argument, which will now be based entirely upon needs. They are already assessed under a complicated system with many different indices, many of them hardly fought over by different branches of local authority representation. We hope that there will be a much simpler and clearer method under the new system. We shall consult the local authorities, which will no doubt put their various points to us. I think that the House will be content with some of our suggestions because they take into account the real needs of communities. Of course, those real needs do not always coincide with the supposed needs of those elected to represent the communities. It is necessary to try to meet the real needs.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I understand the Minister to be saying that it is a good principle for local authorities to operate on a basis of certainty and to know what will happen as a result of particular actions. Does he accept that many local authorities, especially Cardiff city council and South Glamorgan county council, acted on the basis of statements to the House by Ministers and, as a result, found that a retrospective decision took £3·5 million away from them? Without looking at the faults of the past, on which the Minister may have a reasonable case, and without looking to the future, which is another matter, does the right hon. Gentleman accept that there are flaws in the Bill because it does not fill exactly the criteria that he has stated in respect of 1987-88?

Mr. Gummer: I hope that when I come to discuss those matters the hon. Gentleman will think my case reasonable. I recognise that Cardiff may not wholeheartedly agree with it—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman knows that I am on a raw point when he discusses whether Cardiff is reasonable. There is a real problem because, wherever the stocktaking line is drawn, people will say, "If only you pushed it another few weeks, or if only you would take into account this, that and the other, it would be much fairer." Whatever we do, people will always say that——

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Sheffield, Hallam): Will my right hon. Friend give away?

Mr. Gummer: I must continue or we shall not make progress. I will give way to my hon. Friend later.

Another reason why it is important to do this is not just to create certainty, but it is said that, if local authorities knew that whatever they did this year would not attract penalty or pay-back next year, they would be prepared to go in for creative accounting techniques, which they would not otherwise do. I am sure that the House will understand that the matter does not involve all local authorities, or a majority of local authorities, but it is sufficiently important for it to be concerned with it.

If one can reduce one's total expenditure in the current year under consideration and thereby attract extra grant, that is OK if the reduction of the current expenditure is real; but, if it is not real, one will attract extra grant to which one is not entitled. I understand that many Opposition Members in particular would say that there should be more money for local authorities, that money should be shared out more generously and that, therefore, it is not unreasonable for them to grab what they can. That argument is not acceptable, because, in the end, all Governments must be responsible for local authorities' total spending, both capital and revenue. Therefore, if, as a matter of economic policy, the Government decide that we should not spend——

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): Why?

Mr. Gummer: If the hon. Gentleman were in office, which is unlikely to happen, he would have to do the same. Anybody running a sensible economic policy would have to take into account local authority spending.

Dr. Cunningham: Garbage.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman says "Garbage". That is a good reason for the people of Britain to recognise that to elect a Government who do not think that it is important to restrict and control total public sector spending means that they would elect a Government who do not think that the conquest of inflation is important. It means also that they would elect a Government who would get us into precisely the same problems as we had before.

Dr. Cunningham: The Minister is right to say that any Government would want rigorously to control their share of local government finance—what is provided through the Exchequer and the taxpayer. Will he tell us the macro-economic arguments for controlling local authorities' expenditure from their own resources?

Mr. Gummer: Certainly. If the hon. Gentleman does not recognise that the money that is spent by the public sector is different from that which is available for enterprise in the private sector, he does not realise why Britain is now growing so much faster and why we are providing the jobs that we are providing. If the hon. Gentleman says that we should allow local authorities or national authorities to spend money that should be for the expansion of other aspects of the economy, he has not learnt anything since his party's defeat in 1979. That defeat will continue until that basic economic fact is learnt.

We have to face the problem because some local authorities have decided to do certain things that the House as a whole would agree to be unacceptable. Let me give one example. A certain local authority decides to sell off to City institutions the future receipts from its sales of council housing. It happens to be a local authority that does not believe in selling council houses, but, on this occasion, it decides to do so. Let us suppose that it raises £20 million. It would then be able to put that £20 million into the bank and take the interest from it, and thereby——

Mr. Tony Banks: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Gummer: I shall explain to the hon. Gentleman what is wrong with that. It would then pay that money back in four or five years. In the meantime, it would have technically reduced its own spending to attract to itself what might have been £3 million of extra grant.

Mr. Tony Banks: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Gummer: I shall tell the hon. Gentleman what is wrong with that. It would attract £3 million of general taxpayers' money to which it was not entitled and which could have been spent on the National Health Service, for example. It would mean that that local authority had tried to cheat on the system and remove from others who needed it money to which it was not entitled. Of course, as far as the ratepayer is concerned, it would be perfectly reasonable to do that if it were smoothing out spending year on year, but it would be reasonable only if the person who paid the bill at the end was the same person who incurred it at the beginning. If a local authority decides to shift £3 million of its spending from itself, as it were, to the general taxpayer, the authority is seeking to use the system to its advantage and to ignore the spirit of the system that we operate.

Historically, local authorities would not have acted in this way. They would have eschewed that obvious cheating of the system. They would have said, "That would not be acceptable in a public authority." There are many authorities, controlled either by the Labour or the Conservative parties, or the alliance, that would not take such a step. The idea of not closing the gap for the authorities that would do what most would consider to be wrong would be unacceptable. Those who would treat the public purse in such a cavalier manner must not be allowed to get away with it when many other authorities of similar political persuasion would not dream of acting in such a way. That is why we think it necessary to close the loophole.

Mr. Tony Banks: I know that the Minister is new to his present position, but surely he must appreciate that the creative accounting, as it is called, in which a number of authorities get themselves involved, is not done because authorities want to take such a course. They do it because the penalties and the regime imposed upon them from Marsham street are such that, if they want to defend jobs and services in their area, perforce they have to do this sort of thing. The Minister is wrong to suggest that they are cheats. If authorities have problems, they have a duty to deal with them in the best way that they can. They go in for so-called creative accounting to mitigate the effect of Government policies upon their spending programmes.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman cannot get away with that. The Government had to make these arrangements because local authorities were precepting upon the taxpayer to pay inflated staffs, to run services which were not properly run or costed, and to implement many arrangements that should not have been paid for by the taxpayer. If the hon. Gentleman runs through some of the services that are provided by the authority from which he draws his representation, he will come across many items that could be cut. The resultant savings could be spent on the real needs of his area of London.

Mr. Tony Banks: Name them.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman chooses to shout at me. Does he think, for example, that the plethora of committees that deal with race, women's issues, gay issues and the rest are doing any good for women, racial minorities or gay people? They do much to delay matters and to create the need for greater expenditure. The money that they cause to be spent could be much better spent in the deprived area of the hon. Gentleman's borough. Those of us who live in boroughs that act in that way and that treat the ratepayers in that way—I have experience of this, as I live in Ealing—understand that large sums could be properly spent if only money were not spent unnecessarily.

We are discussing—the hon. Member for Newham North-West (Mr. Banks) has sought to discuss something else—whether we should have a system which enables local authorities to determine what national spending should be, or whether we should have a system whereby the Government determine national spending and individual local authorities abide by the rules that apply to the sharing out. I think that it would be wrong if individual local authorities were in a position to buck the rules. It would be wrong if authorities could adopt creative accounting and thereby make themselves better off at the taxpayers' cost while other authorities which behaved properly, obeyed the rules and kept to the spirit of them —authorities controlled by whatever party—found themselves less well off.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Gummer: No, I shall not.

Mr. Haynes: Why not?

Mr. Gummer: I would be delighted to give way to the hon. Gentleman, but he will accept that I have already given way many times. Therefore, I shall continue with my speech.

Mr. Haynes: Go on, give way.

Mr. Gummer: The House will recognise——

Mr. Haynes: Why is the Minister frightened?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure that the Minister is not frightened, and he is not giving way.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman and I have crossed swords on many occasions in the past.

Mr. Haynes: I want to cross swords again.

Mr. Gummer: I shall be happy to give the hon. Gentleman an opportunity later in my speech to cross swords with me again. For the moment I must get on with the argument.

There is another argument that we must face. When we come to the end of one system and move to a new one, there is an additional encouragement for people to bend the rules. Normally, when creative accounting is carried out in one year, it must be paid for the following year. If the new system is enforced and there is no penalty for creative accounting in the first year, a particular local authority will receive grant at the taxpayers' expense. The authority will never have to pay the price. Therefore, it is necessary to introduce this legislation.

We could have taken a different route and I must tell Opposition Members that there is a different route. We could have said that we expected local authorities to behave in that way and that we expected them to operate on the edge of the law. Therefore, we could have cut back the settlement to take that into account. Had we done that, we would have destroyed our credibility with local authorities. That would have meant that we expected all authorities to behave like a small minority whose behaviour we have always attacked. It would also have meant that some authorities, unable or unwilling to behave in that way, would have been extremely harshly penalised by the very tough settlement which would have followed. I do not believe that that would have been a proper way to deal with the matter.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Gummer: I am certain that the hon. Gentleman will find an opportunity to intervene later.

We decided to introduce arrangements so that future changes in total expenditure would not affect grant entitlements. We announced that in July along with the initial proposals for next year's RSG settlements in England and Wales so that authorities could be clear on what basis the settlement was to operate. We have followed that up quickly with the legislation so that authorities will have certainty about those issues before they make their budgets for 1989-90.

The Bill provides that grant for the remaining years of the old system—in practice, that means 1985-86 to 1989-90—should be based on the spending figures available to us before the new arrangements were announced on 7 July. That is our stocktaking date. Any new information received after that date will not be taken into account.

Mr. Tony Banks: Why?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman asks why. If it was an open-ended date, it would allow precisely the kind of changes in retrospect about which I have spoken. Local authorities, this year and in successive years, going back as they can now over years, could change their total expenditure figures because the books are not closed. They could change the figures, not in reality—it would not mean that they had spent less—but merely through creative accounting. That must mean that less money would be available for spending in other areas even if that is not seen as a means of taking less in taxation. There would be less available for spending in other areas if local authorities acted in that way. That clearly would be unfair.

Mr. Michael: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Gummer: I will give way in a moment.

I will give the hon. Member for Newham, North-West another reason. I thought I had said before that the authorities would not know where they were for years to come because the final settlement and closure of the books would go on year after year as it does today.

Clause 1 deals with grant calculations for the years 1985-86 to 1988-89 in England and 1986-87 to 1988-89 in Wales. Wales has caught up a little on us and has already closed 1985-86. The clause provides that, instead of final outturn total expenditure, we should use an expenditure figure, which we will call the relevant amount, derived from the rules set out. The figures that we will use are the figures provided by local authorities in the official forms which arrive before 7 July.

That is already a very generous date. The authorities were supposed to produce figures before the end of March. That provides a pretty large gap. Each of the figures is signed by the chief financial officer as the best figure available. Therefore, we know that they are official figures on the official form. All local authorities, bar two, have provided us with the figures and I will consider the exceptions shortly.

Those two authorities were telephoned and were asked again and again to produce their figures by the required date. Unfortunately, they have not done so. I do not imagine that any right hon. Member would object to the argument that people ought to fulfil their obligations under the law. It is the law that local authorities should make such returns, and therefore we have had to calculate the figures in that way.

The rules are designed to provide an unambiguous figure for every authority and for every year. We have sought all the way along to stick to that stocktaking rule. However carefully Opposition Members may examine the system, they will not be able to suggest that it disadvantages some political parties rather than others. Clearly, different local authorities of different political persuasions would like different dates, because they are all in the position of trying to maximise their advantage. I do not blame them for that, but whatever date one applies, and whatever deadline one imposes, there are bound to be some authorities which fall on one side rather than the other. It seems more sensible to fix on the date that has been decided; it is not unfair, and it is applied equally, right across the board.

Clause 2 deals only with 1985-86, which was the last year for which expenditure targets were issued. People say to me, "We are surprised that that year is still being dealt with", and certainly that was the first comment that I made as somebody new to the subject. The fact remains that seven local authorities still have not closed their books for 1985-86. One of the great drawbacks of the current system is that we are left lacking right along the line.

Dr. Cunningham: Can the right hon. Gentleman tell the House why?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) must accept that I have stated—I hope it will be thought perfectly honourably—that I am not talking just about systems derived from a Labour Administration but also those produced under a Conservative Government. I shall not argue why that is so. Some of us would say that it is in response to action by authorities that behaved in outrageous ways, while others would not. I did not intend to enter into an argument about why change is required, but it would be foolish not to admit that the present system needs a fundamental overhaul—and that is what we propose.

Mr. Michael: Is it not reasonable for the Minister to accept that, while trying to improve the system in the way that he mentions, local authorities should be able to depend on statements that have been made by Cabinet Ministers to the House, and that those local authorities that have depended on such statements should not face the risk of having them contradicted retrospectively, as is the case with this Bill?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Member should accept that in changing from one system to another, one must close off the possibility that people will change their figures retrospectively to gain an advantage at the expense of others. At the same time, if one imposes a fixed date, one must implement it in the same way for everyone. One cannot make exceptions for Cardiff or for Suffolk—and I use those two examples of local authorities of different political persuasions as they affect both the hon. Gentleman and myself. Exactly the same comment has been made to me by the Suffolk authority, saying, "If you change the rules a bit, you will meet the problem that we have." But wherever one draws the line, it must be drawn in the same place for everybody; it is not possible to make exceptions.

Clause 3 deals with 1989-90. Naturally, for this year we have no information as yet about individual authorities' likely total expenditure. In that respect we were faced with a real problem. If one were to allow the existing system to continue in respect of the current year, it would enable all kinds of creative accounting to take place, because there will never be any bill to pay later. Therefore, it seems reasonable to make a special arrangement for the next year. We have set out a formula for deriving the basic figure upon which each authority's total expenditure is calculated.

I shall say this very carefully, particularly for the benefit of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West because I believe that it refers specifically to his local authority. For the seven authorities selected for rate capping in 1989-90, their expenditure will be assumed to be equal to their "expenditure limit" announced on 7 July. However, for most authorities the figure is calculated by taking their expenditure in 1988-89 using the rules in schedule 1 and projecting forward. In other words, there is a fixed stocktaking date on 7 July and one then projects that figure forward for the following year, so that there is a transitional period for introducing the new system.

There will be two adjustments for English authorities. I have told Opposition Members that it would be unfair to make any special arrangements, but I hope that these will be seen as sensible adjustments. First, there will be an adjustment for education authorities because local authorities will no longer be responsible for funding polytechnics after April 1989. Secondly, London boroughs and district councils will incur extra expenditure in preparing for the community charge. Part of those costs will be met by specific grants that have already been announced, but the remaining part will be reflected in the formula for the total expenditure next year, because that will be covered by the normal block grant arrangements. If we had not made that provision, the authorities in question could not have been given extra help and allocation for the community charge. I feel sure that right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House would have found that unacceptable.

For Welsh authorities, there is an adjustment for the community charge but no adjustment for polytechnics. Additionally, there is one particular adjustment reflecting the transfer of responsibility for public libraries from Gwent county council to Newport district council. All that is done to meet promises that have been made as to future spending.

Mr. Tony Banks: The Minister probably does not know London very well, but I come from the London borough of Newham. It is a Tory-free zone, with 59 Labour councillors and one representing the SDP—and we are working on that. The Minister ought to understand that Newham is not rate-capped for next year, but the arrangement that he has just announced represents a further unfair burden on rate-capped councils in London.

Mr. Gummer: I am sorry if I misunderstood the hon. Member for Newham, North-West, but he made several important points about rate capping and I thought it proper to refer to him in that context. I apologise if I was wrong to do so. I thought that the hon. Gentleman had drawn particular attention to the way in which rate capping worked, and I apologise if I misunderstood him.

The 1988-89 expenditure figures will be increased by a factor that will be set out in the rate support grant report. I am trying very hard to make the system as simple as possible. This is the one area where I have failed to achieve that, but I shall try to describe it as clearly as possible. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Copeland laughs. I know that he is very comfortable, being in the position that he will never have to assume this responsibility himself. That makes it possible for him to laugh. We must try to make the system acceptable to people, and that means expressing it in language that most of us can understand. I realise that the hon. Member for Copeland is so clever that he has always been able to understand these matters, but others do not.

The Secretary of State has already proposed that the provision for current expenditure in England for 1989-90 should be an increase of 4·8 per cent. over 1988-89 budgets, after allowing for the polytechnics adjustment. This factor, which is defined in the Bill as the Z factor, will be consistent with 4·8 per cent. but not identical, because of technical adjustments between current and total expenditure.

I have now described that part of the Bill that I could not find a better way of describing more simply but still accurately. It is important to recognise that we seek to uprate the amount that is based on figures provided by local authorities by a sufficient amount to cover expected extra expenditure by local authorities.

[Mr. Gummer]

Clause 4 deals with consultation. This autumn we shall be making the RSG settlement for 1989-90 and four supplementary reports for earlier years—which shows how much is still on the go—and consultation will take place then. There is a substantial volume of material for local authority associations and individual authorities to consider, and we had to discuss whether it was fair not to start the consultation until the passage of the Bill was completed. If we did that, we would be cramming the consultation period into what we considered far too short a time; on the other hand, if we extended the period, we could not make the RSG announcements early enough for local authorities to take the action that they wished to take. In clause 4 we are taking powers to enable us to start consultation before the Bill receives Royal Assent, as that seemed the better of the two alternatives. I hope that the House agrees.

About 60 authorities have written arguing that the Bill will result in their receiving less grant for some earlier years than they would otherwise have been entitled to receive. That point was raised by the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael). They have argued that the rules that we have set up in the Bill could be modified to allow them to benefit from reductions in expenditure between the time when they made the last return to the Department and 7 July. They have said, "We made our expenditure returns rather early. Cannot we have a supplementary grant between the two dates?" Initially, I thought the proposition not unreasonable, and I am attracted by any suggestion that might make the system fairer.

Mr. Tony Banks: But . . .

Mr. Gummer: I was going to say "but", because I must explain why I decided that 7 July was a better date. If local authorities were able to do that, we would have to try to make a distinction between authorities that had already made such decisions and authorities that were saying that they were about to make them, that they had done so but it had not happened to get through to the right committee at the time, or that they had done so but that no auditing had been done.

I have come to believe that one cannot make a proper decision: whatever date was decided upon, there would be an argument for some other date. If there is to be a change from one system to another, there is bound to be a "stocktaking" date. Rather than a continual and protracted argument over a long period, with auditors being brought in in an attempt to claim that "this is in" and "this is out", there should be a direct answer. The agony should not be extended.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Gummer: I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman a number of times.

The rules provide that we should take into account only information about total expenditure submitted by local authorities and received by the Secretary of State before 7 July. The timing does not seem unreasonable, and the system is based on what the chief finance officer of each authority said was the best information available. The problem is that sometimes later information would obtain a better result for a local authority, but the only better information that we would hear would be information that obtained a better result. Although information might be more accurate later, if it obtained a worse result we should never hear it.

The problem is the same with any accounting system. A single date would at least avoid the argument that we would hear everything that was of benefit to a local authority and nothing that was not—even in the case of the same authority—and that an authority would be able to say that this, that and the other had changed the position for its benefit but we would hear nothing of other matters that had been changed to its disadvantage.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Gummer: I have given way to other hon. Gentlemen, but I have not given way to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) as I promised that I would. I therefore do so now.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Does the Minister accept that he is making these decisions because he believes that some local authorities may use the rules to their advantage—rules that I must emphasise were drawn up by the present Government and which they now choose to change? Is it not wrong to penalise local authorities that try to use those rules to the best advantage of their local electors and ratepayers?

Mr. Gummer: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not defending the concept that I mentioned earlier of selling future receipts from local authority housing sales to a City institution, using the money artificially—in other words, lyingly—to reduce this year's expenditure, and obtaining money from the taxpayer that is never paid back later. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not saying that, because I have great respect for him. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) has not been present for all of the debate, but he is now shouting from a seated position. He has not been here to follow the argument—which has so far been conducted in a perfectly reasonable and rational way. I do not intend to change that simply because the hon. Gentleman has entered the Chamber.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke) rose——

Mr. Gummer: This really must be the last time that I give way.

Mr. Bennett: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way, and for explaining so well a Bill that seems as complex as the Schleswig-Holstein question. Can he explain the position of local authorities whose expenditure has increased because their income has fallen, because they are not operating their housing revenue account properly or collecting the rates properly? I am thinking particularly of Brent, where nine Labour councillors owe £11,000 in rates and rent. Can my right hon. Friend assure the House that the taxpayer will not be subsidising the authority?

Mr. Tony Banks: What about the City of Westminster?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman must allow me to answer. I have given way to him several times.

Mr. Banks I was trying to help.

Mr. Gummer: That is not the answer that I would have given my hon. Friend.

One of the sadnesses in local authority finance is that many local authorities that could act to improve the conditions of the people whom they are supposed to represent do not do so but instead blame the Government and the RSG system for faults within their own control. I can give an example from a debate last week. An hon. Member complained that the Government had not yet given permission for the building of council accommodation for the homeless, because it was still in the pipeline. I had to point out that the authority—which was run by the alliance—had thousands of empty properties that could have been taken into account before that stage was reached. His argument was undermined by the authority's failure to do all that could be done locally before whingeing about what the Government were doing.

I accept that for past years, when final outturn has traditionally been slightly below earlier estimates, authorities in aggregate will receive less grant than would otherwise have been the case. I am not disagreeing with what the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth says, in general as well as in particular. I am making an admission, and I shall admit one or two other things about which I hope that he will be pleased.

As I have explained, authorities can be certain that there will be no grant left unclaimed next year. There will be no penalties either: that is another aspect that local authorities can take seriously. In the past two years substantial amounts of grant have gone unclaimed authorities' expenditure has been higher than was assumed for the purposes of the settlement. That cannot happen in 1989-90. The amount of grant available for 1989-90 will be 9 per cent.—£1·1 billion—higher than the amount likely to be paid out this year, an increase considerably above the rate of inflation.

Taken as a whole, the proposals are very fair to local government. It will not be possible for several years—until we have final outturn expenditure for all the years concerned—to work out whether the Bill has resulted in more or less grant being paid than would otherwise have been the case. But it is symptomatic of the fact that we do not expect the Exchequer to gain out of this that we are bringing forward a money Bill so that extra moneys can be spent if necessary.

Whatever may be the date of the stocktaking, some will benefit from it more than others; they will feel that another date would be better. We have attempted to produce an answer that means that neither taxpayers nor the Treasury are natural gainers from the system. That is not our intention. We are taking powers to ensure that if we are losers we shall be able to pay out the extra money.

Many people in local government, of all parties, believe that a measure of this kind is necessary. Some favour a different method of reaching the close-down date, but they welcome the certainty that it will provide about grant entitlement. They welcome particularly the fact that it guarantees that the amount of grant available for 1989-90 will be paid in full, and many have been sensible enough to welcome the increase in the total amount of grant that will be paid.

The Bill has been brought forward in the interests of good and orderly administration. It is designed to protect the Exchequer against the risk of unjustified grant claims resulting from creative accounting, to provide authorities with certainty as they prepare for the new system, and to provide for an orderly close down to the existing system. A change was made imperative by the switch to the new grant system in 1990. The proposals in the Bill are designed to give a clear and unambiguous set of rules for achieving these objectives. It defines the position so that both local authorities and the Secretary of State know exactly where they stand.

On that basis, I hope that we shall be able to proceed sensibly and reasonably to the new, much fairer system of local government finance. It will enable local government from year to year to become much more accountable and much more able to see where it stands. It would not be possible sensibly to introduce that system if there were not a measure such as this. I hope that the House will accept that this is a sensible Bill and that it will give certainty to local authorities that this system of local government finance will be much simpler to understand, much fairer to all and much more local in its implementation.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I apologise for delaying the start of the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), but it is not true for the Minister to say that I was not here for his speech. I missed only five minutes of it. I am not sorry that I missed those five minutes.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): It is a fair time since the Minister stood up to present the Bill to the House. It has been a constant source of amazement to me over the years that Tory Ministers have come to the House of Commons and spoken such gibberish. The Minister admitted that this is an extremely complicated matter. Nobody denies that the Bill must be given a Second Reading and that there will have to be, albeit briefly, detailed consideration of it. The Bill involves considerable sums of local and central Government expenditure that will affect the citizens of this country.

When a Bill is introduced in this way, there is inevitably bound to be a blend of half truth, loads of jargon, choice abuse of one's political opponents in local government, and expressions of distaste for local government and local democracy if it does not deliver what the political party in power desires. It is a shabby form of government when such large sums of money are involved. It protects this Minister and other Ministers from having to face the reality and the consequences of their legislation.

One cannot be certain about the effects of the Bill, because of the number of years involved. Money that local government could reasonably have expected to receive in 1988-89 will be down by £500 million. The Minister referred to the assistance that is to be given to introduce the poll tax, but the so-called extra cash that is to be given for its introduction is not extra cash at all. Some of it is bound to be offset by what local authorities are to lose. A cut to pay for a grant is dishonest. The Government are giving with one hand and taking away with the other, but this is not the first time that that has happened.

Some local authorities will end up with windfall gains. Others will face unexpected, and in some cases unprecedented, losses. It is all being done in such a rush. We are three weeks away—two weeks if certain authorities in the House have their way—from the end of what will have been the longest Session of this Parliament. I am not surprised by this Government's contempt for the House and its procedures, but that is no reason for hon. Members to acquiesce silently. Why the rush? Why can we not wait until the new Session when the Bill could be properly debated and scrutinised in detail? I accept that we were told in July that the Bill would be pushed through this Session. It could have been published before the summer recess. It is not without precedent for the Government to introduce Bills during the spill-over. They can introduce Bills whenever they like. However, it is not normal for Bills to be introduced during the spill-over.

I have found—more correctly, I asked and the Library found—just two Bills that have been introduced in the spill-over period during the nearly 15 years that I have served in the House. The first was introduced on 21 October 1975 at 11.56 pm. The Minister then moved the Second Reading of the Cinematographic Films Bill. It was welcomed by the then Opposition in the form of the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby). That Bill was not contested and there was no Division. A Labour Government were in power in 1975. Conservative Ministers thrive on the basis that everything that is wrong today, after 10 years of Tory rule, is the fault of past Labour Governments. One therefore has to take the wise precaution of checking precedents.

The other Bill was introduced on 28 October 1980. The then Home Secretary introduced the Imprisonment (Temporary Provisions) Bill. Such a measure was urgent because of the industrial action that was being taken by prison officers. The Bill went through all its stages in one day. The Opposition did not divide on Second Reading; nevertheless, they divided on certain amendments to the Bill.

One of those Bills was not contested and was dealt with as a fill-in late at night. The other Bill was urgently required. This Bill does not fit into either of those categories. There is no earthly reason why this Bill should not be introduced in the new Session. The Bill does not have all-party support. There is no question of the Opposition not dividing the House on Second Reading or in Committee.

I accept that the Minister could not mention everything during his 50-minute speech, but he concentrated exclusively on local authorities. However, the police—another area of public service—are affected by the Bill. The suggestion that there has been a decline in crime is absolute nonsense. Last year sex crimes and crimes of violence increased by 16 and 17 per cent. respectively. I agree that burglaries went down by 6 per cent., but compared with the position 10 years ago there has been a massive increase in crime, resulting in considerable pressure on police resources.

The Government are creating a society that is based on greed and on "To hell with tomorrow." [Interruption.] Conservative Members do not like to hear it, but that is the reality of the society that the Government are creating. Their policies are leading to violent crime, burglaries, generally loutish behaviour and to the white collar crime that is taking place on the stock exchange. It would be possible for police forces in London, the metropolitan areas and Northumbria to lose £18 million as a direct result of the Bill. Shire county forces will also potentially lose, but, because the figures are subsumed in figures for the county councils as a whole, it is not possible to express that information separately.

What greater encouragement can there be to vigilantes to take to the streets than a higher crime rate and a further squeeze on police budgets? In recent days, in my constituency and in London, imported American vigilantes have been attempting to patrol the streets and the London underground. In Birmingham such activities have been supported by at least one Conservative councillor. I read yesterday that in Tyne and Wear, where some neighbourhoods have called in private security firms to patrol their streets, the Northumbria police authority is pressing the Home Office for an extra 500 officers, whereas the Bill potentially cuts the authority's grant by £668,000. I can account for £400,000 of that, which is itemised in detail in complaints that that authority has made as a result of the statement by the Secretary of State in July.

Other police authorities, such as South Yorkshire, will be affected. I am not talking about local government or local councils. As far as I know, the police authorities have not been accused of ripping off the system by creative accounting. Nevertheless, they stand to lose considerable sums. The West Midlands authority has made a request for a further 350 officers, which would add about 2p to the rate precept. The Bill cuts £1·8 million from the expected grant entitlement of the West Midlands police authority.

It is no wonder that no Minister has yet moved to control the vigilante patrols or the private security firms in Washington. It is no wonder that Ministers have not taken firm action to control the foreigners who encourage people to set up private amateur vigilante patrols on our streets. If there is to be more of a squeeze on the police budget, the obvious way out is to privatise the service. It is the thin end of the wedge. Such a development is dishonest and dishonourable, and if the Government cannot see that it is dangerous now, they will never see it.

Why are the police authorities covered by the Bill? Why will the police authorities potentially lose such substantial sums? I have cited the West Midlands. The Metropolitan police authority stands to lose £11·5 million in grant entitlement. Greater Manchester stands to lose £1·7 million, West Yorkshire just over £1 million, and Merseyside and South Yorkshire about £750,000 each. Someone must give us some answers about a side effect of the Bill to which the Minister did not once refer.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): I find the hon. Gentleman's criticism surprising, given that the Government have allowed record numbers of policemen to be recruited and appointed, and given also that they have voted money for record pay settlements, which the police deserve. Given the hon. Gentleman's concern and respect for law and order, what does he have to say to those Labour Members and those members of the Labour party in Scotland who have urged people not to pay the community charge, whose implementation has been duly approved by the Parliament of the United Kingdom on a majority vote?

Mr. Rooker: That has nothing whatever to do with the police, and anyway that is not Labour party policy.

Mr. Heffer: I entirely agree with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker). The case that he is making is first class. Is he aware that a Tory Member who once lived in a city in the United States of America—in Miami, I think—said that the whole area was controlled by the Mafia? There was no local petty crime and residents paid a certain amount to the Mafia. If anybody committed a petty crime he was quickly seen off, no doubt with leaded boots. Is that the sort of thing that we want in this country?

Mr. Rooker: My hon. Friend is right. So far, no Minister has discouraged or expressed much concern about such activities. Everyone must know that vigilante patrols, however well organised, are nothing more than large-scale corruption-protection rackets by which money is taken from people who pay their taxes and who should be getting a proper service from a properly trained police force. That is what people want. They certainly do not want encouragement to be given to the setting up of vigilante patrols. The potential effect of the Bill on the police and the police budget must be made clear and the case answered.

The Minister went out of his way to imply that local authorities of different political complexions would be covered by the Bill. That is absolutely right. Under the Bill, because of the legitimisation of what is technically known as the hold-back system, £500 million or thereabouts of expected grant entitlement may not be paid. According to our best estimates, Conservative-controlled authorities will obtain £134 million less than they had reason to expect. For Labour-controlled authorities the amount will be £157 million; for authorities controlled by what I shall call the minor party the figure will be £4 million. Those controlled by independents will lose £3 million, and the substantial number of authorities in which there is no overall control will lose £210 million. Those figures are separate from the figures for the joint boards affecting the police and transport. Those figures cut right across the spectrum of public services, and the sum involved is substantial. Conservative Members are bound to receive representations from their local authorities.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): Is the information that the hon. Gentleman is giving based on his calculations, or on official figures with which he has been provided?

Mr. Rooker: They are the best estimates available to the Opposition of the traditional grant that would be due in 1988-89, although the Minister relied principally on the figures for 1989-90, and I understand the reason for that. I was referring to the additional grant due in 1988-89 if there were no hold back. When the Secretary of State introduced the rate support grant order he referred to the "generous settlement" of £13·775 million. His remarks were reported at column 465 of Hansard for 9 December 1987. One must exclude from that sum specific and supplementary grants and domestic rate relief, giving the block grant figure of £9·471 million which was referred to in the local government finance order approved by the House. The local authorities could reasonably have expected to receive that money. I shall not go through the whole list of authorities, as hundreds are involved. I have made it clear that authorities controlled by either party and by no party are affected. All sectors of local government will be affected.

Mr. Gummer: The figure of £500 million could be arrived at only if every local authority reduced its expenditure to the amount that it was allowed. As that has never happened, the hon. Gentleman is postulating a figure much larger than could arise in any known circumstances. Because outturn is usually lower than estimated earlier in the year, the hon. Gentleman is right to say that some grant that might have been paid will not now be paid under the Bill. The hon. Gentleman ought also to consider the amount of grant that will be available.

Mr. Rooker: I have gone out of my way to talk of the amount that is potentially available to local government when talking about the £500 million—£512 million to be precise. I accept what the Minister said, so I shall meet him half way. Perhaps we can split the difference and settle for £250 million. In that case, all the figures that I shall give henceforth should be halved. I think that local government would accept that. The metropolitan authorities and the shire counties and districts would be prepared to meet the Minister half way and say, "We understand the problems, so let us talk about £250 million coming to local government."

If the Minister is prepared to meet local government half way, all the figures that I shall give can be halved. For Kent county council, a potential £15·3 million could be available. It heads the list of affected Tory shires. Berkshire could have an extra £10·5 million, Surrey an extra £9·4 million. West Sussex could have an extra £8·2 million. It must be remembered that West Sussex has to share the massive security costs of the Conservative party conference. It and East Sussex must dip into the budget to find £1·4 million for it. Bradford could have an extra £3·7 million. The Prime Minister's local authority of Barnet could have an extra £3·4 million. The Minister's local authority of Suffolk, Coastal could have an extra £112,000. Epping Forest, where there is to be a by-election soon, could have an extra £95,000.

My own city of Birmingham heads the list of Labour-controlled losers. It could have an extra £13 million. Staffordshire could have an extra £10 million, Nottinghamshire an extra £9·8 million, Manchester an extra £5 million, Sheffield £4·8 million and Coventry £3 million. The tale of what local government had good reason to expect but will not get is pretty sorry.

Essex county council heads the list of losers where there is no overall control. It could have an extra £18·7 million. Hampshire, where there is due to be a by-election for the European Parliament soon, could have an extra £17·4 million. Lancashire could have an extra £11·5 million, Cheshire £10·9 million and East Sussex, which with West Sussex makes up the Sussex constabulary and must find the £1·4 million needed for security at the Conservative party conference, stands to lose £8 million. Warwickshire could have an extra £5·5 million.

Those are substantial sums, which could affect the quality of life and the taxes paid by our constituents. Local authorities are required to deal with and finance many unexpected items for which, with the best will in the world, no budget can cater. I should like to give just one example of that, and I do not apologise for its being from the city of Birmingham.

In late July the then Secretary of State for Social Services received a letter from Councillor Barton, who chairs the Birmingham social services committee. The letter arose because Birmingham's director of social services had reported to the committee her action in agreeing to the long-term placement at a named youth treatment centre of a child in care. The placement—of a 14-year-old boy—was considered essential and the centre is the only one that meets the youngster's needs.

[Mr. Rooker]

I do not propose to go into the details, but the director drew the matter to the social services committee's attention because the annual cost of the placement to Birmingham's ratepayers was £72,000 a year. That is close to £200 a day. Councillor Barton said that the cost of protecting society from the youngster should not fall wholly on the local authority. The cost of the placement is equivalent to 10 day care places for people with mental handicap, five fully trained social workers, or 10 home helps.

Councillor Barton, whose concerns I supported in a letter to the Minister, received a response from the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) as Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, the effect of which was "Tough". She said that if the young man was in Birmingham's care the cost would fall on Birmingham, and that the nature of the placement did not affect that.

If the youngster had committed some of the offences that it was feared he might commit, the Home Office would have had to meet the bill. The Minister said that there are lots of youngsters in places that cost more than £40,000 a year. That is but one example, but it shows that budgets cannot take account of everything. That is what local government is all about—coping with unforeseen problems as they rise as efficiently and sensibly as possible. Local authorities must act in the best interests of the community as a whole and of the individual concerned. In such a case, no help is forthcoming to Birmingham or any other council, although it is a wholly unexpected impost on the budget.

There is one Conservative Member who insists that there is no such thing as the poll tax but, like the poll tax, the changes in rate support grant or revenue support grant —if the Minister can get the name changed to needs grant that will be fine, but I suspect that the Department still likes to use the jargon expression RSG—are designed to undermine rather than to underpin democratic local government.

Coupled with the Local Government Finance Act 1988, the Bill and other legislation to come will free Ministers to manipulate Government funding to local government and business rates and to fix the poll tax. Unfortunately, from the Government's point of view, local government does not run scared of the Prime Minister as she operates her agenda to emasculate it. We did not hear much from the Minister about the purpose and function of local government. The idea is abroad in the speeches and comments of many Conservative Members that local government is simply an agency that provides services dictated by the centre. I reject that view, as should all democrats.

We live in a unitary state, and if we do not have genuine, local, democratic government, we cannot divide political power—it will all reside at the centre. We need genuine, democratic, local government to increase political participation and emancipation and to provide responsive, appropriate local services based on local needs, locally assessed. I am pleased to see that the Minister approves that latter point.

It was written a long time ago that a unitary state will end up a dictatorship if there is no freedom in the localities. If there is no freedom in the localities, it naturally follows that all power goes to the centre. Dictatorship is the inevitable consequence. It follows the suppression of local freedoms and initiative and the curtailment of local responsibility and opportunity.

As Opposition Members said in Committee when considering the Local Government Finance Bill, the political liberty of British citizens demands a system of local government that commands confidence. It must have the confidence and power to operate in our pluralistic society, not as a challenge to Parliament or to the Government, but as a clear challenge to Whitehall obtaining all the power, and to scrutinise other agencies at work within the state. That is an important role for local government.

As the poll tax legislation comes into operation—and there is much more still to come to the House—Ministers will realise that in the past local authorities have been intermediaries, a buffer between central power and what has been termed the ultimately unmeetable pressures of a mass democracy by Dr. Ken Young, formerly of the Policy Studies Institute, in one of his essays. In other words, good quality, democratically accountable local government has protected Ministers from the demands of a mass democracy. It has buttressed them and put a fence around them, because, as they know, many of the pressures are unmeetable, and local democracy was one way of assisting that part of a political process. That has been an advantage to Ministers, and as people increasingly realise that it is not worth bothering with local government—I question why people will want to become councillors in future—the buck will stop at the door of the Ministers. It will be no good their telling people to go back to their local authorities because, generally speaking, the local authorities will be in no position to deal with the matter.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I followed very closely my hon. Friend's comments about dictatorship from the centre. Does he agree that on occasion Conservative councils have been prepared to stand up to a Conservative Government and point out the error of their ways? Is it not a matter of regret that the Government have a greater tendency towards dictatorship from the centre, particularly in Bradford, where Tory councillors are being manipulated by the centre to impose cuts and sackings to further the political ambitions of a clique in the leadership?

Mr. Rooker: My hon. Friend is right. I suspect that later today right hon. and hon. Members will quite rightly hear a lot more about what is happening in Bradford. I am not an expert on Bradford, but I understand that at one time there was a move to replace the lord mayor with an elected chairman of the council, and that that move came from my own party, but the Tories in Bradford said, "You cannot do that. You will bring the chief citizen of the city into political arguments day after day." The Tories used that argument when we wanted an elected chairman, but if we look at what is happening in Bradford today, it is clear that the mayor is taking all the decisions.

Mr. Patnick: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. The lord mayor of Sheffield has been in the Labour party for the past six years and looks like staying there for ever more.

Mr. Rooker: The hon. Gentleman can make his own speech.

The Minister did not mention one aspect of local government, and that is that quality local government, and confident local government, enlarges the power that people have over their own lives. We have to make the point again and again. Whether it is putting pressure on the Government—a legitimate activity so far as I am aware —working with local employers, or expresaing local concerns, it is providing an infrastructure for our lives and dividing power so that it is shared more equally than it would be if it resided at the centre.

Although it is on record that the Prime Minister wants to snuff out a political party that happens to have a greater share of local power in our unitary state than the central governing party—she is on record as wishing to snuff out the Labour party and she has made that quite clear—I am not sure whether the Cabinet is aware of the profound constitutional dangers in further weakening local government.

Whether we have local government or local agencies, we cannot all have a library in our home, we cannot build and maintain the road outside our home, and we cannot all be personal fire fighters, teachers, home helps, drain cleaners, plumbers and refuse collectors. However, we can do all those vital activities as a community or, dare I say, as a society. We do not need all the services all the time. The key is to make the connection between benefit to the individual and the family so that it is there when required and should not be dependent upon being rich, which is what the Government are setting out to achieve. We are a much healthier and much richer society when we club together to provide what we could not achieve as individuals.

Contrary to what Ministers say, local government is about local differences—the difference between a Lakeland district and a London borough, the difference between rural villages and urban villages. Such differences in our society have to be taken into account.

To Ministers, accountability means doing what they say, but accountability should reside at the ballot box, not in ministerial declarations. I regret that there are two snags. First, the new Minister for Local Government considers the right to vote as being purchased by taxation. He sees no alternative to the point that he made in a speech in Norfolk earlier this month—I do not usually use these words, but I shall quote him—when he said:

"The community charge will provide a 'ready reckoner' so that when each charge payer votes in local elections he will cast that vote not only responsibly"

—he emphasised "responsibly"—

"because he is making a contribution towards the cost of local services".

In other words, if one does not make a contribution towards the cost of local services, one's vote cannot be a responsible vote. I do not think that such an attitude should be expressed by a Minister for Local Government.

Mr. Gummer: If I had said that the hon. Gentleman would be quite right, but he failed to quote the rest of the speech. I said that every individual should be given the means to pay the community charge, that 9 million people —a quarter of the electorate—would be given that means and that that was why the Labour party hated calling it a community charge and insisted upon mis-calling it a poll tax. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to quote, he must quote correctly.

Mr. Rooker: I quoted word for word the beginning of the paragraph on the last page of the Department of the Environment's press release on 7 October. The rest of it was packed full of half truths about the poll tax, as I said in a speech in Croydon recently, where they believed me to such an extent that in the by-election in the Bensham Manor ward last week, in which the poll tax was the key issue, Labour not only gained 65 per cent. of the votes, but there was a 12 per cent. swing to Labour, after the voters had been told the other half of the truth.

My second point about accountability is more important than the Minister's speech, because the ballot box is more important. Our rightful complaint is that the Government have deprived the constituents of my hon. Friends and of one or two Conservative hon. Members in the metropolitan districts of the right to vote in 1989. It will be a vote-free year because the Government have refused to return to the big cities the annual vote that they lost by the abolition of the metropolitan counties. We vote every year in the big cities. It is a much more effective form of democracy than to vote every four years, whether it be in London or the shire counties. We are prepared to live or die politically by the ballot box. The Government do not believe in that, or they would have restored the right of the people in Bradford, Birmingham and other large cities to vote for or against their council in 1989. They would also have introduced annual elections in London—something that they have avoided.

When the Bill was published the Minister spent some time dealing with creative accountancy. We should note that he did not call it illegal accounting, but creative accounting, the Government's term. People would think that that was exclusive to Labour-controlled local authorities. That is not the case. I saw the leader of a Conservative council being interviewed on television and he was boasting about a project and admitted that it had been carried out legally by accountancy techniques used in industry every day.

The more we learn about what happens in the local council in which the House of Commons resides, the less we are willing to take lectures from Tory Ministers. The freehold of the Conservative party's headquarters was purchased from Westminster council in 1981 for £1·3 million and was sold in 1983 for £3·7 million, against the advice of the director of property of Westminster council. It was sold at a profit to the Tory party of £2·4 million and a loss to the ratepayers of £2·4 million. I do not know whether the sale took place early in 1983 or later in the year when the Minister was the chairman of the Conservative party. I know that the Conservative party and Westminster council conspired to deprive the ratepayers of Westminster of £2·4 million, and for that reason we will take no lectures on accounting from the Government.

5.2 pm

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Sheffield, Hallam): The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) made an interesting speech.

The Bill is divided into four parts—the rate support closedown, how the closedown will take place, the control of creative accounting and the rate support grant settlement for 1989-90. The Bill details all that and I am pleased to see that the aggregate Exchequer grant for 1989-90 has been set at £13·575 billion. That is a £1·1 billion increase on the grant being paid for 1988-89. It allows for the change in the funding for polytechnics and is a 9 per cent. increase in the amount of grant to be paid out this year. I am also pleased to see that £110 million is being provided in respect of the extra cost that the local authorities will incur in preparing for the community charge. That is in line with the estimate of the cost involved by Price Waterhouse and is consistent with the figures put forward by the local authorities.

I was distressed that my right hon. Friend the Minister would not let me bear gifts. I understand that the 7 July deadline, which gave three months' notice to local authorities, was met by all local authorities, except two.

I listened to the challenge to my right hon. Friend the Minister by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). I shall read the litany of Newham. The "Labour councillor, Mr. John Wilson, has resigned from the Council. He claimed that free speech in the all-Labour council was stifled, and compared his colleagues' behaviour to 'Hitler's Fascist State.'"

That was reported in the Newham Recorder on 18 December 1986.

Mr. Cryer: What about Sheffield?

Mr. Patnick: I shall come to Sheffield.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Patnick: I am sorry but I will not. The hon. Member for Perry Barr gave way to me only once and has refused to give way before.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. The hon. Gentleman has made it clear that he does not intend to give way at this time.

Mr. Patnick: I will give way when I finish the litany of hate. It continues:

"The Council has refused to run an advertisement for the Metropolitan Police's major anti-racial harassment campaign on the grounds that it was 'patronising' and a 'cosmetic gesture.'"

That was reported in The Daily Telegraph on 16 January and the Newham Recorder on 15 January 1987.

"The Council has added 'Count Zeppelin' to a list of approved names for local buildings and streets. East London suffered badly from bombs dropped by Zeppelins in the First World War."

That was reported in the Evening Standard in February 1987.

Newham's auditors, the same auditors who found the £110 million that will be used to implement the community charge—Arthur Young International—

"have called for urgent action to stop 'needless' waste of cash in Newham's education system. Two years ago the auditors said that the council was wasting £250,000 each year by failing to reorganise senior schools in order to match the places available with the lower level of demand. The report states: 'Continued delays in matching provision to need are giving rise to additional and needless cost while also leading to under-achievement.'"

That was reported in the Newham Recorder in February 1987.

"A Government report shows that Newham has the second highest percentage of empty council homes in the country. 2,420 council homes are empty, 7·8 per cent. of the stock."

That was reported in the Newham Recorder in February 1987.

Mr. Heffer: Why?

Mr. Patnick: On 12 February 1987 the Newham Recorder said:

"The Labour Council leader, Councillor Fred Jones, has called the Newham Chamber of Commerce 'fifth columnists' for allegedly undermining the Council's campaign against ratecapping. Councillor Jones has written to the Chamber 'we have been repaid by betrayal' and presumably he is referring to last year's 13 per cent. rate increase, the highest in London."

Mr. Heffer: Why does the hon. Gentleman not talk about the other side of the fence?

Mr. Patnick: Does the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) wish to intervene?

Mr. Heffer: Yes. The hon. Gentleman spoke about what is happening to repairs and so on in Newham. It can apply to Liverpool or elsewhere. Government Front Bench spokesmen have admitted that the Government have taken millions of pounds away from local authorities. That is why local authorities are in that position. The hon. Gentleman does not give that side of the story—[Interruption.]

Mr. Patnick: The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) enjoys making seated interventions, but it is very rare for him to stand and make his comments.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough) rose——

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Patnick: I will not give way.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) giving way to anyone at this time?

Mr. Patnick: I will give way when I have finished dealing with Newham.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman said that he will give way when he has finished this section of his speech.

Mr. Patnick: Thank you for your protection, Madam Deputy Speaker.

On 7 September 1987 the Evening Standard said that the "Residents of a Council block were refused a £200 grant by the Council because the tenants' account is banked with Barclays Bank."

In December 1987 The Guardian reported:

"The council advertised last December for a Senior Women's Equality Officer at a salary of £15,000. The job involves working within the Women's Equality Unit, 'raising the profile of women's equality' and 'encouraging and supporting women's groups and activities.'"

I apologise to the House for this list. I ceased being a member of Sheffield city council in May this year. Until the beginning of January these little snippets of information allowed me to place the antics of Sheffield in the scale of what I would call the oddball things that happen. In that regard, Newham was always ahead of Sheffield by an average that I could never work out.

I shall give a quotation from the bible of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks)—The Guardian of 20 January 1988. It states:

"Newham council has advertised for a Race Equality Research Officer who must have 'a knowledge of racial disadvantage in housing' and for a Central Race Equality Officer who must display 'a knowledge of discrimination and racial harassment'. Both posts carry salaries in excess of £22,000 a year."

Mr. Tony Banks: I cannot understand why the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) is spending so much of his speech talking about the London borough of Newham when he should be concerning himself with Sheffield. I am touched that he should show so much concern, but inadvertently he has misled the House a number of times and has hardly been quoting from impartial sources. I cannot answer all his points because I do not have sufficient time in this intervention, but I shall write to the hon. Gentleman. I shall have to consider carefully my involvement with the Newham chamber of commerce—I am having dinner there next week—and perhaps I should not have gone to Barclays bank to open the business centre. If Newham council is so bad, why does the hon. Gentleman think that there are 59 Labour councillors and one Social Democratic party councillor? It is a Tory-free zone. Last week, the Labour party won two by-elections. The Tories do not stand a chance in Newham, yet the Labour party receives massive support. If what the hon. Gentleman says is true—he must know that it is not—why does he think that the people of Newham give the Labour party so much support?

Mr. Patnick: The hon. Member for Newham, North-West is quite wrong. I am giving examples of what Newham council has done. I do not recollect hearing any retraction concerning these allegations since I have been in the House.

Mr. Flannery: The hon. Gentleman has traduced Sheffield city council. He belongs to a minority party in Sheffield, which is routed and defeated every year. It held power only once, in 1926. The hon. Gentleman fought its transport policy tooth and nail, but every year the Labour party's vote increased. The hon. Gentleman has a nerve denouncing his own council when his party is defeated every year.

Mr. Patnick: I wonder whether the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) could be given a hearing aid. I have been reciting the litany of Newham council's activities; I have not mentioned Sheffield, Bradford or any other areas. I thank the hon. Member for Hillsborough for his help and assistance.

The 1986 manifesto of Sheffield district Labour party, which is larger than the Conservative party manifesto about which everyone keeps arguing——

Mr. Heffer: Read it out.

Mr. Patnick: I shall do so, if hon. Members wish.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Patnick: Thank you for your protection, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The hon. Member for Perry Barr will have heard before the quotation that I am about to give from the manifesto, but, sadly, the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) is not present. The front page of the manifesto says:

"The best local government is superb and private enterprise could never improve on it, with Sheffield a shining example."

John Banham made those remarks, and in Sheffield city council's inimitable manner it gives him as the chairman of the Audit Commission in 1985.

It is worthy of note that some local authorities have indulged in creative accounting and other activities. Some decided to fund a Left-wing newspaper, the News on Sunday. Manchester city council gave it £268,000, Southwark £250,000, Brent £250,000, Islington £250,000 and Derbyshire council also contributed. Ratepayers' cash was given to an enterprise that failed completely.

Rent arrears in those wonderfully run organisations are running high. Manchester city council's rent arrears are £5 million—10 per cent. of its rents are uncollected. For Haringey, the figure is 28 per cent., or £5·6 million, for Southwark it is £24 million, for Islington it is £6 million and for Camden it is £7 million.

My right hon. Friend the Minister referred to deferred loans. Manchester city council has £100 million of deferred loans, Islington has £74 million, Camden has £100 million and, for the benefit of the hon. Member for Hillsborough, let me say that Sheffield has £110 million. Its repayments were due to start three years from the start of the loan, which was for seven years. The cost of repaying that loan is £175 million. The bank that is involved is the Banque

Bradford city council spends money on things that I can describe only as odd. Mr. Pickles—everybody seems to think that he arrived on the scene yesterday afternoon—has been chairman of Bradford education committee for some time. The hon. Member for Hillsborough remarked on the fares policy. When I sought advice about that policy from the Conservative party, it was not forthcoming, as, I imagine, advice has not been forthcoming for the leader of Bradford city council. Bradford city council told the electorate what it intended to do and has implemented its policy. I remind those who have the temerity and cheek to remark on the lord mayor using his casting vote of the time when the Labour party and Conservative party had parity on Sheffield city council.

Mr. Flannery: When was that?

Mr. Patnick: It was in 1968, comrade. At that time, the lord mayor of Sheffield city council had a casting vote. The hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) was chief whip of the Labour group. It operated the ultimate fiddle to maintain control of that council. The city had 27 aldermen, but if the Conservatives had been given the correct number of aldermen it would have remained in control of the city. The hon. Member for Bassetlaw did a fantastic job by granting the Tories three aldermen, and keeping the remaining 24 for the Labour party.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. This is all very interesting, but it does not relate to the Bill. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman could relate his remarks to the Bill.

Mr. Patnick: With respect, Madam Deputy Speaker, it is related to the Bill because we are discussing creative accounting——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am not getting into an argument with the hon. Gentleman. He is not relating his remarks to the Bill, and I am asking him to do so.

Mr. Flannery: The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) should put his notes away and get on with his speech.

Mr. Patnick: That is more than the hon. Member for Hillsborough has done since I have been in Parliament.

Under the community charge, more than half the households will be better off, four out of five single pensioners will be better off and nearly nine out of 10 one-parent families will be better off. Almost everybody pays. That means that the poorest can pay less. Four million people will pay only 20 per cent., and even get help with that, and 5 million more people will pay a reduced charge. More than one quarter of local voters will get help with their bills. They will all contribute something to the cost of their local council, so everyone will know how well this money is spent. On every community charge bill they will see how much they have to pay, and next to it what they could pay if there was a sensible council providing a reasonable service. People will know whether they are properly governed. There will be accountable councils and responsible voters.

I have referred to the Labour party's 1986 manifesto for Sheffield. The council summons for the business to be debated on Wednesday contains a notice of motion, which states:

"That, in view of the continuing hardship and distress caused to Sheffield tenants and home owners by the backlog, delays and errors in administering housing benefit" the council will have to take certain action.

Money would be available if Sheffield city council made savings. I shall quote the report by the district auditor—believe it or not—which was issued on 31 December 1987.

Mr. Tony Banks: Oh, no.

Mr. Patnick: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman knows that I served my time in the guerilla trenches of south Yorkshire and Sheffield. His remarks do not worry me. I shall make the speech that I intended to make.

The district auditor's report said that a saving of £600,000 a year could be made on the cleaning and caretaking of schools. Referring to the cost of £12 million for heating and lighting the council's premises, the district auditor said that, despite the savings achieved, further savings were possible and that, using a 25 per cent. national figure, the council could save £1 million. He told the council to reduce its stockholding by £500,000 and to save £150,000 on overheads.

The works department spends £40 million a year on supplies and its running costs exceed £1 million. The district auditor said that vehicle fleet management could be improved and a saving of £400,000 made and that the fleet size could be reduced by six vehicles. On maintenance, the council was over target by 50 per cent. and could save £90,000. An amount of £125 million was collected in rates income, and the auditor identified possible savings of £1·75 million on rates collection, mortgage advances and off-street parking. On the sundries deficit of £37 million, the auditor identified room for a saving of £50,000 and possibly a further saving of £180,000.

Why is Sheffield city council involved in skip hire, window cleaning and municipal funeral services? [Interruption.] It is all very well for the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) to create a diversion, but those are the savings that Sheffield could make, without creative accountancy.

Sheffield city council always screams about Government grants. On 44 claims with a total grant of £100 million, the council could have saved £323,000 if the claims had been submitted within 60 days of the period to which they related. The direct labour organisation gets £10 million for housing repairs, yet there was an overpayment of bonus costs of £200,000 a year, with 15 per cent. overclaimed in housing costs.

The authority's magazine says that it is worried about sickness and absence, which costs £1 million a year. If this were controlled, £400,000 a year could be saved. If the council could restore levels of performance to those of two years ago, a saving of £300,000 on incentive bonuses could be made. The council's manpower has increased by 2,500 full-time workers, or 12 per cent. and by 1,500 part-time workers, or 15 per cent.

When the report was published, the works department said that it revealed a total loss of £1·2 million last year. The report gave this warning:

"Severe financial and competitive pressure in the department has been caused by a combination of legislation, forcing the department to compete for tender with the private sector."

Rent arrears were £9·1 million in March 1985 and £8·5 million in July 1987. This cost the city £900,000 in interest.

The district auditor—not Conservative central office—identified possible savings of £6·793 million. But all was not lost. Sheffield city council's treasurer issued to the council a report on revenue budgets. That was a new approach for 1988-89, which was approved by the council. The Treasurer said that he would set a cash limit on the council's total expenditure for each of the next three years in advance of the preparation of detailed budgets. He said that he would give each committee a cash allocation for 1988-89, together with guideline allocations for 1989-90 and 1990-91, which would require the committees to absorb inflation and growth.

The treasurer introduced an incentive procedure whereby committees could find ways of increasing their cash limits and reinvest the money in service provision. He said:

"The impact in future years will be important and subsequent cash limits must not be exceeded."

The treasurer introduced a holdback procedure whereby a sum of money over and above the cash limits to which he had already referred would be set aside each year and distributed to committees. He introduced a direct link between the service delivery plans and the revenue budgets, with a built-in process of review, and gave the opportunity to introduce activity budgets linked to spending. We call that rate capping. The treasurer turned the system round and said, "This is what Sheffield intends to do."

My litany is not one just of gloom. In Sheffield there is now £1·3 billion of private enterprise investment and a development is taking place which will be the pride of England. The Opposition say that no savings can be made in local government.

Dr. Lewis Moonie (Kirkcaldy): Who said that?

Mr. Patnick: The hon. Member for Perry Barr said it. He pointed out where the South Yorkshire police authority was short of money. Sheffield city council is short of £3·7 million. There is still fat on the bones of Sheffield city council, despite all the hard work it has done to come into the 20th century. I am proud to have been a member of Sheffield city council. Despite the comments by the hon. Member for Hillsborough, I am proud to have been a member of South Yorkshire county council. It is a matter of record that that council collected £1 billion from ratepayers and spent £500 million on fare subsidies. The police were short of accommodation and highways were disintegrating. Spending by other services was needed and could have been achieved if the council had not otherwise used the money.

I am proud to have been a member of Sheffield city council for 20 years. Sheffield is a great place in which to live and I recommend it to anyone.

Mr. Cryer: It is under Labour control.

Mr. Patnick: It is under Labour control, as the MEP for Sheffield keeps reminding us. I often wonder what the people of Sheffield are getting out of Europe when the hon. Gentleman is sitting in this Chamber. Nevertheless, he wears two hats, one representing Bradford and the other Sheffield, but I suppose that both places are in the north of England.

I repeat that I am proud to have been a Sheffield city councillor for 20 years. Sheffield is a wonderful place to live and for people to come to, but economies could be made in the council's budget, as the district auditor has made clear—and if those economies can be made in Sheffield, they can also be made elsewhere.

5.30 pm

Mr. Pat Wall (Bradford, North): When I spoke in the debate on rate support grant at the beginning of December last year I used a quotation from Howard Davies, controller of the Audit Commission, pointing out that if all the Government's privatisation plans affecting local government were put into operation it would mean a reduction in local government expenditure of approximately one third and a loss of jobs in local government which I put at about 500,000 and Howard Davies estimated at more than 700,000, at least 50 per cent. of whom would not get their jobs back in the private firms taking over services from local authorities. Even a month ago I did not expect to come here today with such a graphic example of that, but Bradford council is now attempting to carry out—on the basis of the mayor's casting vote, known as "one person, two votes"—a programme that has in no sense been put to the people of Bradford and which will mean devastation not just for employment but for services in the city.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch) rose——

Mr. Wall: I shall not give way at this stage.

That programme includes the announcement of 9,000 redundancies. We are told that it means only 2,600 full-time jobs but for the employees involved it means 9,000 jobs—in a city with 25,000 unemployed people and staff shortages at benefit offices and DHSS offices dealing with existing cases. Cuts of £2·6 million are planned for next year, and cuts of £5·8 million in total, with a £687,000 cut in environmental employment, and there are plans to close the benefit shops in Bradford, which deal with 55,000 cases per year. The excuse is that the council cannot deal with DHSS queries, but only people who have never been unemployed and have never tried to fill up a DHSS form claiming benefit could be unaware of the enormous difficulty that many people have in filling up such forms and appealing against decisions. In Bradford, 55,000 people come to the benefit shops every year, to say nothing of those who consult Members of Parliament, councillors and voluntary organisations in the city.

The council is talking about increasing charges for car parking and cemeteries, and cutting standby road gritting. Cuts of £3½ million are proposed, in education, with school meals going up by one third to 80p, and creches being cut or scrapped. There will also be cuts in teaching jobs and in school repairs, although a third of our schools were built before 1906 and we have one of the worst backlogs in school repairs of any city in Britain. Moreover, unlike most cities that have falling school rolls, the number of children entering our schools is increasing. There are calls for the scrapping of special books and equipment for inner city schools, although Bradford is one of Britain's most deprived cities, with a large immigrant population, and, like Leeds, historically has had one of the worst capitation figures in Britain for expenditure on books.

The council is taking £367,000 out of museums and libraries, increasing charges at sports centres and swimming baths and cutting jobs in outdoor recreation. Sports centres are being sold off, as is the historic and beautiful St. Ives estate, which was given to the people of Bingley by the Ferrands family in the 1920s for community and public use. There are to be cuts of £832,000 in social services, and 15 old people's homes are to be sold off. How can any Tory Member maintain that services will be better than those provided by local authorites when the people taking over have to make a profit, which can be achieved only by cuts in services to the old people or reductions in staff wages?

Sir Marcus Fox (Shipley) rose——

Mr. Wall: I see that the hon. Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fox) has arrived. He knows the result of that process in relation to hospital cleaning. As a result of privatisation, the lowest paid in our community, many of them battling against enormous social problems, had to bargain down their pitiful wages to get their own jobs back. Let no one talk about morality, decency and family life in that situation.

Sir Marcus Fox: Will the hon. Gentleman give way as he has mentioned me?

Mr. Wall: I shall sit down in a minute. The hon. Gentleman has only just come in.

Bolton house was renovated by the ratepayers of Bradford at a cost of nearly £1 million—a heart-warming example of renovation and refurbishment for residents and staff—but it is now being put up for sale to private interests. A £1 home help charge is being introduced, and meals on wheels are going up from 49p to 60p. There are to be further cuts in housing and the environment of £170,000, cuts in emergency accommodation for the homeless and cuts in action against employers under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act. All those measures will directly hit working people, the young homeless and other problems in the city. In central administration, £380,000 is being saved by cutting 109 jobs immediately.

Sir Marcus Fox: If the Labour party had remained in control in Bradford, the 15 homes that the hon. Gentleman says should not be privatised would have required between £10 million and £15 million expenditure to bring them up to standard. What would the hon. Gentleman have done about that?

Mr. Wall: The standards in a privatised home in London were reported in the newspapers recently—40 residents got two chickens between them and one and a half sprouts each. That is how the savings are made. In fact, the Labour council in Bradford had plans to refurbish two more old people's homes this year as part of a rolling programme, and if the results are half as good as they were at Bolton house and Peel house they will be a proud memorial to the Labour council and good for the old people of the city.

Mr. Cryer: The hon. Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fox) has reservations about the subject. In our local newspaper he rightly expressed concern about old people who are to be sold off lock, stock and barrel like so many cattle to profiteering friends of the Conservative party. The hon. Gentleman is trying to ride two horses at once—locally he expresses concern about the deplorable standards caused by private exploitation and ownership, but here in the House he tries to make out that everything will be all right.

Mr. Wall: I support my hon. Friend's views. I could refer to privatised homes not that far from the constituency of the hon. Member for Shipley, but this debate is about local government expenditure and services.

The leader of Bradford council has a rather mysterious job. No one knows where he is employed, who employs him or what his legal qualifications are. Rumours have abounded during the past three or four weeks. One was that the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) was in town last Tuesday when the council was about to debate the cuts package. Although, unfortunately, the Conservative proposals were agreed to at that meeting, the right hon. Member for Chingford actually got no further than Leeds, where he was signing copies of his book. That seems to be a priority activity for far too many politicians.

It is unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman found time to appear on television and refer to Bradford. He said:

"Councils cannot be an employer of people just because they are there."

He also said:

"Bradford people deserve to get their services at the right price and they should not be rooked by people who have been rooking them for years."

I have been careful to get the quotes correct. I even looked at the video of the television programme this morning. The right hon. Gentleman has interfered in Bradford matters before. During the general election I and my fellow Labour candidates in Bradford found our pictures on Conservative advertisements. The House will remember that the right hon. Gentleman was chairman of the Conservative party at that time. The advertisements attributed to me a quote that not only did not belong to me, but was a summary of someone's views as reported by the Journalist, that someone being my opponent in a debate. I am being careful to quote correctly the right hon. Gentleman's words, whereas he was not so careful about the quotes that he used during the general election campaign.

Mr. Patnick: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. During my speech you ruled that I was straying from the subject matter and I immediately returned to it. I do not think that the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Wall) has yet come anywhere near the subject matter.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman was straying for some time before I called him to order.

Mr. Wall: The right hon. Member for Chingford implied that lower prices for Bradford people would result from privatisation, but what has actually happened? There has been an average increase of £3 in council house rents, with further increases to come in March. Are not council tenants the people of Bradford? There are increased costs for users of sports centres, swimming pools and leisure facilities. Are not those users the people of Bradford? Schoolchildren will have to pay another one third for school meals. Are they not part of the population of Bradford? Old people will have to pay more for meals on wheels, and the sick and the disabled more for home helps. Are they not the people of Bradford?

The crux of the matter is that the Bill is designed to cut expenditure and to put a burden on the backs of the poor, the children, the council house tenant and the young people who wish to use art, sport and leisure facilities. As the late Earl of Stockton said, we are selling off the family silver to amass capital to reduce the poll tax charge. It is a political move that will benefit the wealthier sections of Bradford at the expense of the poorest in our community.

The right hon. Member for Chingford implied that people have no right to be employed. A deprived town needs more services. What is wrong with the Government's local government policy, especially the poll tax, is that Government expenditure is calculated on a capitation basis. The problems of East Anglia and the Thames valley are nowhere near as great as those of Glasgow, Newcastle, Birmingham, Liverpool and Bradford. The people who supply the services in our cities are necessary, but they are easy targets for the Conservative party. People working in local government, the Inland Revenue and the DHSS have families, just as we have families. They live next door to us, go to the supermarket and the church with us and have a drink with us at the local pub. Their children play football with our children. Those 9,000 jobs in Bradford, even if most of them are part time, are important. Unemployment is just as real for them as it was for the textile and engineering workers who lost their jobs in tens of thousands after 1975 because of the recessions in Bradford.

Part of the Government's so-called economic miracle is the movement of large numbers of people to part-time employment. Their jobs are important to them and form part of their standard of living. The loss of their jobs will be devastating for them. The Labour party must support the part-time workers so that they can have proportional rates of pay with full-time employees and full employment, pension, health and welfare rights. Their jobs are just as important as full-time jobs.

Bradford is a proud town, but it has real problems. There is a £130 million backlog in housing repair. Bradford has the worst health record in Britain, with the highest rate of infant mortality. A girl born in Bradford has two years less life expectancy than average, and a middle-aged man has three times more chance of a heart attack than someone living in the more prosperous south-east. There are 10,000 people on the housing waiting list, and it has the lowest wage rates of any town in Britain. Bradford needs services; it does not need to be attacked by its Conservative council. Was a £3 rent increase outlined in its Conservative manifesto? Were cuts of £5 million included? Did it refer to the sacking of 9,000 people? What about the additional charges for meals on wheels? Was that contained in the manifesto? Of course none of those was in the manifesto. They form part of a secret manifesto brought from Smith square by the Tory party's messenger boy who parades as leader of the city council.

There has been a great deal of talk from Conservatives about trendy, lunatic Lefties in local councils. I can only say that neither I nor my hon. Friends the Members for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) and for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) have been accused of being trendy, either sartorially, socially or politically—although we have been accused of many other things. I have spoken politically and publicly against the danger of developing a positive discrimination that makes working men feel that, somehow, they are responsible for all the horrors of the British empire, colonialism and the slave trade.

There are real problems. Some people's small excesses do not deny the real problems. Three quarters of the people in this country who are underpaid according to the Common Market's level of decent wages are women. Women are poorly represented at any of the higher levels of society, including Parliament. Our wives, daughters and sisters do not have the same opportunities as men. Therefore, local authorities are quite right to make efforts to find a better life and position for women in general.

In Bradford, where about one quarter of the population are Asian, we have special language and social deprivation problems that need to be tackled by the council. One of the most shameful things that has happened in Bradford is that grants to 25 local organisations have been cut. After public pressure, the council managed to find enough money for 22 of them until March of next year. The three organisations that were left out were one Pakistani organisation and two Bengali organisations. Bradford is composed of Bangladeshis.

A few weeks ago I had a small housing surgery with the Bangladeshi Youth Organisation. Seven people came in. They were denied improvement grants by the city of Bradford during the freeze that was carried out by the Conservative administration. Those people did not want fancy bathrooms or kitchens. They had holes in their roofs, collapsed ceilings, doors that did not fasten, and windows that let the wind and rain pour through. They were denied grants. That shows the meanness, spitefulness and anti-working class approach of the Bradford council.

In conclusion, I thank Eric Pickles. I spent 20 years trying to revitalise Bradford's enormous radical tradition as a pioneering town. We are the town of education, of Foster and Margaret Macmillan. We are the town that saw the early birth and development of the trade union movement. We are the city in which the independent Labour party was founded—the forerunner of the modern Labour party. In some ways we have strayed from those traditions, but after the mass demonstration outside Bradford town hall, the enormous upheaval of community spirit, and the demand for community action, we shall come to praise Eric Pickles for refounding Bradford as a centre not only of pioneering in the past but of Socialism today.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): When I first jotted down some thoughts about the Bill, I noted that it offers an almost irresistible temptation to redebate local government finance. Having listened to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) and, just a moment ago, the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Wall), I find that I need not have put the word "almost" in front of the word "irresistible". It has been amply demonstrated that the temptation is totally irresistible. I can understand why that is so, as the Bill relates to the winding-up of the current rate support grant system.

It is perfectly possible for anybody who has ever been connected with local government to wish the current system a fond farewell. I do not believe that anybody, whatever their party politics, will lament the end of an uncertain system or the end of uncertainty about the amount of money that they will get until several years after they spent it. They will not lament that they will no longer have a formula that they probably do not understand, and, even if they do understand it, that will be changed before it is put into effect. It is also perfectly possible to have such a debate about the new rate support grant system.

As the Bill paves the way towards that new RSG system —I was horrified to know that "RSG" will probably lurk with us even longer and mean something different, but perhaps we can debate that another time—it is perfectly possible to extol the virtues of paying grant as the basis of assessment of need rather than on the basis of somebody's expenditure. I can also understand why we could use the Bill as a means of debating all over again why it has become necessary to overhaul local government finance. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hallam said, it would enable all of us to deplore the tactics of the loony Left in local government and the fact that it has forced central Government to do what has been done. It could even force us, as the hon. Member for Bradford, North has done, to have a long discussion about Bradford, but I shall resist that temptation, except to point out that several things were omitted from his catalogue.

When the hon. Gentleman referred to the number of staff in Bradford who were no longer required, he did not point out that the overwhelming majority of the 2,500 jobs that will be lost will occur through natural wastage or redeployment. That is different from what is going on in Brent, where staff are simply being got rid off. There was no reference to the fact that some of the staff who are leaving Bradford are peace officers and anti-nuclear people —and the quicker they go the better. No reference was made to some of the so-called services that are to be affected. The fact that the women's committee will disappear is a good thing, not something that we should regret. We should applaud the fact that peace studies are likely to be scrapped. It is not something about which we should wring our hands. The fact that no longer will £15,000 be spent on anti-apartheid weeks in Bradford must be a good thing, and not a loss of services. No longer will Bradford fly terrorist flags in the shape of SWAPO and ANC flags. That is not something that the people of Bradford will regret.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): In recent days the hon. Gentleman has taken a keen interest in Bradford. He has tabled an amendment to that which was tabled by my hon. Friend's the Members for Bradford, North (Mr. Wall) and for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer). In his list of committees that have been abolished, he omitted reference to the health advisory committee and the race relations committee. Does he commend the abolition of such committees with the same enthusiasm with which he supports the abolition of other committees?

Mr. Wilshire: I have no doubt that Opposition Members and Conservative Members will produce their own lists. I have produced my list. The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) will make his speech later. Hon. Members have demonstrated that there is almost endless scope for a political kick-about based on the Bill. It will probably come as a great relief to those Opposition Members whose blood pressure usually goes up when I speak about local government to know that most of what I shall say will not be at that level.

On an occasion such as this, we could usefully take the facts of local government life as read and, for a moment or two as we discuss the Bill, accept that the old RSG system is operating whether we like it or not. We should equally accept that the Local Government Finance Act is with us and will be implemented. Given those facts of life, we must now wind up one system and make it possible to introduce the other.

We must say whether the Bill is the best way of achieving that transition. To answer that question, we must first establish whether we know exactly what a good, smooth transition period needs. Before 1990, we need a simple system—a system that is certain and, therefore, will not divert the time of officers and councillors in racking their brains about what to do in the years leading up to 1990 but will allow them to concentrate on bringing in the new system. For the next few years, we need a clear-cut system. We cannot possibly contemplate a system that will drag on for two, three, or four years after 1990, as the current system does, so that officers and councillors will not only try to appraise the effect of the new method of collecting money but will agonise about whether they have got the figures for the previous years right.

Above all else, any transitional system must make it sure that neither side—neither central Government nor local government—can manipulate what goes on, as that would divert people from what they need to do. The current RSG system fails that test in every respect. If we continued with anything remotely like it, we would still have a complex system leading up to 1990. If we continued with what we have, we would have a highly variable system. For this year and next, we probably would not know where we stood until it was too late. If major changes are not made now, we will probably have to take retrospective action for years after 1990.

Not to put too fine a point on it, central Government of both political colours, and over many years, have a record of tinkering regularly with the rate support grant. When the Bill is enacted, there will no longer be that temptation. Local authorities of all political persuasions, not only Labour-controlled authorities, have a legendary reputation for creative accounting. The current system cannot be continued for the final two years. We must opt for an entirely different approach in bringing the transition into effect.

How does the Bill pass the various tests and how does it match the requirements that will lead to the easiest possible transition? Above all, the Bill will break the link, once and for all, between grant and spending. That must be the best news of all. The Bill proposes a system that will be simple, although it might be seen as slightly arbitrary. It proposes a system that will be certain for this year and for next. It proposes amounts that can be fixed so that central Government cannot tinker with them. The Bill's provisions block any possibility of local government entering into creative accounting to try to take advantage of the transitional period.

The Bill passes the relevant tests extremely well. Therefore, it has my entire support. However, I wish to draw attention to a number of issues that arise from the transitional period. In closing off the years 1985 to 1988 and taking 7 July as the relevant date, it seems that the Government might be taking a fairly arbitrary approach. I accept, of course, that some date had to be taken, and I judge that ample notice was given. That the proposal is reasonable is borne out by the fact that all but two councils have found it possible to co-operate. None of the councils affected by the proposals has complained especially vigorously.

I am concerned that some councils, in having to settle for interim figures, will face a potential loss of grant. That loss is likely to be at its maximum during 1987-88. Outturn figures are often the lowest of all figures when it comes to assessing grant over a number of years. However, we can live with that potential loss of grant because there is scope in what will follow to claw back some of the potential loss. The House will appreciate that there could be an over-assessment.

The issue arising in the current year—the year in which local government now finds itself—equates mainly with good news. The use of budget figures must be the best news in the current year. It means that for this year there will be no penalty for overspending. There will be no likelihood of a reduction in grant when there are variations in expenditure. The absence of penalties and any possibility of clawback will go a long way to offset any losses and any criticism that is directed to the years before the current one.

I have a personal concern which I hope my hon. Friend the Minister will comment upon when she replies. In all settlement assessments made by the Department of the Environment and local government at the earliest stages, there is always a great risk that some of the assumptions will be wrong. Later adjustments have always been the mechanism for putting right the assumptions. If it transpires that there is something tremendously wrong and that a real clanger has been dropped that no one could have foreseen, will the Minister be willing at some stage to address that? If experience teaches us something that is horrible, will the Government be prepared to take action?

The issues are especially relevant for the final year of the system, which will be 1988-89. To use the current budget and then to adjust it and uprate it by inflation plus is the fairest possible way of handling the problem. The way in which the budget will be uprated, by what will amount to 9 per cent., seems extremely fair. It should mean that local government can go through the last year of the current financial regime without all the time having to rack its brains about the current year. It will thus be able to spend the maximum amount of time looking to the future. The proposed approach to uprating will provide a further chance for any council which has lost out through its accounts having been closed off too soon—as a result, it would have lost money in the previous years—to recoup moneys that might have been lost.

I accept that the adjustment that is being made for the introduction of the community charge seems to be sensible, for the amount is in line with what the Association of District Councils suggested. It is in line also with independent research and its findings. The formula, which means that half of the amount is arrived at by special calculation, meets the real worry of authorities that will have to introduce the charge in areas of high mobility. That formula has been devised in good faith in advance, but if certain councils find that the fairly rough-and-ready formula of taking the number of rented properties in the area as the only available measure to determine how mobile is the population has not been the best method of arriving at a conclusion and that an awful wrong has been committed, will the Government, in the light of experience, be prepared to consider making some adjustments to what they have proposed for the moment?

The House would do well to resist all the temptations that are before it and to refrain from mixing it politically, as it were. It would not be profitable to go over issues that we have argued about for hour upon hour on previous occasions. Let us accept the fact that the Local Government Finance Act 1988 is with us and that it will produce benefits for the entire country by 1990. I urge the House to keep its eye firmly on the practical issues that are raised by the Bill. If it does, it will be able to determine whether the Bill is the best way to handle the transition and whether it will produce the simplest and smoothest mechanism and the maximum time to prepare for the future. If the House takes local government as it is, I believe that it will be supporting a measure that will minimise hassle and produce the easiest possible way of introducing the changes that must be made. In that context, I urge Opposition Members, who normally bridle at such things, to swallow hard and to give the Bill a unanimous Second Reading.

6.8 pm

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): I cannot but start my comments by saying that I join those who have expressed regret that we should be debating the Bill during the parliamentary spill-over period. It is not an urgent Bill, nor is it uncontroversial. I regret that the Government have taken an almost unprecedented decision by introducing it to the House at this stage. It would have been better to have had a lengthier and more informed debate at the beginning of the new Session rather than a necessarily restricted debate during the brief interim period that we are passing through. Nevertheless, we are here and we have heard what the Minister has to say in trying to refute many of the criticisms of those who are concerned about the effect that the Bill will have on certain councils.

The Minister repeatedly told the House about what he saw as the deplorable cash management and mismanagement of a few councillors and councils throughout the country. He justified the impact of the Bill in those terms. I cannot believe that the Minister would say that the only councils to be hit by the Bill will be those which have mismanaged or have used their funds—ratepayers' funds—in what he would term a deplorable way. Surely he realises that many well-managed, honest and upright councils representing all political complexions will be hit by the rigidities of the proposed mechanism that he is introducing.

As the Minister said, it is helpful to know in advance exactly how much money will be received by a local authority. Unfortunately, many councils that have planned their budgets carefully will be jeopardised by the new method of setting the RSG because of the rigidities within the proposed mechanism and the way in which it will be introduced.

The Minister was right to criticise the present system. There is no party dispute about that and we all agree that the present complications cause great difficulties. However, simply to pick a random month in the summer and to project forward from then is no solution. It is merely yet another arbitrary decision on top of many other such decisions which have caused the present complications with the RSG.

The proposal takes away an element of flexibility and local control, and that is particularly damaging. I want to cite a local example of that. As many hon. Members will be aware, my district council, Carrick district council, had to deal with the problems caused by flooding a few weeks ago. No budget was set aside to cover that, but councillors locally and in Truro decided to put money aside to deal with the problem. By supplying drying machines to people who were terribly affected by the floods, they had to put aside money for which no allowance had been made. Under the proposed system as I understand it, the flexibility to take such local decisions will be greatly reduced because the financial impact of taking them will be increased greatly.

The position is made worse by the poll tax, because those elements of extra spending will hit the ratepayer four times harder than they might otherwise have done. If there is no possibility of RSG contributing towards that as it is adjusted in the light of councils' experience of natural disasters, for example, we will reduce councillors' abilities to respond to that type of local difficulty.

Mr. Gummer: I do not follow the hon. Gentleman. If the expenditure was greater than the expected budget, there might have been a penalty previously. Under the arrangements that we have presented now, that penalty will not take place. The hon. Gentleman's local authority in those circumstances, if they are as he presented them, should be better off. Taking one year with another across the board, we have tried to meet the concerns. However, the hon. Gentleman's worry is imagined.

Mr. Taylor: I do not believe that the Minister is correct in the case that I have cited. He misses the point that previously the council could have expected to get part of that money back through the rate support grant system in future years as the actual expenditure was accounted for. Under the poll tax, more of that expenditure which the council must deal with locally will multiply into poll tax and so hit the local ratepayer harder and harder.

Mr. Gummer: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman has got that quite right. If his local authority is sensible, as I am sure he thinks it is, he will find that, because of the new needs basis for grant, instead of it being penalised because other authorities have been big spenders and attracted more grant proportionately than perhaps they should have, his council will get a grant based on its needs.

[Mr. Gummer]

If the hon. Gentleman is talking about real needs, he will find that the grant meets those needs. The community charge can be charged at a standard rate around the country. I think that he will find that, under the community charge, because it is a community charge and not a poll tax—that is why I always argue the case—the effect is exactly the opposite. He should look at this again because it is important that we argue about things about which we disagree rather than about something upon which in the end he will agree with me.

Mr. Taylor: Obviously we cannot finalise the argument now. Perhaps we can take it up in correspondence. However, where councils have to deal with unexpected events and put aside money which was not planned for or could not have been planned for, councils will be hit harder in future rather than hit less hard, as the Minister suggests.

There is no dispute that some local authorities will be hit by the proposal and others will be windfall gainers. The explanatory memorandum to the Bill shows that the Government are not certain which way it will go. It states:

"As a result the aggregate amount of block grant payable for the years 1985-86 to 1989-90 may be more or less than if block grant entitlements were based on total expenditure."

As that is a move away from flexibility which would allow local decision makers a say in their budgeting, it is an interesting irony that there are changes happening at the moment in Bradford. There have been substantial changes in Bradford's policy over the past few days.

On 7 July 1988 Bradford was controlled by the Labour party. The Tories inherited the expenditure levels as of 7 July 1988, but are now undertaking massive changes of policy to make drastic cuts. The straitjacket that the Government are imposing, whatever the Tories in Bradford do from now on, however many cuts they make and whatever savings they make, means that they will receive the same amount of RSG. They will not receive back the RSG taken from them for previous overspending. They will be affected like some other councils about which we have already heard which will lose the advantages of previous expenditure cuts. In other words, Bradford will be penalised permanently by this Government for the Labour administration's decisions on expenditure, whatever cuts are made.

A noticeable part of this legislation is the increase in revenue that will accrue back to the Treasury. We have heard different figures for that. The Minister claimed that the reason for parts of the money aspects of the Bill was that the Government are afraid that they might not get money back and actually might put out more money. The fear remains—and this is the strong belief of people in local government to whom I have spoken—that, in effect, there will be a net outflow from local authorities of cash which has been built up over the years which they might expect to receive, but with the Treasury benefiting when the local authorities must accept extra costs associated with Government legislation, including the poll tax. Some local authorities could have expected reduced expenditure to bring back some of the extra grant that they have lost.

Both Wolverhampton and Merton reduced expenditure and believed that they would receive additional grants as a result. They have been two-timed by the Government. Wolverhampton expected £2 million additional grant from expenditure reductions in 1987-88 and 1988-89 which are now lost. Merton's final accounts incorporate expenditure reductions of £15 million for which no additional grant will be forthcoming.

Those are the kinds of problems and unfairnesses inflicted by the Bill's rigidity. Were the Government to have introduced this Bill after the Queen's Speech, we might have had more time to consult to ensure that such problems did not arise.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): Will the hon. Gentleman explain how tenants of GLC retirement homes were two-timed by the Liberal-controlled borough council which played politics rather than making progress and looking after people by turning its face against the purchase of GLC retirement homes on the Isle of Wight? As a result, those houses now belong to North British Housing Association and the rents are increasing considerably. Many Conservative-controlled district councils negotiated with the GLC and bought in the local GLC homes to the considerable advantage of the local population.

Mr. Taylor: I am amazed that the hon. Gentleman used GLC homes as an example of how the Government's policy is right. There are GLC homes in my constituency. The hon. Gentleman said that houses had been bought by a housing association. The pensioners in those properties are now suffering the consequences of massive rent increases. Had those homes stayed in the public sector, and had the London Residuary Body not sold them, that would not have happened. I receive a constant flow of pensioners who are bitter about the way in which the Government have let them down. They are bitter because the Government abolished the GLC, maintaining that that was power to the people as it would help them. Those pensioners now have to pick up the tab.

Mr. Madden: There have been many references made in this debate to Bradford. Does the hon. Gentleman know that Tories there are now saying to council tenants on the Lower Grange estate that they can have no hope of new council homes being built on that estate, which is something that they have been promised for many years? Those tenants have been given an ultimatum that they must either co-operate with a housing association in developing that estate or the houses will be allowed to become derelict and the land sold to private developers. That is the kind of Tory democracy that is now confronting tenants of a Bradford council estate: "Either you co-operate with a housing association or you will not have a new home in the foreseeable future."

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Member gives a good example of the way in which tenants are frightened by the implications of the Bill in terms of rent and the development of their properties. Those councils that would like to act are hamstrung by the kind of expenditure controls we are debating today.

Some authorities will lose while others will gain. The outcome will be arbitrary because the Bill's provisions are not sufficiently flexible and cannot meet local needs in the way that local authorities can respond to them. The Minister repeatedly defended his actions by giving the example of a small number of councils that were not exercising proper management. The Bill itself is not exercising proper management in Government terms in respect of the vast majority of councils that will be affected. Some of them will be hit by these proposals, while others may gain in an arbitrary way simply because those councils that have tried to work the Government system, to manage matters sensibly, to look to the future and create some stability, are having the rug pulled from under their feet now that a different system is being imposed upon them.

When the Secretary of State for the Environment made his announcement on 7 July, he stated that he proposed to set a level of 4·7 per cent. for next year's settlement for England. He said:

"That increase is slightly above the anticipated level of inflation."—[Official Report, 7 July 1988; Vol. 136, c. 1200.]

The country's "anticipated level of inflation" is rapidly changing and I understand that the Chancellor of the Exchequer may be coming to the House tomorrow to give the House an update. I use the word "update" advisedly. May the House be given a guarantee by Ministers that a degree of flexibility will be exercised by the Government in matching the needs of councils under a changing inflation rate?

What special efforts will the Government make in respect of the extra costs that central Government often impose on local authorities, which in turn increase their costs above the general rate of inflation? If account is not taken of that aspect, the Government's promise that the new system will be more helpful to local authorities, will more closely match their needs, and will give them a long-term ability to plan will not be fulfilled.

I look forward with interest to hearing the Minister's response at the end of this debate.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): I begin by apologising to my own and the Opposition Front Bench if I am slightly delayed in returning to hear the closing speeches. If I miss the beginning of them, I shall read those speeches in Hansard, and certainly my hon. Friend the Minister can be assured that I shall be joining her in the Lobby in support of the Government.

I welcome, however belatedly, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning to these rather arcane matters. I believe that this is his first local government Bill. He may well hope that it is his only local government Bill. Many of his predecessors thought the same, but over the years they found in practice a substantial chunk of legislation being introduced. I speak as someone who has served on not a few of the Standing Committees.

This is a promising measure. It is not as large as its putative dad—the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980—but it bears reasonable comparison with the Local Government Finance Act 1982, to which I shall also refer, because it has certain family links.

A wave of nostalgia started to come over me when I heard my right hon. Friend imply that this is a simple little measure. I turned immediately to page 14, schedule 2 to the Bill, where, in paragraph 4(3), the formula for arriving at expenditure levels is given:

"In the case of an authority which is a charging authority but is not an education authority the appropriate formula is—

$$(TE \times Z) + CC."$$

As experts in this kind of debate, we can all tell my right hon. Friend that we know such things off by heart, and that it is only the world outside which wrongly finds them a fraction confusing.

That was not the only element of nostalgia. For one moment in my right hon. Friend's speech, I thought that I detected phrases such as, "This is going to be a better system," and "This system will measure need as never before." I believe my right hon. Friend and that it will do so. However, I must utter a solemn warning. The last time that I can remember almost those exact words being uttered in this Chamber was when the then Secretary of State for the Environment introduced what became the local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, when we were also told that it would "measure need as never before." I invite other right hon. and hon. Members to say whether it did. In case my right hon. Friend the Minister does not recall who the Secretary of State was, I can tell him that it was my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). There must be a warning there for all of us.

As to block grants, which were at the heart of the 1980 Act, I have a confession to make, at least to newer Members of the House, because my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) and I were the only Conservative Members who voted against that measure.

Mr. Redwood: Tut, tut.

Mr. Squire: I shall pretend that I did not hear that noise from my hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood).

If these are not the last rites, then this is the semi-final stage in recognising that the percipience shown by my hon. Friend the Member for Selly Oak and myself in 1980 is receiving its due reward and that a system that was never likely to stand up to the strains that we were bound to place upon it is now admitted to be a fallible and failing system that needs to be removed. I have no regrets about the disappearance of block grants.

The Bill in general is a fairly ordinary transitional measure, although, as right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House have pointed out, there is bound to be an element of rough justice when one says that, after a fixed date, one will work to a slightly different system. That would be memorable and worthy of comment only if it could be said that the present system has, by and large, delivered other than rough justice over the past eight years. Most of my hon. Friends and a number of Opposition Members would undoubtedly claim that the system has neither rewarded virtue nor necessarily penalised vice—if only we could say that it had—but the element of rough justice has been there from the very beginning, and it is certainly continued in this Bill.

I cannot complain about that, but I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will bear in mind the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire), that if, as a consequence of the Bill, one or more authorities obviously suffer financially in a major way, he will give that matter his consideration. At present, nobody knows what the outturn will be in two to three years' time, but it must be right in principle that local authorities are answerable more to their electorate and less to the Government.

I welcome the statement that the Bill should also reduce the scope for creative accountancy. It may be claimed that it will remove such scope; I prefer the word "reduce." Speaking as a former local authority finance chairman back in the mid-1970s, in the days when one could still discuss in public the fact that one proposed leasing the odd item or two, I am sorry that some of the flexibility that used to attend local authority funding is no longer there. None the less, the system has been tightened up for a number of reasons, the main one being that a very small number of authorities are going way beyond what we might reasonably have accepted as being the ordinary to-ing and fro-ing between parties, which has provoked the inevitable response.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Gentleman is very learned and wise in the ways of local government. It is a pity that his Front-Bench colleagues did not listen to him more often in the past. If they had done so, they might not have made so many mistakes.

The hon. Gentleman was a finance chair in the mid-1970s. Does he agree that at that time central Government interfered far less in the financial affairs of local authorities, and that made it unnecessary for local authorities to become involved in creative accounting?

Mr. Squire: Some marvellous suggestions are being put to me. First, I should upset some of my colleagues if I did not say that I was a chairman rather than a chair.

Let me turn to the hon. Gentleman's substantive point. According to my memory of 1975-76, the doors came down with a dirty great clang and every local authority suffered as a result of IMF borrowing. The hon. Gentleman may be right in saying that the details of control between central Government and local authorities were very different—and, of course, there was a very different financial system—but the impact of that Labour Government and the cuts required in one year were way beyond anything contemplated either under the present Government or—as it seems to be the flavour of the night—by Bradford council.

My next point concerns the abolition of certainty of grant entitlement. The key benefit of the system to local authorities will be that before each financial year they will know the exact amount of their grant. That, too, sets certain bells ringing in my long memory. Some people will remember a little measure called the Local Government Finance Act 1982. Its centrepiece at one stage was to be something called "mid-term holdback". I suspect that my right hon. Friend's advisers in the Civil Service will have been kind to him in his first few months and will not yet have tried to bounce mid-term holdback on him. If they have not, he will find, if he looks again at the record of our past discussions, that there was an attempt to ensure that local authorities would not be able to know at the beginning of each year how much income they would receive. That was scheduled to be part of the 1982 measure, but it fell among thieves in Committee. I speak as one of the aforementioned offenders. When the Act emerged that provision was no longer part of it. I am delighted that we recognise the importance of local authorities being able to plan ahead and being certain about their budgets.

I do not wish to say too much about Bradford, because it might then become the flavour of the year. I do not, of course, object to hon. Members who represent the area putting their case as forcefully as they can. But, as a former finance chairman and leader of the council, I must say that if cuts of 1 or 2 per cent. are being discussed—I shall give way if the figure is dramatically different—that is something less than catastrophe. It is very much less than the cuts imposed across the board by the Labour Government in 1976. Let me also make the obvious point that if Bradford council's actions turn out in practice to be as unpopular as was suggested by the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), the political consequences will be plain. My own feeling from what I have read so far is that they may turn out to be surprisingly popular among the majority of the electorate.

Let me conclude my—I hope—shortish speech by reaffirming my belief in local government, whether we are talking about Bradford or about local authorities in general. That bears some resemblance to the sentiments of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), who rightly said that independent local government is an essential part of the structure of government. By that I mean a council that is able to determine its own priorities—they must not be imposed on it—and is able to raise a substantial chunk, if not all, of its revenue from the local people to whom it must ultimately be accountable.

With those words, I give the Bill my best wishes and commend it to the House.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): We have heard several references to the needs of various authorities, and the assessment of those needs. I find it rather bewildering, because I could not assess the needs of Sheffield, Bradford or Newham. I have always thought that that is what local authorities are there to do—to assess the needs of their areas. I can give my views on an area that I know—Manchester.

Let us look at the history of Manchester, which is a core city. Since 1961 there has been a rapid drop in its population. The younger and more able, the more professional and probably the more affluent have moved to the suburbs, the green belt and the new towns. With the advent of more cars, they are now able to commute into the city. In 1961 the population was 657,000; in 1987 it was 450,000.

People are still leaving the city, but for different reasons. They are now leaving in search of jobs. In desperation, some are even emigrating. Left behind are the less skilled, the disabled, the elderly—all of them dependent on the welfare services provided by the local authority. On top of that Manchester must still provide for the funding of its libraries, its art centres, the Hallé orchestra, its theatres and all the amenities expected of a major city.

In the past few years, however, there have been vicious rate cutbacks, on central Government's assessment. The only people who are really affected are the ordinary people of Manchester, the very same people who were dealt a humiliating blow as manufacturing industry shed thousands of workers, and closures brought in their wake family breakups, more medical referrals and even suicides. But the most tragic expression of deprivation is the high premature death rate.

Deprivation in the inner city meant more demand for local authority welfare services, but those services were diminishing because of the lack of Government support. Then along came the cuts in benefits, and we now have the problem of a poll tax. The effect is manifest in the present poverty in Manchester. A recent report highlighted the number of people who lack or are even denied resources that should be accepted as essential—resources for heating, indoor toilets, damp-free homes, beds for everyone in the household, clothing and nutritious food. Those are hardly the luxuries of life.

A recent survey shows that about 30,000 people in Manchester live in homes without essential heating; about 20,000 homes are affected by damp; about 80,000 people do not sit down to a roast joint or its equivalent once a week because they cannot afford it; approximately 20,000 households contain at least one person who lacks a warm waterproof coat; and nearly half Manchester's residents are unable to afford a week's holiday away from home other than by staying with relatives.

Those are real needs and they should be assessed by the local authorities. If a local authority wishes to raise revenue to meet those needs, it should be able to do so. The democratic procedure is already there. If the rates are put up and the voters do not like it, they have something called a ballot box. They can kick out any councillor or Member of Parliament, if they so wish.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Is it not true that in Manchester only 25 per cent. of the voters pay rates?

Mr. Litherland: I do not know where the hon. Gentleman gets that figure from. He probably thinks that council tenants do not pay rates, but that is a red herring. The notion that one section of the community keeps another section is wrong. The truth is completely different.

The survey was based on "Breadline Britain." It set out the minimum standards of living that are considered to be acceptable and a list of the necessities that provide a reasonable standard of living. One of the criteria was whether people are able to afford the basic necessities of life or whether they have to go without. The survey found that 54 per cent. of households with at least one person unemployed in the household cannot afford three or four of the necessities of life, that one-parent families are particularly at risk and that one half of black and Asian householders go without three or more essential items because they cannot afford them. It also found that 29 per cent. of pensioners living alone are poor, that a high proportion of them are in deep poverty and that they cannot afford five or more essential items.

The survey found that 40 per cent. of households that include a person with a disability or long-standing health problems are living in poverty, that council tenants are three times more likely to be living in poverty than owner-occupiers and that large families are especially vulnerable. It found that in Manchester 36 per cent. of large families are poor. Most of these people are accumulating big debts. They are falling victim to the loan sharks. That is job creation; the Government probably regard it as private enterprise. To be in debt, however, and in the hands of unscrupulous individuals only compounds the misery of the people of Manchester.

The lives of the majority of the people of Manchester are drab and fall far below average expectations. Mancunians, however, are independent. All they ask is to be treated as members of a civilised society. They have not developed a dependency culture. All that they want to do is to work so that they can obtain the necessities of life that will give back to them the dignity that they enjoyed years ago.

The Government could assist by providing realistic funding for local authority activities, just to help to ease the inequalities of life. However, if it is a Labour-controlled local authority the Government say that its activities must be curbed. The Conservatives sell off cemeteries for peanuts, buy them back with ratepayers' money and nothing is said. That is creative accountancy, but Labour local authority power or trade union power has to be crushed. That is the kind of sinister centralisation that is going on now. I used to be a Manchester councillor. I would not want to be a councillor now, because in future councils will be central Government agencies.

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): Will the hon. Member give way?

Mr. Litherland: No. The hon. Gentleman has only just walked into the Chamber. I have been here since 3.30 pm.

My hon. Friends have referred to the inequalities of life. There is a report in The Guardian today of a London insurance broker who makes £5,500 a day. It says:

"Mr. Bill Brown, chairman of Walsham Brothers insurance brokers, earns more than £2 million a year."

What sort of society can accept that standard of living while it stands by and sees the elderly dying of hypothermia and children going without proper meals? That is a sick society—greedy and lacking in compassion. Only a sick Government would heap more injustices on ordinary people. I can refer only to the people of Manchester, but I am sure that every Opposition Member could refer to what he sees and hears in his local authority's advice bureau and would reach the same conclusion.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): I welcome the transitional system that is outlined in the Bill and the new system to which my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning referred in his opening speech. I hope that the new system will define need fairly simply and that it will relate it to the number of people in different age categories. I hope that it will also take into account the fact that, while some councils are experiencing a constant migration of people, as we have just heard is happening in Manchester, and feel that their needs are special, other councils that are attracting enterprise, prosperity and new business have to spend money on providing the infrastructure and services that are necessary to receive those people and provide homes, roads and other facilities for them. I hope that their needs will also be taken into account.

When my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State replies to the debate, I hope that she will answer one question that I could not work out from the statement. If a relatively low-spending council is none the less over grant-related expenditure and therefore out of grant, will it be eligible under the transitional arrangements for some of the money that is to be provided towards the cost of the community charge? All councils will have to face that cost, whatever their position may be in relation to GRE. Some of the councils that are out of grant have run their affairs prudently. If other pressures are reflected in their budgets, that does not mean that they have been feckless with ratepayers' money.

I hope that the transitional system will continue to take into account the way in which some councils have been squandering their cash. Reference has already been made to some of the excesses. Not many years ago the Leader of the Opposition felt that he had to intervene in the then state of Labour local government and castigate one of the great bastions or fortresses of Socialist local government, Liverpool. He reminded Liverpool council that it did not become it well if councillors were seen scuttling around in taxis paying out redundancy money to staff who had been recruited not very long ago during the council's great spending splurge.

To those of us who hoped that that might represent the nadir of Labour local government, it is ironical that we should now be witnessing events in Brent where things seem to have come to an even sorrier pass than they did in Liverpool only a few years ago. When grants and rate capping are looked at again by Ministers, I hope that they will ask Brent council hard questions. I hope that they will ask why rubbish is uncollected and lying in the streets and why ratepayers are not being given even the basic standard of service that they have a right to expect from that local authority, even though the spending seems to be going on at an ever-increasing rate.

Mr. Tony Banks: If the hon. Gentleman considers the impact of this Bill on the London borough of Brent, he will see that it is to be one of the major losers. The Bill means that it will lose £9 million.

Mr. Redwood: I am glad that the Minister has already heard my point. Brent deserves to lose money because it has been wasting it profligately.

To turn to the flavour of this debate, Bradford council, we see what happens when there is a change of control, albeit by a very slender majority that upsets the opposition. A large number of savings were immediately identified and budget plans were changed. What are to go? Not essential services—the collection of rubbish or housing repairs—but the unnecessary excesses of a large number of committees. The awful waste on the women's committee and the equal opportunities committee will go; so will the racial officers—things for which the public are not clamouring. They want their basic local government services to be delivered well. It is high time that Labour councils recognised that fact.

Mr. Cryer: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the picture he has painted of Bradford is completely distorted and inaccurate? The so-called savings by the Tory clique, marginally in office by the lord mayor's casting vote, include £3 million on education and community centres where elderly people meet socially in the afternoon. There has been widespread pressure from ordinary people to keep community centres, but they have been attacked by the Tory council. It is not a question of just a few committees. The budget savings are a massive attack on the people of Bradford.

Mr. Redwood: I am not sure that the people of Bradford will agree. The Conservative administration has said that it will provide the basic services that are needed and will provide services of a better quality and standard for less cash. All Conservative Members welcome that.

I should like to make a plea to Ministers when they come to consider, yet again, the system of capital expenditure and controls on it. Conservative Members —and possibly others—want to encourage councils to continue the sale of unwanted assets, such as houses and flats, to those who want to buy them and who are now being given the opportunity to do so at prices that they can afford. Councils that have done that but that have not run up big bills which result in large debts should be free to spend a reasonable proportion of those capital receipts. Ministers should consider introducing an external financial limit which would hit and penalise spendthrift local authorities which overborrow, but would leave incentives for well-run authorities that receive capital from receipts, particularly from the sale of houses.

I welcome the transitional arrangements. Anything that can be done to make local government genuinely accountable and to make local authorities concentrate on the high quality services that they should provide at a low cost is be welcomed.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I want to persuade the Minister that at least one element of the Bill is improper and should be withdrawn. The Bill has been introduced in an atmosphere of rush and panic and is being pushed through with inordinate haste. It is supported by Conservative Members who are of the rabid Right and who show no respect for local government.

By contrast, I, too, have been the chairman of a local authority finance committee, and I agreed with the hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) when he regretted the degree to which freedom of operation has been taken away from local authorities. The apparent simplicity of the Bill is open to question, in view of the Government's record of mindless attacks on local government. However, none of that is my target tonight.

I want to challenge the Minister on the constitutional impropriety in the Bill, which I urge him to correct. My speech could be ended now by an offer from the Minister or the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales —who, I regret to say, is not here, but whose constituency, like mine, will be affected by the theft of £3·5 million from Cardiff city council and South Glamorgan county council. I was chairman of the finance committee of Cardiff city council, and I believe that we should aim for a system that meets the slogan of "no taxation without comprehension", as the Minister suggested. That is an excellent aim, but fairness is also essential and cannot include the moving of goalposts long after the game is over.

In his introduction, the Minister made great play of the offer of certainty for the future. Another biblical quotation that will probably not be understood by "She who must be obeyed" is,

"by their fruits, ye shall know them".

I hope that Ministers will listen with care to my evidence. I welcome the Secretary of State for Wales to the experience of hearing that evidence, and hope that he and other Ministers will change their minds on this point at least, if only so that Ministers are seen to keep faith with the House.

Clause 1(8)(b) of the Bill refers to the retrospective operation of arrangements in Wales. Paragraph 3 of schedule 1 relates to arrangements for 1987-88. Paragraph 4(2) refers to the relevant amount in terms of the calculation of the final grant as being "the amount submitted", which in that paragraph refers to estimated rather than actual expenditure. That contrasts starkly with the statements made in March 1987 by the then Secretary of State for Wales and by the Secretary of State for the Environment, that what mattered was a local authority's actual expenditure.

I refer to their statements of 13 March 1987 and 16 March 1987, respectively. What was said to the House —not just in correspondence—was that ultimately the grant paid to a local authority in respect of the year would depend on what the authority actually spent. That is perfectly simple and clear. It is without ambiguity, and it should be adhered to. The rule has nothing to do with estimates, as the Minister tried to suggest earlier in response to my intervention; it has to do with the money spent.

The July statement to the House changed the rule without notice. In case Ministers are in any doubt about it, let me underline the incontrovertible evidence on this point. The Secretary of State for Wales has been told of Cardiff city council's profound dismay regarding the implications of the statement to the House on 7 July whose terms are incorporated in the Bill. The March 1987 report said:

"Essentially relevant expenditure is the total of revenue expenditure properly debited by a local authority to the general rate fund revenue account."

The Secretary of State told Parliament that he intended that the settlement for 1987-88 should give the further certainty of ensuring that each authority's grant entitlement would depend "solely"—I emphasise that—on its own spending decisions and would not be affected by decisions taken by other authorities. Are the ministerial statements about certainty made earlier today as dependable as that statement? If so, they are not worth the air into which they were spoken.

Cardiff city council accepted those statements in good faith as made by the Secretary of State to Parliament in accordance with the law. As a result, substantial reductions were made in the council's expenditure. There were reductions in staffing levels; staff were retired early and departments were amalgamated. As a result of the economies by the council actual expenditure in 1987-88 was reduced to some £1·3 million below the Government's own guideline figures. Those reductions in expenditure were made in the full knowledge and expectation that they would attract substantial extra grant from central Government. They were measures of substance, and in some instances affected the services provided by the city council. They involved no superficial accounting measures such as transfers from funds or other measures of short-term expediency. In other words, they involved none of the expedients to which the Minister referred in response to my earlier intervention. They were reductions in costs within the spirit and the letter of the announcement by the Secretary of State.

There was astonishment and anger on the part of everyone concerned when it was learnt that the Secretary of State proposed arbitrarily and retrospectively that the grant calculations would be made on the basis of information with the Welsh Office by midnight on the day preceding the July statement. The statement was made despite the fact that the relevant forms seeking information about actual expenditure in 1987-88 were not received from the Welsh Office until 29 June, and those forms stated that information should be submitted by 31 July. Those clearly defined goalposts were moved in the statement.

I emphasise that the city council's financial accounts for 1987-88 were closed early in June, and the final position reported to the finance committee on 16 June—three weeks before the announcement by the Secretary of State. If he had requested the information even a day or two in advance of the statement, it could have been provided. If a reasonable deadline had been given, it would have been met. It will be unfair to the citizens of Cardiff if the statement in July is interpreted as it appears to have been interpreted in the Bill. I repeat what I said before the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales entered the Chamber: his constituency, like mine, will be affected by the decisions, which constitute a theft of £3·5 million from the ratepayers of Cardiff.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Is my hon. Friend aware that many constituencies in other parts of the country will be similarly affected? For example, Newport in Gwent, which is a good authority, with a fine reputation for providing good services at good value prices, reduced its expenditure by £600,000, but now finds itself in precisely the same position as Cardiff city council. It is about to be cheated by the Government.

Mr. Michael: I agree; and I know that Newport has been efficient. Ministers should accept that, when decisions are taken efficiently and in good faith, the Government should respect them and their outcome.

The arguments that I have advanced were put to the Welsh Office, which suggested that Cardiff city council could have reported the level of outturn. Such figures could have been provided earlier, but a target is not an achievement. It is nonsense to insist on targets being the measure. Secondly, the level of outturn was not what the Government said would be the test. The test that the Government laid down was the total of actual expenditure. It is clear that past practice was to calculate grant on the basis of returns in the forms which show the revenue outturn. Those forms were not sent out until 29 June, and their return by 1 August was requested.

If Welsh Office Ministers wanted those outturn figures by midnight on 6 July, it would have been open to them to have said so when the forms were sent out. I am certain that that requirement could and would have been met.

If Ministers now say that what matters for calculating grant is estimated outturn rather than actual outturn, presumably it would have been open to a local authority to have grossly underestimated likely expenditure, to claim substantially extra grant on the basis of it, and still to overspend without suffering any penalty. That seems the logical consequence of what the Minister said, but it would have been complete nonsense and a travesty of justice.

In any event, our local authorities did not resort to such subterfuges. They simply provided the correct information in the form in which the Government requested it. In his statement of 29 July, when he wrote to the Welsh Office, the city treasurer said:

"the Council's reduction in costs did not involve transfers from funds or other such financial expediencies, and . . . the Council would be happy for the District Auditor to check that that is true."

What better safeguard is there? Since July, efforts have been made to put the simple facts before officials in the Welsh Office. I hope that Ministers will take account of the representations and evidence that is being presented to them and, during the Bill's passage through Parliament, change at least this element in the Bill.

[Mr. Michael]

When the Secretary of State announced the 1987-88 rate support grant settlement, he drew attention to the fact that, by reducing expenditure, local authorities could earn extra grant. We must say that the Secretary of State is going back on that undertaking. That is unacceptable and highly questionable.

The problem is that the conclusive calculation of grant will be based not on authorities' actual spending and decisions—which Conservative Members have told us for the past hour or two is how it should be calculated—but on an artificial basis. The outturn has tended previously to be below revised estimates, so the Government could have expected to have to disburse extra grant. Is this a calculated attempt to avoid being fair and to avoid following accepted practice? Surely not.

Authorities may take decisions in good faith which affect their expenditure and block grant entitlement. Some authorities could have undertaken interim valuations on superannuation funds or taken account of reduced employers' contributions in their revised estimates. Others may have decided not to take them into account until the law was clearer, but have done so when closing their accounts. Why should authorities be dealt with differently because they are more prudent when drawing conclusions on figures?

If the Minister wants to pursue his stated purpose without unfairness and without constitutional impropriety, he is being offered a way out. First, when an authority has, by 7 July, already approved its accounts as minuted by a meeting of the full council or the appropriate committee or sub-committee, grant entitlement should be based on total expenditure as contained in the approved accounts and certified by the external auditor. Secondly, when an authority has not approved its final accounts by 7 July, grant entitlement should be based on final expenditure as certified by the external auditor. Either course could exclude the effects of changes in capital financing policies, in accounting practice and of transfers from funds, so all the points that the Minister made earlier in response to my intervention could be met.

I shall not go into futher detail, but I am convinced that the council's case is overwhelming. If Ministers are unable to respond now, they should read the details with fair minds. I am sure that they will be convinced. The Minister referred several times to the figures received by 7 July and said that if the period was open ended it would allow changes to be made in retrospect. It is the Government who, if they push the Bill through unamended, will be guilty of such practice. The Minister failed to deal with the unfair penalty put on councils, which will have depended on the assurance of Cabinet Ministers that it is actual expenditure that counts.

In his introduction today the Minister said that we should have certainty about the results of certain actions but, in its present form, the Bill tells local authorities, "Do not trust Ministers, even when they come bearing an offer of certainty." Certainty was offered, but it is being stolen by the Bill. There is every likelihood of a legal challenge to the Government because moving the goalposts in this way is so questionable. We are used to the Government moving the goalposts in the middle of the match, which is bad enough, but in this case the posts have been moved long after the match has ended. Moreover, the goal scorers, who have left the field, are being told that their win has been redefined as a defeat.

I am distressed at the Government's onslaught, which has gone on for several years, on local authorities. The Bill takes money from local authorities once again, but my criticism goes much deeper than that. I question the constitutional propriety of the Bill in its present form. I criticise a Bill which seems to legitimise a retrospective adjustment, despite promises made in the House by Cabinet Ministers. I object to a Bill that steals from local authorities assurances that have been given by Cabinet Ministers. I resent a Bill that takes money from local authorities that have observed, met and even done better than the Government's own targets and requirements.

I hope that the Under-Secretary of State for Wales will recognise and support my description of Cardiff city council and South Glamorgan county council. It is accurate. I appeal to Ministers to withdraw from the Bill the element on which I have concentrated and to restore at least a modicum of fairness and propriety. I ask Ministers to recognise the simplicity, logic and justice of my plea. If they fail to deal with it today, I ask them at least to concede the point and to amend the Bill during its passage through Parliament.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I welcome the Bill, which my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning introduced so excellently. I absolutely reject the criticisms made of it by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker). He criticised the Government for introducing a Bill in the spill-over session and said that he had analysed other Bills that were introduced in the spill-over.

I cannot think of a better time for the Government to introduce such a Bill as it deals with the problem of spill-over—the spill-over of expense and the use of creative accounting to allow councils to distort their spending pattern and make it appear as though they qualify for a larger grant. It is important to introduce a Bill such as this now so that we can ensure an orderly transition to the community charge. The Bill will stop some of the games of deferring expenditure. If companies use creative accounting, it catches up with them in the following financial year, if not in the same one. With councils, however, there was obviously an opportunity to try to dodge the issue until the community charge came into operation.

The great advantage of the community charge is that it is so much simpler, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) said. I have never been able to understand the rate support grant system. I understand that it had to be worked out on a computer in America, because no computer in this country was big enough and fast enough to calculate all the complexities of the present system. Everyone, whether or not they understand the system, must be very glad to see the end of it and the introduction of the new system which is based on an assessment of needs. That must be the right and proper method, carried out in a simple way so that each local authority throughout the country charged exactly the same community charge of approximately £200 per head if spending were on a level basis.

Bolton council is calculated to have a figure of £228 for 1988-89—£26 above the national average. I hope that the council will introduce greater efficiencies now, and not wait until 1990 when the full impact of additional expenses will be clear and the community charge for each local authority can be compared.

The new system is much fairer. What could be fairer than everybody paying the same? Obviously, when the system is changed there will be some gainers and some losers, and the losers will not see it in that way. I point out to those who feel that they will be paying more that the alternative would have involved a revaluation. Independent surveys have shown that those who would lose most would include the owners of small terraced properties in the north and those houses which have had central heating fitted since 1973. The notion that how much one should py towards a local authority depends upon how many radiators one has in one's house shows the absurdity of the current system. When it is put in those terms, everyone must agree that the change to a fairer system must be right and proper, and that the old rating system will look as absurd as the window tax in the days when people had to block up their windows. I hope that anyone who has delayed installing central heating in his house will now feel that he can do so.

There will be gainers in the areas where the business rate will fall. I am glad to note that in Bolton there will be an 8 per cent. reduction in the business rate and a £17 million gain to the council from the new way in which the business rate will be shared nationally. Therefore, the new sytem can be seen as a benefit to the north at the expense of the south and should be welcomed by hon. Members representing the north.

There is the prospect of very exciting changes and developments in Bradford. I very much hope that many more councils will follow the route taken by Bradford in choosing a Conservative council which will bring in much-needed efficiencies and economies, a whole new way of running the council and a wholesale transfer of departments to the private sector wherever possible.

The greatest change for councils when the full pressure of the community charge is brought to bear will be that they will have to be more efficient and conduct their businesses in much the same way as private firms have operated because they are in competition and cannot afford the inefficiencies which a local authority monopoly has allowed to build up over the years. There is enormous scope for improvement in Bradford. It is absolute nonsense to suggest that the people of Bradford will suffer. They will benefit from the changes. I am quite sure that at the next elections in Bradford there will be no need for the mayor to cast his vote because there will be a substantially increased Conservative majority. I hope that there will be the same increase in the Conservative vote in all councils in the country.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I would be very pleased indeed if there were an opportunity to put the claims made by the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) to the test in an election in Bradford, say next year. However, the truth is that the Government robbed the people of Bradford and other cities of an election when they abolished the metropolitan county councils in the major industrial conurbations in London and other major cities. If they give us an election next year, I guarantee that Labour will sweep the board in Bradford and elsewhere.

The Tories have sent a shockwave through the people of Bradford, because the Tory group has been taken over by a handful of political extremists who are now putting forward their politically noxious notions in a way that was never revealed to the voters in May or in the two recent by-elections. There was no mandate for the massive cuts that they propose. That was shown very strongly when 5,000 people demonstrated outside the city hall in Bradford against the proposed cuts. The local evening paper did a service for the community by comparing the proposals of the Tory clique with the claims in the Tory candidate's manifesto at the last by-election which slipped the Tories into power. It reached the conclusion that there was no hint, except in the most general, platitudinous, meaningless terms, of the massive cuts which the Tories are proposing.

The Bill is about preparation for the poll tax. The actions of the Tories on Bradford council are in preparation for the poll tax. We are talking about a city in which there are more than 22,000 people on the dole and a total of 1,700 vacancies. The Tories propose to add 9,000 full-time and part-time jobs, but to create mass redundancies through cuts in education and community provision. A Conservative Member spoke about a narrow handful of committees. However, the three Labour Members representing Bradford have been inundated with requests from ordinary people who feel that their community centres are now hanging on a thread, subject to extinction and being kicked into the dust by the ruthless Tory clique on the local authority.

Mr. Wilshire: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cryer: No. I do not have the time, because I want to give my hon. Friends time to take part in the debate. Unlike the Tory Whips, we have not had to go round getting speakers. We have plenty to say.

The Tories in Bradford are talking about cuts in education and in community provision. They are shoving up council rents by £3 a week and closing benefit shops that give advice to more than 50,000 people a year. I can give the House an example of what has happened. At a recent social security tribunal, two elderly men were represented in separate cases, one in the morning and one in the afternoon. One of the members of the tribunal told me that the 87-year-old man who wanted to improve his claim from the DHSS for payment to the private enterprise nursing home in which he had lived for more than 10 years because when his £500 savings had gone he would be thrown out could not possibly have represented his case without the benefit advice worker. Between the morning and afternoon cases, the benefit advice worker who had represented that case so proficiently was told that she would be made redundant as a result of the Bradford Tory cuts. That is the practical application of those ruthless measures. There will be charges for home helps, after such charges were removed by the Labour-controlled council. School meals are almost doubling in price, because one of the last decisions of the Labour council was to reduce school meal prices to the second lowest in the country.

Bradford needs an injection of money from the Government. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) pointed out, the legislation will mean a denial of £3·7 million to Bradford, yet again. Already local government officials from Bradford have pointed out that because of Government cuts over three years and the working of the multiplier Bradford has been denied £38 million. That sort of money would have helped to put Bradford on its feet. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Wall) said in a debate on 9 December 1987 —and the position has not changed—

"More than 30 per cent. of Bradford's schools were built before 1906. Forty per cent. of Bradford's sewers are more than 100 years old and we have constant problems of collapsing sewers which require renovation or renewal. Our backlog of housing repairs amounts to some £130 million, representing the sum that we would receive in 10 years from the total housing investment programme for our city."—[Official Report, 9 December 1987; Vol.124, c. 513.]

That is the scale of the problem. Cutting back will do nothing to alleviate it. In fact, it will worsen the problem and worsen the economic crisis in which Bradford finds itself.

The Tories, instead of cutting back and acting as puppets of Thatcherism and Conservative Central Office, should be standing up to the pressure from the Government and arguing for more money for Bradford. An old industrial city needs a higher level of investment. For example, there are 500 temporary classrooms in our education system. We have expanding school rolls, unlike most major cities in our country. Money that has been allocated for increasing permanent accommodation has now to be used to repair temporary classrooms because they have been temporary for so long that they are sustaining damage that was never intended. That is the sort of problem that needs to be solved in Bradford.

The Tories have written their death knell by the extremism of their views. The majority of Bradford people will never forgive them for their attack on the citizens and the fabric of a proud industrial city. As soon as there is an election we will run them out and put Labour back in control.

Sir Marcus Fox (Shipley): I was intrigued by the speech of the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer). He should be careful when he talks about Labour winning back local government seats. With his wafer-thin majority, he will be hard pressed to win his seat in Parliament at the next election. I remember when the hon. Gentleman was my neighbour in Keighley. It is a shame that his views have not changed since he left there. I welcomed his departure to Europe. In one way it is a shame that he is not still there. One would have thought that with his experience in the House over past years he would have a new message to give. That is not the case. He has learned nothing.

I support the Bill. The present rate support grant system has outlived its usefulness and has to go. I welcome the orderly transition that is intended. It may be difficult because it is not based on actual spending. The Opposition love actual spending, not spending needs. I welcome the fact that, if our councils are prudent, they will know exactly where they stand.

I hope that you will forgive me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I spend some time talking about Bradford. I have represented the area for longer than anyone in the House. The biggest problems I have to face are the hon. Members for Bradford, North (Mr. Wall), for Bradford, South and for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden). They have done little to restore the fortunes of Bradford. Their policies have done the reverse. It is interesting that they still talk as if we have not had nine years of growth and expansion and as if things in the city were not considerably better than when their party was in government.

I wish to mention another "moderate", the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours). He has seen fit to draw the attention of the House to a conflict between my outside interests and my chairmanship of the Committee of Selection. I take great exception to that. I fulfill the duties placed on me by the House and declare all my interests. I find it objectionable that it has been suggested that after four years I cannot carry out the job for which I was elected. It is all supposition. If anyone wishes to raise a question about anything I do on that Committee, he is entitled to do so. It is within the power of the House to remove me.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Does this have anything to do with the Bill?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): This is a Second Reading debate and, conventionally, such debates are wide. However, the hon. Gentleman might be pressing matters a little.

Sir Marcus Fox: The hon. Member for Workington raised the matter in the House again today and that is why I have referred to it.

Mr. Cryer: Will the hon. Gentleman relate his comments to the Bill by telling us how much he receives from his 12 directorships and parliamentary consultancies to enable him to pay the poll tax in comparison with one of the employees of the privatised cleaning services company of which he is a director?

Sir Marcus Fox: If the House, in its wisdom, decides that we should fill in our emoluments, I will do so. The companies in which I am involved provide thousands of jobs to enable people to pay the community charge. How many jobs has the hon. Gentleman provided outside?

Mr. Hind: My hon. Friend knows that for eight years I went to school on the fringes of Bradford and for 10 years I worked in Bradford on many occasions. No doubt he will agree that the people who run down a community and constantly repeat what is wrong with it—I faced that problem with the Labour party in Skelmersdale—do that community no service.

Sir Marcus Fox: I agree with my hon. Friend. The hon. Member for Bradford, South emphasised the point I am trying to make. It is the Labour party's antagonism to the private sector that I find objectionable. Labour Members know that the majority of their constituents work in the private sector, but they still have that attitude. That applies to local government and is why they are opposed to the Bill. They do not believe that the private sector can do anything to provide a better service for the ratepayers or community charge payers.

The game is up for the Labour party in Bradford. It was rumbled. The money had run out and it had had years to do something about it. All ended in failure. The Labour party bought votes because 26,000 people are now employed by Bradford metropolitan council. Councillor

Pickles and his brave friends—I believe that they are brave —are talking about 2,500 job losses in five years through voluntary retirement and non-recruitment. How can that be said to be impossible? It is not impossible. We do a great disservice to people who have to pay the bill if we pretend that the number of job losses is larger than that, as some Labour Members have suggested. I have heard the figure of 9,000 mentioned. It is not correct.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Does my hon. Friend agree that the burgeoning tourist industry in Bradford—I have been on a tour of the Bronte country which included Bradford—might absorb some of those people? The older citizens of Bradford who might be made redundant could act as guides to the interesting sights in and around the city.

Sir Marcus Fox: I congratulate my hon. Friend on her sense. Of all the tourist attractions in the United Kingdom, Bradford is the fourth most popular. Labour Members say that things will not get better, but we have had a Conservative Government for some time and they will improve. The change of control in Bradford is long overdue.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South mentioned extremists. He must have forgotten the people who have been ruling Bradford for the past few years. Indeed, one or two of his old friends from Keighley have been doing so, and by no manner of means could they be said to be supporters of the Leader of the Opposition. The hon. Gentleman is the last person who should speak of extremism.

As I have said, the change of control in Bradford is welcome, but what did people expect? The idea that economies were to be made was news is nonsense. We stood by the Government's commitment to reduce costs for those who must pay. I wish that Labour Members would spend more time thinking of those who must foot the bill; it is all very well to demand more and more services if one does not have to pay rates or make a contribution. That has been a problem for many years.

I admit a failing of a Conservative Government, which is unusual for me. Before we reorganised local government we should have reorganised local government finance. Had we done so, we might have made a better job of the boundary changes.

Mr. Wall: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Marcus Fox: I always give way, unlike the hon. Member for Bradford, North.

Mr. Wall: I gave way to the hon. Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fox). Is it not true that an all-party delegation from Bradford protested about the loss of £38 million in Government support, which was due mainly to the multiplier—a matter that I raised in the House last year? They demanded that the £38 million be paid to Bradford because it had never exceeded grant-related expenditure. Nevertheless, we lost that money. Had we not—enormous cuts have been made nationally in rate support grant—would it not have solved many of the problems facing Bradford's people?

Sir Marcus Fox: Various Administrations have experienced much difficulty in deciding how the rate support grant should be worked out. Indeed, when I was a Minister at the Department of the Environment I think that only three people understood it. It has never worked fairly, but it is always a good excuse to blame the rate support grant.

Expenditure in Bradford is £300 million a year and it has debts of £350 million. We cannot claim to have been deprived, but there is still much to be done. The formula has been made clear not only in by-elections that we have won. In May, we won not only Bradford but a couple of seats in wards that were not Conservative controlled.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Marcus Fox: The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner) is preventing other hon. Members from speaking by intervening.

Mr. Turner: I am hoping to speak myself.

The hon. Gentleman said that he was a Minister in a previous Government. Surely he studied all the information and reports from the borough of Dudley and the great city of Birmingham. What is being proposed is not new. We experienced the effects of the Conservatives' experiments with local government in Dudley. There was much talk of frontiers being broken down, yet it was an abysmal failure, and many problems arose in Birmingham. Surely the hon. Gentleman is not saying that this is a new revolution. If he is, the people of Bradford will be on their knees in the next few weeks.

Sir Marcus Fox: I have considerable difficulty coping with my responsibilities as the Member for Shipley and with being involved with Bradford. I cannot possibly argue the case for Birmingham.

Successive changes in financing local government have failed because they have encouraged spending. Despite increased money being given to local authorities, services have declined and demands have increased. I welcome the community charge because at long last it will get to grips with the problem.

Competitive tendering, reductions in manpower and bureaucracy and performance related pay are not bad ideas. It is not a bad idea to get to grips with the introduction of the community charge in 1990. Why should it be deemed disgraceful that the new council in Bradford should be taking measures to try to make the community charge more acceptable? It is financial prudence; there is nothing secret about it. Opposition Members are concerned about those who have never paid rates, but if measures are taken that mean they will have to pay less in community charge they should welcome what is taking place in Bradford.

The hon. Members for Bradford, North, Bradford, South and Bradford, West harped on about the sale of three old people's homes. They ignored the fact that several million pounds would have to be spent on those homes to bring them up to standards acceptable to the private and public sector. The only way in which that money could be found was by bringing in the private sector. Protection will be given to residents; they will not be turfed out or be any worse off than they are today. That assurance must be given, and in no way would a Conservative local authority embark on that road without making such provision.

The citizens of Bradford metropolitan district are glad that change has come and are thankful that they do not live in Labour-controlled Camden or Brent.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West) I am grateful to the hon. Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fox) for putting me on so many interesting Committees. It was not until I read early-day motion 1526 that I realised he had so many outside jobs. My admiration for him increased when I realised that he is such a busy person. We should be grateful for the fact that he has found time to make his contribution this evening.

I am pleased to see the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment in the Chamber. She is a welcome addition to the Front Bench, and it certainly needed some adornment.

Mr. Cryer: Hear, hear.

Mr. Banks: I was thinking of intellectual adornment. I should not have been thinking of anything else, as I am sure my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) appreciates.

We have heard from two new Ministers today. The Government's new ploy is to change Environment Ministers, thus presenting moving targets and making it more difficult for us to get to them. I am sorry that two new political sacrifices are about to throw themselves on to the barbed wire of local government legislation. No doubt we shall be able to assist the Minister in the difficult times that she will face in the weeks ahead.

It is a bit optimistic and cheeky, to put it mildly, for the Government to expect to get the Bill through in the carry-over period. I do not know whether anything has been said through the usual channels, but I expect that we shall have some hairy times with the Bill. I see no reason why it could not have waited until the new Session.

The Minister said that the Bill would simplify the grant system for local authorities. Like other hon. Members, I echo the wish for a simpler system of local authority finance, which these days makes the oft-quoted Schleswig-Holstein question seem like something out of Blankety-Blank. A number of provisions in the Bill are iniquitous and inequitable. They will be bitterly opposed by Labour Members.

The Minister said that the Bill would bring certainty as we move towards the new system. He encouraged us not to talk about the poll tax because he said that it had been settled. It might have been settled in the House, but it certainly has not been settled in the country as a whole. The poll tax will undoubtedly remain the central and most controversial issue in local government in the months and years ahead.

The Minister said that we should not reopen the debate, and I do not intend to do so, but we cannot ignore the new system towards which we are moving. It is predictable that we should go towards that new system with a Bill that imposes on local authorities a retrospective set of injustices. The Bill's overall intention is to prevent grant entitlement varying with expenditure for the years 1985-86 to 1989-90 inclusive. The result will be that some local authorities will be left with windfall gains of grant, and other with unjustifiable and unpredictable losses.

The Minister made a big issue of the end of the link between grant and expenditure, which will prevent local authorities from indulging in grant maximisation through creative accounting. Creative accounting has come in for much criticism in the House, with the Minister and Conservative Members attacking it. All that we have had from them are the usual half-truths, caricatures and often downright lies about the way that creative accounting has been used in Labour authorities.I say "downright lies" because I know that Conservative Members have not deliberately set out to lie to the House, but have merely repeated the sorts of lies that have been published time and time again by the loony Right-wing press, such as The Sun, the Daily Mail and the Daily Express. It is amazing that Conservative Members are so lazy that they are not prepared to find out the truth about Labour-controlled local authorities in London and elsewhere. They merely reproduce the smears that are inflicted on local authorities by the press.

Why do authorities go in for creative accounting? Is it because they find it the easiest thing in the world to do? Conservative Members have suggested that the only reason why Labour local authorities have become involved in creative accounting is to spend more money —on women's committees, police committees and gay and lesbian committees. Some have, and I welcome the fact that they have brought this new and necessary dimension into local government. Let us be clear: the amount of money that all local authorities together have spent on those various committees that cause so much offence to Conservative Members is peanuts in terms of the global sum of local authority public expenditure. It is no justification for these wholesale, regular changes in local authority finance and for this continual assault on local authority accountability and democracy, which is all that we have had from the Conservative party since 1979.

Most local authorities have got themselves involved in creative accounting as their only way of protecting services and jobs in their areas. They have spent most of the money that they obtained through creative accounting on maintaining the standard of the statutory duties that they have to fulfil—for housing, social services and education. Those local authorities have been acting in the best interests of their constituents and ratepayers in the face of this hostile Government.

I defy Conservative Members to say that there is any Labour local authority that behaved as reprehensibly as Tory-controlled Westminster, which has become involved in some very shady creative accounting—not in the interests of its ratepayers, but to rip them off. There was the selling of the cemeteries for 1p. When suddenly everything goes wrong, there is the attempt to use ratepayers' money to buy back through compulsory purchase. There was also the scandal of the sale of the freehold of the Tory party's Central Office so that the Tories could sell it on. It is a nice piece of creative accounting, if one happens to be a Tory——

Mrs. Gorman rose——

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West) rose——

Mr. Banks: Hang on—sell it on to pay off the debts of a general election. That is ripping off the ratepayers of Westminster. If that had been a Labour local authority there would have been demands from the Dispatch Box for a public inquiry, but there was nothing but double standards and hypocrisy. I give way to two hon. Members who are specialists in it.

Mrs. Gorman: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the advice given to those councillors by members of NALGO, who were highly paid executives of Westminster city council, was that those cemeteries should be disposed of? It is they, if anyone, who should be held responsible. They were men on salary scales of £25,000 to £30,000 a year —of which I am sure the hon. Gentleman would approve —who were giving duff advice to elected members.

Mr. Banks: It is a very poor councillor who shelters behind officers. That is a dereliction of duty, and the hon. Lady should know that an elected member is responsible for his or her actions. It is no good saying, "I am very sorry, but we were badly advised." Conservative Members should start thinking about some of the other examples, such as the Royal Ordnance factories, when Ministers said, "We got some bad advice, perhaps." It is a poor politician who cannot take responsibility for his or her actions.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that it is also a poor politician who will not withdraw a comment that he knows to be fictitious? Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that the story that he has given to the House—I accept that it was in one of the newspapers, but the hon. Gentleman's views on the gutter press are well known—is completely fictitious in respect of Central Office? There is not a shred of evidence to support the hon. Gentleman's comment. It is inaccurate.

Mr. Banks: I am confident that the facts that I have given to the House are correct.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes rose——

Mr. Banks: If I have misled the House in any way, I shall be big enough to withdraw what I said.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: Perhaps when the hon. Gentleman makes those investigations he will look at the fairly important matter of whether No. 32 Smith square ever belonged to Westminster city council. It did not, and this point is rather germane to the hon. Gentleman's comments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members should return to the Bill.

Mr. Banks: If we have the public inquiry for which the Opposition call into the affairs of Westminster city council and the facts stated by the hon. Gentleman are correct, they will emerge. For the moment the Opposition are satisfied that a scandal has been under way in the city of Westminster. We need more facts. They will speak for themselves and will show that the facts that I have put to the House are accurate.

Mr. Madden: Why did Lady Porter not deny it?

Mr. Banks: Yes. I would accept the point from the Minister, but not from a young puppy of a Conservative Back Bencher. Would the Minister care to tell me whether my facts are correct? We must assume that they are, because she has remained in her seat.

There is a great deal of arrogance in the Bill. Local authorities will lose grant which they were entitled to expect to receive. They have made budget calculations and it is grossly unfair, once again, for the Government to change the rules. The Bill's impact is arbitrary.

I shall give the specific examples of three London authorities, one of which, Brent, has been mentioned innumerable times in the debate. Greenwich, Southwark and Brent have reported that they will lose grant because of the Bill. In the case of Greenwich, this is because the Government will assume a higher expenditure figure for 1986-87 than the council spent. The council approved its accounts for that year on 6 July 1988, but of course had not notified the Department of the Environment. The Department will assume that Greenwich spent £102 million when in fact it spent only £93 million in 1986-87. The council will lose £1.2 million as a result. Is that fair? Is the Minister prepared to listen to representations by authorities such as Greenwich when the Bill is seen to have adverse effect on them?

Brent suffers even more. The Department assumes that the council spent £185 million in 1987-88 when the latest estimate available at the time it set the budget was only £178 million. As a consequence of the reduction in expenditure in 1987-88, Brent increased its 1988-89 budget from an original level of £188 million to £195 million. Brent did not submit a form showing the lower 1987-88 spending and the higher 1988-89 spending before the 7 July secret deadline because it was still working out the details of the budget. However, the Department rang the council, secured the higher figure for 1988-89 and confirmed it in writing, but did not ask about the revised estimate for the previous year, which would have been shown on the same form. As a result, the Department is assuming a higher spending figure for both 1987-88 and 1988-89, although the figures are inconsistent, because to have a higher figure in 1988-89 Brent must have had a lower figure in 1987-88. Those figures were reported publicly in March 1988.

As a result of the Bill, Brent stands to lose £9 million in grant. [Interruption.] Tory Members who think that that is a good thing should understand the range of problems in Brent. I am not an unqualified admirer of Brent council. It makes mistakes, but the Government make mistakes to the tune of handing over millions of pounds of taxpayers' money to private companies and it sits ill on their lips to be so critical of a London borough which everyone should know—I am sure that in their hearts most people in the House do know—faces enormous social and economic problems.

I know that a line has to be drawn, and it might be said that some may lose while others gain, but the impact of the Bill is arbitrary, and when Labour authorities have so many problems pressing down on them it is unfair that they should lose anything at all, because they do not have enough to deal with the problems that they already face. I know the Minister to be a reasonable and decent Conservative, which puts her in a fairly unique position on the Government Front Bench, so when those authorities come and tell her the truth of the situation I trust that she will find some room in her heart to give way. If she does not, I assure her that our opposition to the Bill will be implacable.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): I welcome the Bill, as drafted, and echo some of the thoughts expressed by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). If there are genuine arguments, I am sure that Ministers will be prepared to listen. Like the rest of us, however, the hon. Gentleman must welcome the end of the rate support grant system. It is indeed like the Schleswig-Holstein problem, which has already been mentioned, as no one really seems to have understood the basis of calculation. The hon. Member for Birmingham,

[Mr. Kenneth Hind]

Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) said that one could not blame everything on that, and I agree, but the system was not readily understood either by Members of Parliament or by the general public, and its demise is thoroughly welcome.

As supporters of local government, we must recognise that there is a balance to be struck between central and local government. They are like the balances on a weighing machine. As the hon. Member for Perry Barr pointed out, there are two mandates. If a local authority is predominantly of one party while the Government of the day are of another, one view must prevail. That must surely be of the view of the elected Government as having a superior mandate to that of the local authority, and in that circumstance central Government must interfere when local government has not shown itself responsible and has not used the proper mechanisms to protect the ratepayer and the taxpayer in the provision of services.

We have seen many examples. The hon. Member for Newham, North-West mentioned Brent. I could mention other London boroughs. Liverpool is an example on my own doorstep. Those and other councils in the past have proved themselves to be totally incompetent to run a local authority and thus, in the years since I first came to the House, we have had arguments about local government. Targets, rate capping and other devices have been necessary, not because the House wants to interfere in the activities of local government but because a minority of local councils have shown themselves to be incapable of looking after the authorities that they were elected to control and of safeguarding the interests of the ratepayer and the taxpayer.

It does not come well from Labour Members to attack what the Government have done with the rate support grant in recent times. The rate support grant for 1988-89 is £13·575 billion. That is a terrific amount of money and a £1·1 billion increase on the previous year. The county of Lancashire, part of which I am proud to represent, has an increase of 9·8 per cent. in its grant compared with the previous year—that allows for changes in the funding of the polytechnics—and there is no reason, projecting forward to 1988-89, for any responsible local authority to need an increase in funding above the rate of inflation. Yet Lancashire increased its rates by 18·5 per cent. this year. People on fixed incomes, the elderly and families with children have been hit extremely hard by a totally unnecessary increase which was opposed by Conservative councillors who argued that the increase should have been between 6 and 8 per cent.—much closer to the rate of inflation.

Ministers have been obliged to introduce legislation of this kind because local authorities have been seeking to expand the basis of their services into areas entirely unconnected with the services that they are expected to provide. The best example is probably the local authority of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West, who I see is still in his place. That authority is providing two scholarships at a local college for members of the African National Congress. The authority is paying £2,000 per year in fees for each student as well as offering to pay for flights to South Africa and so on. I appreciate the wish to help people in the Third world to achieve a better education, but is that really the function of a local authority? Surely that is something that should be taken on board by the national Government if it is thought appropriate. Yet that is typical of the kind of activity going on in local government which Conservative Members oppose and to which we call attention.

Mr. Tony Banks: First, Newham is an education authority and thus fully entitled to do just that. Secondly, citing such a tiny example among the many services and millions of pounds of expenditure as justifying changes in the whole structure of local government is not worthy of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hind: I was brought up on the principle that if one looks after the pennies the pounds will look after themselves. All too often we are told by Labour Members that something is just a drop in the bucket, but if you drip into the bucket often enough it will overflow. We want responsible management of local authorities. That is the aim of the Bill.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): If we move to a community charge and the weakening of the link between local and central Government that such a change implies, does my hon. Friend agree that in the longer term there is a case for taking education out of the local authority sector altogether?

Mr. Tony Banks: They will scrap local authorities altogether in the end.

Mrs. Gorman: Good!

Mr. Banks: There you are!

Mr. Hind: I will not go down that avenue today as I should no doubt be called to order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

What we want above all is better value for money. The Bill calls for efficiency, to build on what has gone before —on competitive tendering. It will help to prepare the 70 per cent. of the population who have not paid their rates in the past but who will be called upon to pay the community charge and it will soften the burden that they will have to bear. Some 9 million people will pay only 20 per cent. or less, but equally others will be called on to pay for the first time. They will say, "We want good value for our money in the services that the local authority provides." The Government are entitled to meet that challenge and to respect the fact that people are making a contribution towards the services provided.

It is no good arguing about the past. Westminster has been referred to and we have heard a great deal about Bradford. Those of us who live on the fringes of Liverpool cannot escape from its past, when high rates were levelled by a local authority that has contributed to the destruction of Liverpool's economic base. The community charge and the national industrial rate will restore opportunities for new industry by a reduction of 30 per cent. in the industrial rate. Because rates are such a large proportion of industry's costs, that will be a major attraction to industries in other parts of the country to relocate in the Liverpool area.

Liverpool is not untypical of many authorities. Do those who will pay the community charge expect us to spend money on scholarships for the ANC, on gay rights and on racial committees? They expect us to ensure that those authorities are run properly. Some of the Labour authorities are appallingly run. The Comptroller and Auditor General's report 18 months ago on the London boroughs effectively said that they were going bust and being very badly managed. Southwark, the borough in which I have the misfortune to reside when in London, had £24 million of rent arrears that it simply had not bothered to collect. Where is the management responsibility in that? Its management style was criticised and it certainly had no sense of cost management.

The local authorities in Liverpool wanted to take on the Government to such an extent that Liverpool city council was prepared to put 32,000 local government workers on the dole—yet the Government are criticised for introducing this Bill. We have only to study history and the way that many local authorities have behaved to realise the need for this legislation. For the first time, there will be a cut-off point and a new, clearer system that will define the needs of local authorities. They will know at the beginning of the financial year exactly how much money they will have. It is a wonderfully clear system.

There will be an end to creative accounting, such as leasing park benches and lights on bridges. I hope that during the Lancashire county council election in May the public will bear in mind that no effort has been made by the controlling Labour group to make efficient cost savings. Instead, it has imposed an 18 per cent. increase in rates. It wanted to spend £600,000 on expanding the county hall. Fortunately, the Conservative group, supported by the Liberals, voted that down. That money could be spent on old people's homes, social services, education and other facilities—not on bureaucracy.

There has been a problem in Lancashire with competitive tendering. Lancashire wanted the contract for the grass cutting in three local authorities, West Lancashire being one. It bought £100,000 of new grass-cutting machines and then tendered in such a way that 20 per cent. of the county was put together in one tender, effectively cutting out not only the in-house operations of the local authorities concerned, but every other local contractor who wanted to tender. It wanted to ensure that its own in-house operation would get the contract—yet I guarantee that that will not be as cost effective or as cheap as other tenders would have been had other contractors had the opportunity to tender. I and other Conservative Members in Lancashire have written to my hon. Friend the Minister about that, and I hope that a robust response will be given from the Dispatch Box this evening.

Lancashire, like many local authorities, is mismanaged. In an Adjournment debate, the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) dealt with capital expenditure on schools in Lancashire last year. Lancashire complained that it had lost a large amount of grant, but it had never applied for it. It did not apply in the priority areas where the Government had indicated that money would be available. It applied in the wrong areas, thereby mismanaging the whole business. We are entitled to call upon local government to be responsible and not to act in such a way.

I support what my right hon. Friends are seeking to achieve. I hope that there will be a more organised, more clearly understood and more cost-effective local government system. I commend the Bill to the House.

8.6 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I wish to thank three hon. Members who have taken part in the debate —my hon. Friends the Members for Bradford, North (Mr. Wall) and for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), who made passionate speeches, and my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), who spoke from the Front Bench. I am especially grateful to him because he spoke passionately and with great effect about the importance of local government to democracy. He said that effective, democratic local government was all important to a democratic society.

Many comments have been made about the city of Bradford, and I make no apology for devoting my speech to democracy in that city. It is under threat because of the actions of the controlling Conservative group, which has absolutely no electoral mandate for the policies that it is seeking to steamroller through the council by means of the mayor's casting vote on all matters. The objection of many citizens of Bradford to that arrangement has been compounded with the announcement by the controlling Conservative group of its intention to retain the mayoralty next year. It is rejecting the convention that has hitherto applied of the mayoralty changing according to political groups on an annual basis. It is breaking a long-standing convention that has been upheld by successive political groups for many years.

An autocratic umbrella guillotine motion was introduced last Tuesday at the first full council meeting under the Conservative controlling group. It means that at all meetings all debates will be terminated, with the mayor using his casting vote, at 10 o'clock. It will be assumed that all motions have been moved and seconded and, without debate by councillors, the guillotine will fall and all motions will be carried by the mayor's casting vote. That is more draconian—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order.

Mr. Madden: I am most grateful, Madam Deputy Speaker. I hope to make a brief contribution.

The Bradford council guillotine is far more draconian than anything that is practised in the House of Commons. As we all know, in the event of a tied vote, it is the long-standing tradition of all occupants of the chair to preserve the status quo and not to seek to carry controversial political matters for which there is no popular electoral mandate. We in the city of Bradford face a major challenge to local democracy, and that matter will be reported to the House on numerous occasions.

The vast majority of Bradford citizens feel cheated and betrayed by the way in which Bradford Conservatives have sought to manipulate democracy and are seeking to introduce into our city extremely controversial and unpopular policies. Bradford Conservatives have been dishonest by concealing their plans from the electorate. They were revealed only in late September after the by-elections in June and September and the election last May.

It is extraordinary that the hon. Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fox), a Member of Parliament with 12 jobs, should lightly dismiss the fact that tonight 9,000 people in Bradford are threatened with the loss of their jobs. It is extraordinary that the hon. Member for Shipley should say that, when they voted in the by-elections and the district election last May, the people of Bradford knew what they were voting for—that is, if they were silly enough to vote Conservative. They certainly did not know what they were voting for. It is extraordinary also that the hon. Member for Shipley should speak ambivalently about one of Bradford council's most controversial measures—the sale of 15 old people's homes.

A few days ago, a street ballot was conducted on that issue in Bradford. It showed that 15,000 people are against the selling of such homes and that fewer than 400 are in favour of it. That is an authentic expression of popular view about that extremely controversial issue. The hon. Member for Shipley is no longer in the Chamber. He is obviously looking after the many jobs that he has to perform. For him to say that, when they voted Conservative in the by-election and district elections, the people of Bradford knew that they were voting to sell 15 old people's homes is to mislead the House and the people of Bradford.

The people of Bradford who voted in recent elections had no idea that, if elected to power, the Conservatives would seek to sack 9,000 council staff, sell 15 old people's homes, increase the price of school dinners to 80p a day, increase home help and meals-on-wheels charges, close benefit shops and independent advice centres, or increase rents by £3 a week, and, I guess, by even more next March.

The people of Bradford are angry that the Conservatives' hidden agenda is to go through on the mayor's casting vote. They feel angry that their councillors are being denied full information about council policy. They feel extremely angry that their councillors will be gagged at 10 o'clock at every council meeting so that measures that are deliberately placed down the agenda because they are politically controversial will be steamrollered through on the mayor's casting vote. The people of Bradford feel angry that, already, all council staff have been gagged to prevent them from talking to the media. All members of staff employed by Bradford council have been informed by circular that if they talk to the media about any aspect of their employment with the council they will face immediate disciplinary action. So much for Tory democracy in Bradford. It is a disgrace, and it rightly deserves national attention.

The more that the people of this country get to know about what the Tories in Bradford are seeking to do, the more they dislike it and the more fearful they are that Tories in their own localities will seek to introduce the same policies if they have the same opportunities to mislead the electorate that the Bradford Conservatives have had to mislead the people of Bradford.

Last Tuesday, 5,000 men and women gathered in Bradford to protest against the council's policies. It was the most spontaneous, genuine expression of popular opposition to Conservative policies that has been seen in Bradford for many years. Let my say to some people who may not know much about the political history of Bradford that, since 1980, the Conservatives have been in power, Labour has been in power, and there have been successive hung councils. Do not let us be misled into thinking that Bradford has been administered by Labour for generations, because that is completely untrue. The men and women who gathered outside city hall last week —whole families, pensioners, the disabled, council staff, and workers from the voluntary sector—came together to say no to Conservative policies in Bradford.

Bradford has a proud past. It has many difficulties at present, but it faces a most exciting future. Bradford pioneered public services, especially education. Our people are radical and hard working, with masses of common sense. They do not like being conned or used. They will not allow their families or their city to become the victims of a Tory experiment in southern imported Thatcherism. They know that Bradford needs jobs and community services, not more sackings and community cuts.

Every social and economic index published about Bradford shows poverty in Bradford and that, since 1979, it has been robbed of millions in rate support grant. Even this Bill robs Bradford of still more. Another £3 million will be withheld.

The Bishop of Bradford and other religious leaders—Moslem, Hindu and Sikh—know that Tory council policies will hurt poor people and low-paid families. The bishop has asked all priests in the city of Bradford urgently to report to him on how people will be affected by the Tory policies that are now being introduced in our city.

The sackings and cuts are to reduce expenditure to allow a nil rate increase next year and, thereafter, to reduce the poll tax. The price to be paid by those on benefit and by the low-paid for a small reduction in a high poll tax will be increased charges for all council services and the loss of some services. That is too high a price for the thousands upon thousands in Bradford to be forced to pay. They should not be asked to subsidise the Conservative party or the political ambitions of certain Tory councillors in Bradford.

The hon. Member for Shipley said that people will welcome paying a lower poll tax as a result of the expenditure reductions that Bradford Tories are proposing. At the recent annual Conservative party conference in Brighton, the Minister had the audacity to say that the elections in Bradford were won by the Conservatives on the basis of the poll tax. What nonsense. The leader of the Bradford Conservative group dodged every debate on the poll tax. The Conservatives accused the Labour party of spreading lies and misinformation about the poll tax. They did everything possible to conceal the impact of the poll tax on the city of Bradford. There are only 80,000 poll tax gainers but 220,000 poll tax losers in Bradford. That is the effect of the poll tax on Bradford.

Let us not have any more nonsense to the effect that the controlling Conservative group in Bradford has been elected on the back of the popularity of the poll tax. If that group makes 9,000 redundant and slashes community services to reduce expenditure and thereby reduce the poll tax, it will not be met with popular acclaim. Those who will lose under the poll tax are those who depend on community service for the quality of their lives. If they see a substantial increase in their cost of living by virtue of increased charges for school meals, home helps and all the other services that the council provides, and if at the same time they see the destruction of many other community services, that will not create popularity.

The Conservative party in Bradford will reveal what it has always been over generations. It exists to support the rich and the privileged at the expense of the poor, the underprivileged and the disadvantaged. This will rebound on the Conservative party in Bradford. The price that the Conservative party in Bradford is asking the poor to pay is far too high. They are saying no now and they will say no more loudly as the days, weeks and months pass. Let us have an election to test the popularity of Conservative policies in Bradford. Let us have a district election next year. Let the true candidates who have been proposed for mayor, Conservative and Labour candidates, subject themselves to the people of Bradford. Let the existing mayor stand for election in Worth valley. Let us see whether he can get re-elected so that he can use his casting vote to steamroller through the Conservative party's unpopular measures. Let us talk about democracy, especially in Bradford. The Conservative party is trying to strangle it, and the people of Bradford will not let that happen.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): After the peroration of the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), I feel that it would be a good idea to bring the debate down a tone or two.

I support the Government's general intention of stopping fiddling during the change over from one form of rate support grant to another. However, I am not euphoric at the prospect of a 9 per cent. increase in the money that is spent on RSG, that increase having been announced in the Government's proposals. It is said that that will amount to £1 billion, and I believe that that sum should be left in the pockets of the taxpayers where, as Mr. Gladstone once told the population, it would fructify and do a great deal more good. When my hon. Friend the Minister replies to the debate, I hope that she will explain in more detail why we need this increase in taxation, for that is what the proposal means.

The Government's purpose has been to reduce the gross over-expenditure within local government. The Local Government Finance Act 1988 will make local authorities tender out a certain number of their services. I look forward to the day when we have digested that part of the Act. We can then introduce new legislation to reduce still further the activities that local government performs. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has expressed what I consider to be some of the best thoughts on local government, and I am a great supporter of him. He said that local councillors should meet two or three times a year to award tenders and then return to their homes to tend their gardens. They should keep their noses out of other people's affairs as far as possible. That is the sort of local government that I should like to see.

There is ample evidence to show that, wherever local authorities tender out work and introduce competition and the private sector, massive savings are made. That is the way in which we shall help the ratepayers of Bradford, Newham, Brent and elsewhere. I did not understand why the hon. Member for Newham North-West (Mr. Banks) spoke for the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone), who is conspicuous by his absence, but who knows a great deal about creative accounting. He initiated a great deal of creative accounting when he led the Greater London council. For example, he spent £20 million to try to stop the GLC from being disbanded. That creative accounting was indulged in to try to keep him in a job until he was elected to this place.

Mr. Cryer: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Gorman: The hon. Members for Newham, North-West and for Brent, East have nothing to complain about. The community charge and the new arrangement for local government will advantage high-spending Labour boroughs. The redistribution of the business rate will do them a favour. Having driven away businesses in their areas by imposing high rates upon them, they will benefit by the new system. They should be thanking the Government and congratulating them on helping them out of a hole.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): My hon. Friend is right. Many businesses in northern constituencies will benefit considerably. Perhaps my hon. Friend should give way to the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) if he wishes to intervene. It may be that that is the very point that he wishes to make.

Mrs. Gorman: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Bradford, South if he asks again to be allowed to intervene.

Mr. Cryer: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Gorman: Yes, of course.

Mr. Cryer: The hon. Lady said that the Bill would curtail fiddling and creative accounting. Will she confirm that she is talking about the way in which councils try to obtain additional moneys because of the crushing pressure of Government policies? Whatever they did was done legitimately. They did not indulge in the illegal activities that Conservatives have got up to in the City, Lloyd's of London and various companies which have come to grief in the criminal courts.

Mrs. Gorman: There is a world of difference between the way in which those in the private sector are answerable to their shareholders and to those who deal in stocks and shares, and the way in which local government has in the past, in many respects, been almost unanswerable to local electorates when accounting systems have been altered to accommodate spending tendencies.

Creative accounting has been getting an extremely bad press today. Like "gay", "creative" seems to have acquired a pejorative meaning, which I deplore. There are many ways in which creative accounting can help ratepayers. The hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) moaned and groaned about poor people who are left in the centres of cities while everyone else moves off to the suburbs. I have news for the hon. Member for Manchester, Central—I shall bring it to his attention when he returns—and for many moaning and groaning councillors. Most councils are sitting on a fortune in the shape of land and property, and in many instances they do not have a list or register of it. If it were converted into cash or some means of paying off local debts, councils in some instances would be able to pay a bonus to ratepayers or introduce a rate holiday for several years. Local councils, especially those of Left-wing persuasion, are in many instances sitting on a small fortune. They would be able to convert land and property to cash if they were bothered to do something about it.

Let me give an example. Barking—the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) happens not to be present today—has suddenly found enough land to build the equivalent of a new town within the confines of the borough. It has been sitting on the land for donkey's years. Tens of thousands of new homes will be built. The Government are bringing pressure on boroughs to release the land and assets on which they have been sitting for many years. When the land is sold to the private sector for the building of new homes for sale, that will help to reduce the cost of running the borough. Local ratepayers have every reason to be grateful for creative accounting of that sort.

I share to some extent the feelings of my hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood). More of the money that local authorities realise from the disposal of assets should be made available for reducing rates. That would be a creative use of the economic powers that the Government could bestow on local government.

I do not share the idea, which is referred to constantly in the House, that local government must always be on the receiving end of more and more cash. There is no need for local authorities to be doing half the things that they are doing. The elderly are probably much better looked after by contracting out the homes which some need so that they are not subjected to the kind of abuses that we heard about in the Nye Bevan scandal, which was another of our wonderful local government efforts which the ratepayers supported and which the poor people who lived in that institution had to endure for many years.

In my opinion, local government should decide some of those issues, but it should not attempt to provide the services, because when it does corruption and neglect creep in. There is not enough supervision of the direct labour services, and that includes all social services. People get a much better deal as and when the private sector sets the example. In that regard I mention Marks and Spencer, which decides on a certain budget and quality control, but does not try to do the work. That is how we will eventually introduce legislation which does not require increases of 9 per cent. or similar amounts every time we make a change in the system.

We should put all local government services into the hands of the competitive private sector. Only then will we know that the local ratepayer will get a really good deal for his or her money.

8.31 pm

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): The contribution from the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) illustrates clearly the new breed of Conservative inside and outside the House. The hon. Lady would have been much happier if this had been a local government annex or abolition Bill. Clearly she has nothing to say about local democracy, local government and the role that local government has historically played and should continue to play in its relationship to central Government. Her contribution was a typical and classical example of the old adage—she "knows the price of everything and the value of nothing".

Clearly the hon. Member for Billericay is very new to local government. She is a new Member of Parliament, as I am, but I spent 20 years in local government and I got a tremendous amount of satisfaction from that, as have thousands of local councillors of all political persuasions, in making a contribution and providing a service to the community. Some of tonight's contributions to the debate do a great disservice to the many thousands of men and women who are public representatives or servants of local government and have contributed in a huge way to our society. They have made significant advances with central Government in trying to provide the services that we all want.

The difficulties in local government have been exacerbated by the return of the Conservative Government in 1979 and the major changes that local government has had to accommodate over the past nine years. Local government has experienced frustration through the on-off availability of funds and the impossibility of any logical planning for services which Parliament has determined local government should deliver. While we talk about the needs of local government today, it must be evident to all hon. Members who take any interest in local government that it is facing problems at the moment. Many of the problems have been born from the Government's failure to come to terms with the needs of local government and to work with local government to achieve the required objectives.

It is said that people pay their taxes in sorrow and their rates in anger. If the Bill is enacted, ratepayers will have every reason to be angry. In some respects we can call the Bill a paving Bill for the poll tax, because that is precisely what it is. The past three Secretaries of State for the Environment, whom I would call faith, hope and charity, have contributed nothing meaningful to the needs of local government.

I want to refer to the problems that my authority in Wolverhampton and the rest of the west midlands will experience as a result of the Bill and the interim proposals in the rate support grant. The difficulty facing my local authority is that, as in previous years, the provision for current expenditure set by the Government is substantially lower than what is likely to occur. The Association of Metropolitan Authorities has estimated that that might be £1 billion. I hope that the Minister will answer my queries.

I know that inflation is always the subject of a great deal of controversy. My local authority has submitted its view to the Secretary of State that the levels of inflation in terms of pay awards and interest are not fully reflected in the rate support grant for 1989-90. Legitimately, we are concerned about that. That problem will have an impact on the level of rates that must be set by the authority.

Reference has been made on many occasions to the suggested 9 per cent., or £1·1 billion increase. I believe that that is very misleading. On the basis of the assessment for the current year, it is expected that £500 million will be returned to the Treasury because final grant entitlements for 1988-89 and earlier years were based on estimates rather than on final audited figures. I want the Minister to comment on that, because if that is true we are talking about an increase, not of £1·1 billion, but of £600 million, because £500 million has already been clawed back in the current year.

My next plea is very important in terms of equity and fairness. An arbitrary decision has been taken in the revaluation of the west midlands ratepayers' superannuation fund. Will the Minister please reconsider that arbitrary decision, which is likely to cost the ratepayers of the west midlands £25 million and my local authority an extra £2·7 million?

Mr. Gummer: Will the hon. Gentleman explain exactly his question on the superannuation fund, because I want to answer him clearly? What would he like us to do?

Mr. Turner: The Treasury and the Department of the Environment have undertaken a revaluation of the superannuation fund. The information that I have from my local authority is that, on the basis of that revaluation, the West Midlands authority has been placed at a disadvantage to the extent of £25 million, and to the extent of £2·7 million in the case of my own local authority. My authority has asked me to raise this matter with the Minister, as it feels that, irrespective of the other decisions that the Government have taken—some of which might be said to be political—this matter is one that he should reconsider.

Mr. Gummer: I should explain to the hon. Member that it is not a matter of a Government revaluation, but that the West Midlands authority would like to revalue its superannuation fund. However, under present law that would be illegal, so it would not be proper for the Government to give the authority permission to do so—although we may be able to make some changes later. There is no way in which we could make legal that which at the moment is not legal.

Mr. Turner: I thank the Minister for his answer. If he proposes to be fair, he might be able to find a mechanism whereby he can still make a response in order to obviate the loss that the West Midlands will otherwise suffer. I hope that he will take on board my comments and will be in a position to respond positively.

The overall thrust of my argument is that there is a serious element of unfairness in the Bill. I am making the point that my own local authority has been dealt with unfairly and that there is cause for the Minister to reconsider that matter. All local authorities, not just Wolverhampton, know that since 1979 there had been a contribution of about 62 to 63 per cent. from the Exchequer to support local government in all its many services. Now, the Exchequer's contribution is about 46 per cent. That tells people why they are suffering huge indirect taxation imposed by a Tory Government. It is that that has created major problems in our towns and cities over the past few years.

I ask that the Bill be voted down and that, in the run-up to the iniquitous poll tax, greater fairness and equity be enjoyed by local government by giving it the support that it needs to provide the services that the House has, in passing legislation over many years, decided it should provide.

8.42 pm

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): When considering the Bill, one can only wonder why it is that rate support grant was not abolished years ago. My right hon. Friend the Minister, in opening this debate, implied that one of two people in the Ministry understood rate support grant, and my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fox) observed that when he was a Minister perhaps three people in the Department understood it. In my humble position as a PPS for a couple of years, well below the salt on the ministerial table, I had a strong suspicion that the only thing that understood rate support grant was the computer, buried in the bowels of the Ministry's building, that produced the figures every year, and that very few people, if any, really understood how it arrived at them.

Given—hallelujah!—that the present system is at last going, my right hon. Friend the Minister is absolutely right in saying that we cannot change from the present arrangement to the community charge in one jump and that there has to be a mechanism covering the interim period. The Bill meets that challenge admirably. If we are to have a break between support for spending, which is crazy, and instead support for needs, however difficult that may be to assess but which makes much more sense than just support for spending, then I welcome the Bill if it can achieve that.

Nobody in the House can doubt that it is the role of Parliament and of the Government in particular to set the totality of public spending nationally. No one can doubt either that, in order to do that, the House must set aside an amount of money—or at least set a maximum—that is to be spent locally. That is a view held not just by my right hon. and hon. Friends, but one that has had all-party support for years. When in government, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) made a powerful speech arguing just that point. The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), when he was Secretary of State for the Environment, argued precisely that the House was right to control national and local expenditure. He not only said that, but acted on it.

It was in 1966-67, or in 1967-68, when the Labour Government got themselves into a fearful tangle with the IMF, that the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney rightly asked local authorities to reduce their expenditure—and this was in mid-year—by £1,000 million. Bearing in mind the inflation that has taken place since those years, one is talking about a very large sum of money. So it sits ill in the mouths of Opposition Members to talk as though constraints on local government spending have only just been introduced by the present Government. They have always been there.

What has been missing in the past few years has been the willingness of Labour authorities to recognise the paramountcy of the House and to act in a voluntary way in meeting Government targets. Because those authorities refused to meet targets in the way convention always arranged in the past, the Conservative Government have been compelled to legislate much more than my right hon. and hon. Friends really would have wished.

There have been cries from the Opposition Benches, particularly from the three hon. Members for Bradford, for more money for Bradford—a voice from the bottomless pit. Their cries and arguments had all the overtones and language of the debates about Liverpool that we had three or three and a half years ago. It was the same story. Liverpool wanted to spend. The councillors there felt that as they had been elected they had a right to spend—but somebody else's money. I recall that at the time I served on Nottingham city council as well as in the House. Nottingham Labour councillors came down to London wearing their stickers proclaiming, "I support Liverpool." I said to them at the time that, apart from the waste of money in coming all the way to London to see me—because, as a city councillor, I could just as easily have seen them in Nottingham—I was elected as a Nottingham city councillor and as a Member of Parliament to represent the people of Nottingham.

I objected then, as I have since and do now, that spending by other authorities—be it in Bradford, Liverpool, or anywhere else—should take money away from a city such as Nottingham, which I represent. If the new system does away with that and makes each city stand up and answer to its own electorate as to how it spends, then we shall have done a great service to local government. We shall have returned to local government the kind of democracy that we all want to see.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: I was interested to hear the hon. Gentleman say that. Is he aware that business men in my part of the country are steaming with anger because their business rates will be raised to reduce the rates of other areas that have spent the money on extra services? They are angry because services have been held down in my area to keep rates down, and they now find that they will be penalised for action taken by sensible councils.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I have some sympathy with the hon. Gentleman. Many local authorities were, in effect, penalised for being prudent under the old system. There is no dispute about that.

Mr. Taylor: And under the new system.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: No. Under the new system each authority will be answerable to its electorate for what it spends.

Mr. Taylor rose——

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: No, I will not give way again.

I referred to Bradford because there are a number of similarities between Bradford and the city of Nottingham. The city of Nottingham, too, has a hung council, and for two or three more days its future depends on the casting vote of the lord mayor.

Mrs. Gorman: Is he a Tory?

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Yes, a Tory lord mayor with a casting vote. But, happily, this Thursday the citizens of Nottingham will have the opportunity to say to their council, "Yes, we approve of what you have been doing in the city for the past 18 months." We hope that they will return a Conservative councillor to replace a Conservative colleague, David Flowerday, who died of cancer three or four weeks ago.

If, heaven forbid, the citizens of Nottingham—for whatever reason—elect a Labour councillor, theirs will be a very unusual council. It will have 27 Labour members, 27 Conservatives and one Communist. The city will then have to depend on the whim of a single Communist for its policies. In this place we sometimes forget just how important local government is and how much effect it has on people's lives. I venture to suggest that the by-election in Byron ward in the city of Nottingham on Thursday is probably more important than some of the parliamentary elections in the coming months.

Eighteen months ago, when the Conservatives won control of Nottingham, they began—perhaps without the drama of the past few days in Bradford—to put their financial house in order, and it is to their credit that they did so without much fuss or publicity. They froze the rate last year: there was no increase in Nottingham city council's rate at the end of the first year of Conservative administration. If hon. Members wish to visit the queen of the midlands, they will now see more businesses, factories and houses being built than in the past 30 years. That is what is at stake on Thursday.

Mr. Gummer: Before he leaves that point, will my hon. Friend draw to the House's attention that council houses are now refurbished in five weeks, providing homes for those who would otherwise be homeless, whereas under the previous Labour administration it took a year? As a result very few people are now in bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for pointing that out. My Conservative colleagues in Nottingham have received some publicity and some deserved compliments for what was known as the "mini-mod" scheme. Instead of leaving properties empty for months on end and trying to carry out major modifications, they are now handling 1,500 modernisations a year. It is going extremely well, and all credit to them.

We have heard a good deal about creative accountancy tonight. To be fair, all councils—Tory and Labour—have used creative accountancy to some extent. Some of it would make us simply nod and smile, because it was not terribly naughty. If a local authority set its budget to a proper level, it would obtain the maximum grant; that was sensible local authority financial planning. But if the authority found towards the end of the year that it was not going to spend its full budget and was foolish enough to underspend, it would receive less grant under the old system. The local authority, if it had its wits about it, put the money into reserve. That counted as expenditure, so it would receive its full grant. That was called creative accountancy, and I suppose it was, but it was excusable and understandable and no one broke many bones.

What the Bill addresses, and what has happened in the past few years, is creative accountancy of a very different kind. It is much more evil. Financial deals have almost made future generations hostage to the vast debts that those deals built up. I think that the Government were absolutely right to stop those phoney deals and to stop local authorities—whatever their colour—from acting in an irresponsible way that mortgaged the future of those yet to come.

My right hon. Friend the Minister specifically referred to an adjustment being made because local authorities would no longer control the polytechnics. That could not be more germane to my comments about the city of Nottingham. In 1952 I went to what was then called the Nottingham district technical college—and it was the district technical college. Now Trent polytechnic is an enormous institute of higher education. It is far from being the local tech. It is not even the city tech or the regional tech. It is a national—even an international—institution, quite the equal of Nottingham university. The fact that under the new Bill it will be an independent, stand-alone institute of higher education, out of the clutches of the local authority, is the best thing that could have happened to it. If that means a minor adjustment to rate support grant, so be it.

Let us be clear about this. Local authorities have a duty to provide proper services, and they have a duty of care. But, as my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) pointed out, having a duty to provide services and a duty of care does not mean that the authority must provide those services and that care. If it can provide more care and more services more efficiently and cheaply by contracting out, then let it do so.

This is what the argument about staffing levels means. Bradford is saying that over a period 2,500 jobs are going —we have heard 5,000 and 9,000 mentioned: think of a number and double it—but those jobs will not disappear. The services are going out to tender, and the vast majority may well reappear in the private sector where they belong.

Mr. Turner: I asked earlier whether we had learnt anything from the experience of Dudley and Birmingham a few years ago when they were under Conservative control. School cleaning in Dudley was contracted out. Within a matter of weeks the schools were closed down because they were absolutely filthy. A report stated that contracting out had been an abject failure. Conservative Members should not say that contracting out is the answer in Bradford or anywhere else. The Conservative party has proved that it is an abysmal failure. In Birmingham, the school meals service was contracted out, but that had to be stopped in no time.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that there is good and bad in both the public and the private sectors. I simply make the point that if a local authority accepts that its role is that of an enabling body, and that if it has the mechanism to ensure that a contractor meets his tender obligations, services can be properly provided by the private sector. It has never meant that a local authority can put something out to tender and then turn its back on it and not ensure that it is handled properly. If what the hon. Gentleman described went wrong, that sounds to me like very bad supervision.

Mr. Turner: It went wrong because of greed.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: That may be the hon. Gentleman's view. I acknowledge that a local authority has a duty to provide services and care. In most cases, services and caring can be provided by the private sector, with the local authority acting as both the enabling authority and the mechanism whereby it can ensure that in the public interest its services are properly provided. I hope that the Bill will reduce the patronage and control that local authorities have exercised over many people's lives. If that is the result of this interim Bill and of the Bill relating to the community charge, I shall be a very happy man.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): I am very proud to speak on behalf of my constituency and of the people of Nottingham, having been born and bred there. All Nottinghamians are proud of their city. It is a beautiful place. Its people are some of the finest in the world, but they are very worried. They look up the motorway to Bradford and see what a Tory authority with the slimmest possibly majority can do to a city. What has happened during the last week to the people of Bradford may happen to the people of Nottingham.

The Bradford authority is seeking not to serve the people of Bradford but merely to impress its mistress in No. 10. In many ways the people of Bradford are suffering because their Tory city council is taking the lead from the Tories in Nottingham. The Tory city council in Nottingham does not care about many groups of people. It does not care about the handicapped in the city of Nottingham. There are 643 handicapped people on the waiting list for purpose-built accommodation, but it is being sold off by the Tory city council. It is flogging off that accommodation, thereby creating longer waiting lists and fewer homes.

The Tory city council does not care about the young newly weds who cannot get a home of their own either because the council is not building any more new council houses or because mortgages are too expensive in the city of Nottingham. [Interruption.] I know that Conservative Members do not like this, but they are going to have to listen to it.

The Tory city council does not care about its ratepayers. Every person in a household who is over 18 will soon have to pay £252 under the poll tax, yet the Tory city council utters not a word of protest to its mistress at No. 10. It does not care about the green spaces in our proud and beautiful city that are being sold off and asset-stripped. Allotment holders are being squeezed out for private development and speculation. The Tory city council of Nottingham does not care about council tenants whose estates may soon be sold to speculators. It does not care either about the elderly whose hedges are no longer trimmed and whose houses are no longer painted by community programme workers, who now face the dole.

The Tory city council of Nottingham is so incompetent that it has been unable to put correct rent demands before people. The result is that during the past few days the elderly and the disabled in Nottingham have received demands for rent arrears amounting to £500, £600 and in one case £1,000, sums which were unknown to those people. They have built up because of the Tory city council's incompetence. The council is involved in seedy land deals in the city and is stripping the assets of our city fair. A cut of 80 per cent. in Nottingham's housing investment programme has been inflicted on the city by this Conservative Government without a murmur from the Tory city council. That council has crawled on its belly to ingratiate itself with the Prime Minister, when the defence of our city services was needed. The council is not fit to safeguard the city of Nottingham and its assets and services are not safe in the hands of a Tory city council.

The by-election on Thursday will be the day of reckoning for a Tory city council that has followed in the footsteps of Bradford. It will no longer rule Nottingham because we shall have a Labour administration.

9.6 pm

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): You, Madam Deputy Speaker, know how keen the competition is to participate in local government finance debates, so I thank you for calling me.

I have listened with some interest to hon. Members who represent Bradford constituencies and who are suddenly taking a keen interest in local government finance. They have seen fit to sign early-day motion 1502, which suggests that 9,000 employees are to be sacked over five years. There is an amendment to it which suggests that the number is in fact 2,500 and that redundancies will be rare. One can understand why the Socialists think that the greater the number of people working in central and local government and elsewhere who are dependent on the Government, the more likely it is that they will be in a Socialist fairyland.

I am not impressed by the huge march that so impressed hon. Members who represent Bradford constituencies. Bradford has a population of 320,000 and they say that

5,000 took part in the march. The average Labour rent-a-mob is about 50 per cent. home grown and 50 per cent. imported. If one assumes that 4,000 took part in the march, that means that there were about 2,000 people from Bradford in the march out of a population of 320,000. We are happy to fight a by-election at any time on that basis.

Mr. Gummer: I want to comment on the fact that that crowd filled the town hall, shrieked so loudly that no Tory could be heard and threw coins on to the floor. Does my hon. Friend think that that was a reasonable way to carry on a democratic discussion?

Mr. Knapman: I agree that that is not a reasonable way of carrying on, but I am sure my right hon. Friend will agree that it is a typical way for them to carry on, although the marches and protests of eight or 10 years ago were much larger than anything that we have seen recently, including the little demonstration organised in Bradford. One can understand why the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), who has a tiny majority of a few hundred, is desperate to be seen to be doing something. I am sure that his turn will come at the next election.

Local government finance does not generally create such interest as we have seen this evening. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science, when he was Minister for Local Government, said:

> "In the years that I have been in the House, when I have looked in on such debates, I have soon found that on the whole hon. Members keep away from them unless they have been alerted to attend by their local authorities."—[Official Report, 16 January 1985; Vol. 71, c.413.]

I have one small and perhaps narrow point which my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning may care to consider. Should supplementary credit approval be granted when the Secretary of State approves a compulsory purchase order under section 114 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 in respect of listed buildings? It seems that the local authority has some responsibilities for listed buildings. Some are large, and some are constructed of ancient or traditional materials, and may be expensive to improve or to put into good order. I should like my right hon. Friend's comments on that if possible, because in my constituency there is one listed building in poor repair for which expenditure of about £720,000 is anticipated.

I have been a chartered surveyor for 20 years. To listen to the debate, one would think that Opposition Members were keen on the existing system. Quite how one can even dovetail the existing system with the Opposition's current proposals on the community charge is open to question, but I shall leave that point alone.

I dislike the ever-increasing complexity of the whole system, what with capping, penalties, targets, recycling, holdbacks, slopes and thresholds. I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his new appointment. He has worked in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, so he is used to dealing with green pounds, ecus and all that sort of thing. He will know how to deal with capping and penalties and he has a ready appreciation of all the matters before us.

I am anxious for clarification of the position regarding historic buildings and the possible liability of councils for them. I do not think that such liability would arise often, but would it be possible to make provision in the Bill to deal with it should it occasionally occur?

9.10 pm

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): There are just 10 minutes left before the winding-up speeches. [HON. MEMBERS: "Five minutes."] Conservative Members should not get too excited, or it really will be 10 minutes.

A lot of phrases have been used in the debate. We have referred to the need of the people. I think that we all agree that local expenditure should be directed to meeting need. Opposition Members are concerned with establishing who determines that need. It is local people who determine the need and who vote each year for their local authority representatives to decide how that need is to be met.

Let us consider what has happened since 1979. It should not be forgotten that the problem with local government has been central Government. Each and every year since 1979, central Government have eroded local authority grants. That is what has caused local government problems. Even in the face of that, local government wanted to be left alone and said, "Let central Government determine their grant and let us go to local people and say how we propose, with that grant, to supply their needs." That did not satisfy central Government.

Only two great bodies of people are in the way of the Government's attempts to move control away from local government. One is the trade union movement, against which the Government have repeatedly legislated; the other is local government itself, against which they have legislated continually. It does not take much imagination to realise that in the case of Salazar's Portugal, Franco's Spain and Hitler's Germany such moves led to the establishment of totalitarian states, and that is what we need to guard against.

Schedule 2, paragraph 6(1) says:

> "For the purposes of paragraph 4 above Z is a figure which is 1 or, if the Secretary of State so provides," the figure can be two. The schedule further states: "in deciding what figure to specify, the Secretary of State" may take into account various factors. Paragraph 6(4) provides:

> "Sub-paragraph (2) above operates without prejudice to the generality of the Secretary of State's powers".

Paragraph 7(1) says that for the purposes of paragraph 4 the Secretary of State is to determine the figure. Paragraph 7(2) provides that the Secretary of State shall secure the aggregate, and paragraph 7(4) that the Secretary of State shall specify certain figures and principles.

Nowhere does the Bill say, "The Secretary of State shall discuss with local authority organisations what shall be done". The Bill is moving powers away from local government into the hands of central Government and that is why we protest against it.

Let us not kid ourselves about the poll tax. It is not about local authority accountability to the people. By its very nature, it takes accountability away from local councils. All this talk about improving accountability through the poll tax is hogwash. It is concerned with much else, but not that. At present, local government provides 50 per cent. of the rate fund and the Government provide the other 50 per cent. Under the poll tax, the Government will provide 75 per cent. of the rate fund. Where, then, is the accountability?

In reality, local authorities will merely get the blame for what the Secretary of State does because the only thing that the Government want to do is to destroy local authorities.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): This debate is about a minor matter, although one would think, from the complaints of Opposition Members, that it was a large-scale change in local government finance. In reality, the Bill is merely a winding-up of the old system. It is reasonable and fair.

The ground rules have to be changed, and dates by which decisions have to be made have to be set because, without legislation, there is a risk that some unscrupulous local authorities will engage in bookkeeping exercises that are simply creative accounting. They have become a way of life for some local authorities. How else did Camden arrive at a £15 million gap in its budget? How else did Brent arrive at a similar position? They lived beyond their means and creative accountancy became a way of life. They did that not because they wanted to protect local services or because they were desperate to do something about bad housing, but to avoid making difficult decisions.

Labour-controlled councils have put off the difficult decisions. They have said, "Perhaps we can pay tomorrow. We can think about how to live within our means later." That is how it has been in Bradford.

We have heard much about Bradford today. The incoming Conservative administration has taken the bull by the horns and said, "We have to make these decisions on behalf of people in Bradford. Without them, the long-term suffering will be greater." In one respect, we have not heard enough from Opposition Members about Bradford. "I would have thought that after all that has happened during this week we would have heard at least a few words condemning what has happened to the council in Bradford from the other side this week. I would have thought we would have heard a few words from the Opposition Benches—perhaps from the Labour Members for Bradford city—about the intimidation, the lies and the innuendoes that have been spread about the leaders of the Conservative-controlled council, perhaps condemning the Labour Opposition leader in Bradford who even quoted those lies and innuendo inside the council chamber, even though he must have known when he said it that what he was saying was simply not true."

Opposition Members have not said that they regret what happened in Bradford. Perhaps they do not regret it. Perhaps they ought to regret it. Perhaps they ought to regret the fact that the 68-year-old lord mayor had to have a police guard. The fact that they have not mentioned any of those matters means that we must conclude that they approve of what has happened and that their political friends organised it.

The Bradford revolution, as it has been called, is about protecting services. It will protect people in the long run by making difficult decisions now. If Opposition Members want proof that the Bradford Conservatives are ensuring the future of their city—enabling industry to thrive, creating jobs and wealth and providing better services—they have only to consider the parallel decisions being made by the London borough of Brent. The contrast proves that those who do not make difficult decisions are eventually forced to make them, whereupon they are harmful to local people. The Labour party is culpable. It has done deliberate harm to people in areas where it has political control. The Conservatives in Bradford are protecting people in Bradford.

Labour Members are worried about something that Councillor Pickles said at the Conservative party conference. He said:

"If we can do it in Bradford, we can do it anywhere."

He is right. If they can protect their services and transform the economy in Bradford by what they do in the council chamber, it can be done in any of the other northern cities. I believe that the Labour party is desperately worried about what will happen to its vote in those areas when people see the success that Eric Pickles and his colleagues will bring to the economy, understand what they are doing and vote that council into a majority so that it can continue with those successful policies.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): The hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) described this issue as a minor one. That point reflects the general view of Tory Members who consider the financing of local government to be a minor issue. The Bill, which represents a further cut in the rate support grant, and tightens the regulations restricting capital expenditure by local government, is a deliberate move to prevent local authorities from embarking on expenditure to provide the services needed by the people served by local government. There is no doubt that the Bill seeks to portray the way in which the poll tax will apply and at the same time to discredit the present rating system. It restricts local authorities in improving the environment and providing the services that people rely upon in the cities, towns and villages throughout England and Wales.

The Bill is cruel and dishonest and does nothing for local government. The Minister referred to changing the grant title to the needs grant. All we require now is to add to that the resources element and we shall be back to where we were in the 1950s and 1960s when the rate support grant was made up of needs and resources elements.

Will the Minister identify how the needs of local authorities will be determined? If we are to end the present system and introduce something in its place, there should be some explanation as to how we are to identify the needs of various authorities. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) spelt it out that local government is about differences, about different areas having different needs and requiring different services. Local government is about differences. Therefore, hon. Members—particularly Opposition Members—those who serve local government and those who rely upon its services are interested to know how the Minister will determine the needs element within the new formula.

The Bill is cruel and dishonest and does nothing to improve the environment. At the Tory conference the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State, Ministers and Conservative Members declared that they care about the environment, but to say that they care about the environment without providing the resources to protect the environment is cruel and dishonest. People expect their streets to be cleaned. They expect to have street lighting, which is important in our towns and villages. Local authorities and their planning departments must be able to tackle the dereliction in our towns and cities. Greater consultation and public involvement in planning matters which influence people's destiny must be a part of local democracy. The Bill does nothing to meet the call for greater public participation in planning issues.

The hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman), who is not in her place, suggested that councillors and people working in local authorities should have no influence and that a few contractors should decide the level of services to be provided. The hon. Lady also said that in some areas there have been increases of up to 9 per cent. and that that is deplorable. She did not say anything about the fact that water authorities have increased their expenditure by 9, 10 or 11 per cent. over the past few years. I wonder what she will say about the Yorkshire water authority, which is planning to increase its charges by 27 per cent. in the coming year. What will Conservative Members say about accountability and about the fact that people's money is being spent? What will Conservative Members say about such increases, which are simply to justify privatisation?

It is cruel and dishonest to deny local authorities the right to better monitoring, inspection and enforcement of pollution control. The Bill acts against the better protection of the environment by local authorities.

Waste disposal, particularly hazardous waste disposal, is a major responsibility for local authorities. People are concerned about where waste is dumped and how it is disposed of. Their concern is greater than ever before. Since the Government took office the importation of hazardous waste to Britain has increased ten times. The Bill restricts the ability of local authorities to employ the necessary trained people to carry out monitoring of pollution control. Hon. Members should do more than pay lip service to concern for the environment. That is cruel and dishonest. Words are cheap.

Mr. Redwood: How much extra money would the Labour party suggest should be spent and how would it be allocated?

Mr. O'Brien: It would not be for a Labour Government to decide the needs of local authorities. That is our point. The local authorities should determine their own needs. Local government should be provided with adequatee resources, properly trained manpower and back-up services to ensure that the environment is protected.

The Government have cut pollution research staff by 42 per cent. Reported cases of water pollution have increased by two thirds since 1980. Two of the most serious environmental issues causing concern to communities are noise and dirt. The problems are not restricted to inner city areas or Labour-controlled authorities.

Local government is concerned not only with hazardous waste disposal but with waste disposal in general. Because of the financial restrictions that the Secretary of State has imposed on them, local authorities must cut corners and, in many instances, act against the best interests of the environment.

It is significant that Tory-controlled North Yorkshire county council is intending to turn a beauty spot in the North Yorkshire national park into a refuse dump. The reason given is that it would cost £175,000 a year to provide an alternative means of refuse disposal. It would prefer to dump refuse in the North Yorkshire national park than to provide an alternative means of disposal costing £175,000 a year. If the Bill is passed and we approve the Secretary of State's proposal to change the allocation of rate support grant, North Yorkshire county council stands to be robbed of £8·6 million over two years.

Mr. Patnick: Has the North Yorkshire national park any planning controls, or are they vested in the North Yorkshire county council?

Mr. O'Brien: I should have expected the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) to be aware that the planning department of North Yorkshire county council overrides the planning committee of the North Yorkshire national park. If the hon. Gentleman is as concerned as Labour Members about this matter, he should make representations to Ministers:

As I said, North Yorkshire county council stands to be robbed of £8·6 million over two years. Suffice it to say that the money that will be held back would provide a tipping area or alternative for refuse disposal for 50 years. That is the measure of the way in which the Bill will attack local government.

The position in north Yorkshire is dramatically heightened by the comments of the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), whose constituency is so near to the rubbish tip that this weekend he said:

> "I am a little concerned about the use the county council has made of its powers to override the national parks committee."

I hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will say that during the by-election next year.

Much of the debate has centred on the problems in Bradford. My hon. Friends representing Bradford constituencies have made it clear that the programme being carried out there by the Tories has not been put to the electorate. Nowhere in their manifesto was reference made to £830,000 being cut from the social services budget. Nothing was said about the selling off of 15 old people's homes and the old people in them. Nothing was said about the massive charges for the meals-on-wheels service. If Conservative Members have democracy at heart, they should give Bradford's people the opportunity to go to the polls next year and test the programme that is being put forward. There is little difference between the Tories in Bradford and North Yorkshire and the Secretary of State. They are out to destroy local government and, in the process, commit the environment to untold damage and destruction. The Bill effectively adds to that process.

Practically every hon. Member who has spoken referred to Bradford, including the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire), who praised the Bill. Is he aware that, under the Bill, Spelthorne council stands to lose £64,000 and Surrey county council £9·5 million?

Mr. Wilshire: If the hon. Gentleman wants to talk about my borough council, perhaps he should make it clear that it has managed to cut its rate by 73 per cent. this year and is now providing better services. That is the truth.

Mr. O'Brien: And still Spelthorne council loses £64,000 and Surrey county council £9·5 million because of the Bill. Will the Minister include in the needs element the flooding to which the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) referred? Such issues should be included.

The continuing migration to rural areas is causing concern to local authorities in terms of access, communications and housing. There is also the matter of law and order in the cities and towns, but particularly in rural towns where the police forces are stretched to the limit. My hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr dwelt at length on the amount of money that will be cut from the police committees' budgets if the Bill is passed in its present form. I hope that we shall be given answers to my hon. Friend's questions.

If we consider the holdback of rate support grant in 1987-88 and 1988-89, we realise the dramatic effect that there will be on police authorities. I should like to add to some of the points made on this important issue. The Northumbria police authority is robbed of £272,000 in the first year and £660,000 in the second year. The West Midlands police authority is robbed of £750,000 in the first year and £1·8 million in the second year. The West Yorkshire police authority is robbed of about £500,000 in the first year and £1·33 million in the second year. All the police authorities will lose if the Bill remains in its present form. The Metropolitan police are robbed of £4·6 million in the first year and £11·3 million in the second year. If Conservative Members are sincere about law and order, they will realise that to vote for the Bill is to vote down the resources which the police authorities require to maintain law and order.

Tory-controlled local authorities will be robbed of £134 million because of the proposals introduced by the Secretary of State on 7 July. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) referred to the wonderful work that is done in Nottingham. The people of Nottingham must be made aware that, under the Bill, the county council will lose £9·8 million and Nottingham city council £492,000. It is true that the decision on the future of Nottingham will be made on Thursday. I hope that hon. Members will be honest and will tell the people of Nottingham the exact consequences of voting Tory.

Among those authorities, North Yorkshire county council will lose some £8·8 million, the authorities in the Humberside region will collectively lose £260,000 in the first year and £725,000 in the second and those in North Yorkshire will lose £175,000 in the first year and £391,000 in the second, with Richmond council being robbed of £47,000 and Harrogate of £152,000. Bradford is robbed of £3·7 million, so one can readily understand why the Tories who have taken over that authority are selling off old people in their homes to make up the void created by the Bill.

I trust that answers will be forthcoming to the questions that have been asked about this attack on local authorities, and I hope that Conservative Members will take note of the dramatic effect that the Bill will have on their authorities and join us in voting against the Bill.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Virginia Bottomley): I hope that the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) will bear with me if I turn down his invitation to walk round the North Yorkshire national park with him and instead refer to the matters at hand in the Bill.

Most hon. Members with experience of rate support grant matters have given a warm welcome to the Bill, which heralds, if not the end of the present rate support grant system, at least the beginning of the end. We still have the 1989-90 settlement to come. The Bill is principally designed to tidy up loose ends from the present system before the community charge system is introduced from 1 April 1990 in England and Wales. The House has recognised that the new system will encourage greater local accountability and will be easier to understand than the present arrangements. In the words of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning, there should be no taxation without comprehension. The community charge also removes the unfairnesses of the present rating system. Local government's attention is moving away from rate support grant to revenue support grant, but I think that we all welcome my right hon. Friend's suggestion that we should refer to it as the needs grant, which makes it absolutely clear how the new system will work.

From April 1990, an authority's grant entitlement will be fixed in relation to its spending needs and will not depend on the level of expenditure incurred. That feature of the new system has been widely welcomed and the Bill paves the way for the new fixed grant arrangements. Local authorities have generally welcomed our proposal that grant should be fixed in relation to expenditure for 1989-90, which will provide them with certainty about their grant entitlement and assist them in making their budgets. The Department will shortly be issuing a consultation paper setting out full details of our proposals for next year. Having only recently turned from being a poacher to being a gamekeeper in this regard, I speak most strongly about the need for local authorities to be able to plan for the future and to know where they stand. The Bill opens the way for that to happen.

It was inevitable that at some point we would need to act to bring the present system to a close. Otherwise, we should have had to ask the House to approve a string of supplementary reports concerned with the present system until well into the 1990s. For those in local government, for central Government and for community charge payers alike, it is better to make a clean break with the past before the new system comes in, and local authorities have generally accepted the logic of our arguments about the principles underlying the intention to close down the present rate support grant system. The rules that we have put forward are clearcut and impartial and, so far as anything in this area can be, they are understandable. They are based on sound principles. The rules, which are set out in detail in the Bill, are based on total expenditure information with the Department by 7 July. That is not just any information available. It has been certified by chief financial officers as being the best estimates available to the best of their knowledge and belief. The Bill provides for common rules that apply to all authorities. The expenditure figures on which grant will be calculated are not the result of the Department exercising substantial discretion. The rules produce figures that provide a clear and unambiguous basis for the payment of grant and they are accepted by local authorities——

Mr. Michael rose——

Mrs. Bottomley: If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me, I hope to come to the points that he raised, but I need to make progress before getting there.

The hon. Members for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), for Truro (Mr. Taylor) and for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) made the surprising suggestion that the legislation was being rushed through, and said that they resented that. I should have thought that all local authorities would welcome a firm end to the current system so that they would know where they stood and could plan for the future. Local authorities frequently complain about not having known the arrangements until they were already far down the budget system. If we had waited until the next parliamentary Session to introduce the Bill, the reports could not have been debated until February or March at the earliest. That would have been far too late to give local authorities certainty about their grant entitlement for the next year in time for their budget-making.

We intend to issue a consultation paper on next year's settlement during November and to make the settlement itself before Christmas. Local authority associations certainly do not want the settlement delayed any longer than need be. They want the 1989-90 settlement made as soon as possible, and preferably in December, so that it can be debated in January.

The hon. Member for Truro asked whether 7 July was an appropriate date for close down. Most hon. Members accept the principles underlying our intention to close down the present RSG system, although some, like the hon. Gentleman, argued that 7 July was not necessarily the best date available. However, by 7 July all authorities bar two had provided the Department with total expenditure information about their budgets for 1988-89 and with revised budget information for 1987-88. It was requested that that information be in by 31 March 1988. Authorities have had a further three months in which to get the information to the Department.

In July my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced details of grant and provision to give local authorities an early indication of next year's RSG settlement. To make that announcement without indicating our intention to close down the present RSG system would have been misleading. It is now clear that the full amount of grant—£13,575 million—will be paid to authorities next year when grant will no longer depend on expenditure. Delaying the announcement of close down beyond the end of July would have meant that we could not announce details while the House was sitting.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: What will happen to those local authorities that have not yet approved their final accounts, and where major decisions affecting those accounts had been taken prior to that date? Will the Government take that into account? Those authorities had already taken those decisions, but, if I understand the Minister, they would not be taken into account by the Government.

Mrs. Bottomley: The most straightforward way to proceed is to set a cut-off point by which the Department decides the information must be provided. Once we open the door to exceptions and special cases and take into account whether local authorities have made decisions, we open the door also to every sort of indecision. Every constituency would have a special plea and a special case and the matter would never be settled. We would be perpetuating the present system of supplementary reports year after year as special cases were found. We must find a way to move forward.

Mr. Michael rose——

Mrs. Bottomley: I shall not give way. I am about to deal with some of the hon. Gentleman's points.

The hon. Member for Perry Barr, supported by the hon. Member for Normanton, claimed that the Bill would deprive local authorities of £500 million grant in 1988-89. He quoted a series of figures. I wonder whether hon. Members think that they are real figures. They are, in fact, hypothetical. They were taken from a parliamentary answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to a hypothetical question from the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). They are not based on the actual provision of individual authorities. The hon. Gentleman invented a figure and asked my right hon. Friend what would happen if it were to apply. The return figures were produced, and then the hon. Gentleman applied them generally. He has been caught out. The sum of £500 million is the amount of grant forgone this year, because local authorities, in aggregate, have spent about 4·5 per cent. more than was allowed for the RSG settlement. It is quite unrealistic to assume that, in due course, outturn figures will show that authorities have underspent their budgets by that amount. I accept that, traditionally, local authorities underspend against budgets, but not to that extent.

My hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire), who has great knowledge of such matters, asked for an assurance about any errors that may emerge in the rate support grant settlement. The Bill fixes one component of the grant calculation—expenditure. The other components, particularly the assessment of spending needs, will be set out in the main RSG report. We hope that no supplementary reports will be needed for 1989-90, but the Bill does not prevent one being made if we discover that some adjustment is necessary.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) asked further questions. He particularly asked what would happen to local authorities that receive no block grant, and whether they will receive support for preparing for the introduction of the community charge. I am glad to answer that authorities that administer the community charge will receive an additional specific grant in the form of the £55 million that my right hon. Friend announced last week.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) mentioned Cardiff city council. He argued that the Secretary of State for Wales gave a commitment that any reduction in expenditure in 1987-88 would result in an increase in grant. He alleged that the Bill breaches that commitment. Let me make the position clear. The Secretary of State gave that undertaking in December 1986, and repeated it in March 1987. The four authorities set their budgets for 1987-88. The authorities had the chance to take it into account when drawing up their plans for 1987-88 and in making their returns to the Welsh Office in spring 1987. The authorities had a further opportunity to report reduced expenditure in spring 1988, when treasurers reported their provisional outturn for 1987-88. Therefore, there was a full 18 months during which authorities could report their lower expenditure for the year concerned. The majority of Welsh authorities did so.

Many hon. Members have spoken today as though they were re-fighting the Odsall by-election in Bradford. We have heard from the hon. Members for Bradford, North (Mr. Wall), for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) and for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), and we have heard from my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Michael: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that it is a point of order.

Mr. Michael: The Minister is misleading the House on the——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Ministers do not deliberately mislead the House.

Mr. Michael rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman may disagree, but it is not a point of order.

Mr. Michael: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs. Bottomley: I thank you for saving my reputation, Mr. Speaker. Ministers do not deliberately mislead the House—certainly not early in their careers. The hon. Gentleman is mean-spirited. I have devoted more time to responding to him than I have to many of my hon. Friends.

Mr. Michael: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suspect that it may still be a point of disagreement.

Mr. Michael: No, Mr. Speaker. I wish to make it clear that I did not suggest in any way that the Minister was deliberately misleading the House. I said that what she said was wrong. I shall happily help her if she will allow me briefly to intervene. She is misleading the House.

Mr. Speaker: Whether the Minister gives way is up to her.

Mrs. Bottomley: I was planning to say that I hope that the hon. Gentleman will have many opportunities to pursue this point in Committee. There are many Welsh alleyways. At the moment, I should like to refer to Bradford.

My hon. Friends the Members for Spelthorne, for Shipley (Sir M. Fox), for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham), for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) and for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) have referred to Bradford, where a brave group of councillors are beginning to try to set the city in order. It is a sign of the times that it is so newsworthy and a subject of such great public interest that setting Bradford to right, rather than all the difficulties it got into in the past, seems to make headlines. Opposition Members seem to have been suggesting that in some way decisions properly taken by a democratically elected council are the responsibility of the Government. We applaud any effort by local authorities, whatever their political persuasions, to provide their own people with better——

Mr. Allen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If there were to be a tied vote this evening, would you remind the House which way you would cast your vote?

Mr. Speaker: That really is a hypothetical question.

Mrs. Bottomley: I understand that it has been suggested that the use by the lord mayor of his casting vote was in some way improper. I draw the attention of Opposition Members to the fact that the Local Government Act 1972 provides that if there is an equality of votes the person presiding at the meeting shall have a second or casting vote. Similar provisions have been enshrined in local government legislation since at least the turn of the century.

We applaud the effort to promote competition and to contract out services. It offers an especially good opportunity for obtaining value for money. My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) referred to Nye Bevan house. It is interesting that Opposition Members give so much attention to the prospect of selling old people's homes when some of the greatest abuses of recent years in old people's homes have involved homes owned and run by local authorities.

Do Opposition Members not wish savings to be made? Do they want Bradford ratepayers to have to continue to shoulder the burden of the sixth highest local rate of any of the 36 metropolitan districts? Bradford receives a great deal of support from central Government. For example, it received £151·5 million in block grant this year, which was £40 million more than in 1987-88. It has an urban programme allocation of £4·5 million, of which £3·2 million has already been approved. Further resources within the allocation will be released if the council comes forward with suitable proposals. European Commission approval for support of Bradford's integrated development operation of just over £50 million is expected shortly.

The hon. Member for Perry Barr referred to the role of local government. We would agree with much of what he said, but we also have a radical, modern and new view of local government. We believe that local government should be a facilitator and enabler, not necessarily the provider of services. We believe that local authorities can control so much better what they themselves do not necessarily organise. We are opposed to municipal aggrandisement. We look for a system of local government finance that will ensure the long sought-after accountability of local authorities to local people.

The complexity and intensity of contributions to the debate provides yet further evidence, not that more is needed but that the time is long overdue to bring the present unwieldy system of central Government financing of local authorities to a speedy and final close. The time and effort spent by the House, councillors, local authority finance officers and long-suffering officials at Marsham Towers, and even newly appointed local government Ministers, in mastering the intricacies of the present system can scarcely be justified. In a number of local authorities so much effort is directed, with the help of some City institutions, towards manipulating the grant system to produce the greatest short-term advantage to the local authorities at the expense of the national taxpayer. Often this is understandable. This time and energy would be more appropriately spent on ensuring that necessary local services are delivered in a cost-effective and efficient manner that provides value for money.

We have heard of efforts made by local authorities to reduce expenditure. This bodes well for the chargepayers of the future. Those who complain that their virtue is not being sufficiently rewarded by the Government's proposals to bring the present system to a timely and orderly end will be gratified that the major intention of our future system of local government finance is that such measures should be directly apparent to the chargepayers so that their virtue may be rewarded at the polls.

Some of the efforts to reduce expenditure reflect the sincere attempt to get to grips with local authority spending. Others seem to be more ingenious than genuine. It is not entirely clear who owns Camden's lamp posts, let alone its library books and municipal art collection. We know that a French bank was reported to have bought its parking meters. It is bookkeeping transactions or financial deals which are unrelated to true spending and which alter the level of reported total expenditure but which gain Government grant that we seek to prevent in our proposals. It is especially necessary that the close down of the present system offers a unique opportunity—[Interruption.] The Bill deserves the support of the House.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Foreign Marriage (Amendment) Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Neubert.]

Rate Support Grants Bill [Money]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Rate Support Grants Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to that Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other Act.—[Mr. Neubert.]

10.14 pm

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I do not think that we should allow money resolutions to go through on the nod. There may well be some public expenditure involved. The resolution that we are debating authorises

"the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to that Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other Act."

However, the financial effects of the Bill are not clearly set out in the explanatory and financial memorandum. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will hon. Members beyond the Bar please leave quietly?

Mr. Cryer: These are important matters, Mr. Speaker, and I am grateful for your attention.

The relevant paragraph states:

"The Bill will require calculations and estimates of individual authorities' block grant entitlements to be based not on their total expenditure but on the relevant amount as defined by the Bill."

The "relevant amount" is defined in schedule 1. The result is that the aggregate amount of block grant payable for the years 1985-86 to 1989-90 may be either more or less than if the block grant entitlements were based on total expenditure.

I want to know what the financial effects of the Bill, as calculated by the Department, will be. Will more money be paid out? When the Minister opened the debate, I understood him to say that all the information has been received from the local authorities, apart from two. Therefore, the Department ought to have been able to calculate the financial effects of the Bill. I accept that the Department cannot be precise, but it ought to be able to provide some information.

The paragraph on the financial effects of a Bill usually says that it will cost, say, an additional £15 million or £20 million. Occasionally that amount cannot be calculated, and then it is a matter for the House. This paragraph is not the clearest that has ever been contained in an explanatory and financial memorandum. Will the financial effects of the Bill enable the £38 million that an all-party delegation that visited the Department of the Environment asked should be paid to Bradford to be paid? Bradford has been the subject of considerable debate. The point has been made repeatedly that, according to the local authority's calculations, £38 million has been denied to Bradford over a period of three years. Should a calculation of that kind be included in the financial effects of the Bill?

Bradford will suffer a cut of £3·7 million because of the Bill. Some local authorities will benefit from it, but it appears that most local authorities will suffer a cut. Bradford, with the Right-wing Tory clique in control, faces difficulties. The Tories appear to have been taken over by Right-wing extremists. I hope that traditional members of the Tory party—the one-nation group, or the wets as they are contemptuously described by the Prime Minister—will exert themselves in Bradford and stand out against these onerous and vicious attacks on the people of Bradford.

Bradford will face a cut of £3·7 million. On top of the cuts for all local authorities, the general financial effect will be a cut in Government expenditure. I understand the reason for the money resolution. If there should be an unauthorised increase in expenditure, the Government will have to come back to the House for that authority, so it is convenient for them to obtain that authorisation now. However, I should like to know what the precise effects will be, how much money is involved and whether the £38 million that is due to Bradford will be paid.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I am pleased to hear the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer). There is no doubt about it: what he says is quite true. There will be massive cuts. I hope that the Minister for Housing and Planning is listening, rather than reading and talking, because we have a credible Opposition over here. Now the Minister is laughing because he finds that funny. We are a credible Opposition talking seriously about a serious problem. I wish that the Minister would not talk to his hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, but that he would listen to what is being said.

We are talking about the problems of local authorities. I am afraid that, although we have a Conservative-controlled local authority in the city of Nottingham, on Thursday the Conservatives will lose control of that council and we shall then be able to put things right in Nottingham.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South is right about the cuts that the Government have made in local authority grants, which seriously affect the services provided by those authorities. Earlier today the Minister would not give way to me. He is going to get it now. He stood there like Maria Heep. [HON. MEMBERS: "Who is Maria Heep?"] When they sit round the table in the Department, they are all like Maria Heep, looking to see where they can cut and cut and seriously affect our local authority services.

I come now to a very serious point——

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Hear, hear.

Mr. Haynes: That fellow has not been here very long. Some of us have been here a long time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. He is not "that fellow". He is an hon. Member.

Mr. Haynes: I accept your ticking off, Mr. Speaker, as always. The hon. Gentleman has not been here very long. Some of us who have been here a long while know how the House works under the Conservative Government. The hon. Gentleman supports the Government, although it will be interesting to find out whether he supports them tomorrow night.

My local authority strives very hard, under the difficult circumstances created by cuts in the rate support grant, to provide the necessary services. The Minister does not seem to realise that, whereas we used to have nine coal mines in my constituency, we now have only four. The mines made a massive contribution in rates. Now that money has gone and this lot have not made it up. In Ashfield we are struggling to provide the necessary services, and now the lads are having to sit around the table because of the law that this lot have passed and because of decisions that they have made. My colleagues are having to try to find ways of cutting services that they should be providing. They were providing the services before 1979. The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) should not look surprised.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South) rose——

Mr. Haynes: I see that I have drawn him.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: It would be quite wrong to allow the House to think that when a mine closes the local authority loses rates and that jobs are lost. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the site of the Wilford pit, in my constituency, which was closed, now accommodates the Queen's industrial estate, which employs four times as many people as ever went down the pit.

Mr. Haynes: I did not mention jobs. I simply talked about the rate support grant and said that the industry paid rates which were lost when the pits closed.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Is my hon. Friend aware that what the hon. Member for Nottinghamshire, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) said does not apply in all areas? In my constituency, there were eight pits before the miners' strike and there is now one, and no jobs have been put in their place——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a debate on the money resolution, not about jobs.

Mr. Haynes: That is right. That is why I steered clear of the subject. I was not going to have you pull me up again, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member for Nottinghamshire, South drew me into the subject as he mentioned Wilford pit, which is in his constituency. When that pit closed, there was a Labour Government. We made it right when the pit closed. This lot do not. Services have to be cut. My colleagues in Ashfield have to see what services they can cut to come into line with the laws that this lot make. I am talking about the Government. I could say many things about the right hon. Lady at No. 10, but I shall not wander off the money resolution. No doubt there will be other opportunities to talk about her. I have always tried to stay within the rules of the House and your strictures, Mr. Speaker.

The Government have cut ever since I have been here. I came here when they came to power. Like many others, my local authority is struggling to provide services. Ministers and the Prime Minister say regularly that some local authorities are overspending. I am making out a case for my local authority, which has lost money in two ways. First, it has lost as a result of pit closures. Five pits have gone, so there is a lot less money coming in to provide services. Secondly, the Government have cut rate support grant.

How does the Minister expect my colleagues in Ashfield to provide necessary services? They have difficulty standing still, never mind providing the additional services that are required. When the Minister spoke on Second Reading, he would not give way to me and give me an opportunity to put my case to him. He was frit. He did not know what was coming. He looked at me and said, "I am not giving way to the hon. Member." It will be there in Hansard. I said that I would have a word with him outside, but the money resolution has given me an opportunity to put my case to him now. I am looking for some answers.

I know that the Minister has moved from the agriculture Ministry. He was supposed to look after wild animals while he was there, but he did not do a very good job. I hope that, now he has moved, he will help my local authority to overcome some of its financial difficulties. I do not want the Minister to sit on his backside and say nothing. He should let me know what he will do about it.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I am sad to note the lack of a Welsh Office Minister in the Chamber, as I want to return to a point that I raised earlier. Perhaps the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower) has rushed into the House to support my argument because of the way in which ratepayers in his constituency will be affected by the money resolution.

Does the money resolution take account of the likely legal costs of disentangling the arguments which are inevitable in view of the impropriety of the elements in the Bill to which I drew attention earlier and which were ignored in the Minister's winding-up speech?

In her summing up the Minister made great play of the benefits of certainty, as did her ministerial colleague earlier in the debate, and she referred to statements by the former Secretary of State for Wales and the Secretary of State for the Environment. Those statements offered certainty that the final grant decision made by the Government would be determined not by updated estimates, to which the hon. Lady referred, but by the actual money spent by the local authority. Those assurances were given in the House, without equivocation, there were no ifs and buts, yet the point was avoided during the debate and in the Minister's reponse. Both Ministers made great play of the benefits of certainty, but they offered the House all the predictive certainty of being told, "You were hanged yesterday, so would you kindly lie down in the coffin and stop making a noise about it?"

Cabinet Ministers gave assurances to the House about precisely how the system would operate. There is bound to be an argument, because the Bill seeks to overturn those explicit and clear assurances.

I spoke earlier of two local authorities that had met all the Government's requirements and more. How can Ministers come to the House and suggest that, somehow, a failure to answer a questionnaire, which was not about actual costs, but about estimated costs, which was not available until a couple of days before the statement in the House on 7 July, which did not require a response until the end of July, is the basis upon which they can change the rules overnight?

If there is any integrity among Ministers, they will accept my point and amend the Bill during its passage through the House. I hope to be able to welcome such a move at a later stage of the Bill, and not to have to worry about whether the money resolution caters for the inevitable arguments that will arise if they do not.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I want to ask the Minister some questions about the aspects of the money resolution that affect staffing, under the heading: "Public service manpower effects of the Bill."

[Mr. Tony Banks]

"Staffing effects' would be more appropriate wording. Having heard Ministers speak in many local government debates about staffing implications and reductions in the number of people employed within local authority areas because of the provisions passed here, none of which they have been prepared to quantify, will the Minister this evening tell us what staffing requirements will stem from the Bill?

The Bill states:

"There will be a small reduction in staffing requirements within central government"—

I trust that it will not affect the Minister's job, or that of his colleagues on the Government Front Bench—

"and there may also be a small reduction in the administrative work load of local authorities."

Will the Minister at least attempt to give us some idea of the numbers? Hopefully, he will be able to secure the information that he obviously needs. If the Bill says that there will be a small reduction, surely someone somewhere must have a figure for that.

I do not understand how a local authority such as Brent, which will suffer a £9 million loss because of the Bill, the London borough of Greenwich, which will suffer a £1·2 million loss, or the London borough of Southwark, which will also suffer a financial loss, will be able to reduce the number of staff required to administer the new system. As there is a large number of losers as well as gainers from the Bill, clearly the administrative problems of local authorities will be enormous. In those circumstances, when faced with a Government who keep changing the rules, making life more and more difficult for treasurers' departments, how on earth can the Minister justify the statement that "there may also be a small reduction in the administrative work load of local authorities."?

It sounds like pious hopes. As with so many other aspects of local authority legislation that we have unfortunately passed in the House, Ministers and Conservative Members have some ideas about what they would like to see in the future, but at the same time they are unprepared to—[Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) is disrupting my concentration. I cannot work out whether he wants to join the Conservative party or to impart important information. Perhaps he feels that the points that he made in his contribution need more detailed intercourse with the Minister and that is why he has crossed the Floor. If so, he places a low value on the power of his oratory, which we all value. I am sure that the Minister understood the points that he made without it being necessary for him to cross the Floor and explain in detail in his right ear.

The Minister will have to quantify the statement made in the Bill. We have heard so many promises from Ministers about the staffing implications and the impact of various aspects of local government legislation that the Minister cannot be surprised at the fact that we do not believe what we read in the Bill. Perhaps the Minister will explain what is meant in terms of numbers.

Mr. Pat Wall (Bradford, North): In making the financial calculations on the Bill I wonder whether the Minister has taken account of rent arrears in respect of local government finances. It is an important point. There have been cuts of £28·4 billion in central Government support to local government since 1970 and there is a growing problem of rent arrears. It has been calculated that Bradford has lost £80,000 a week in housing benefit. That means that we lose £4·1 million a year in benefits. Of that £80,000, £67,000 relates to local authority tenants and only £13,000 relates to private tenants. Because that money has not been paid, the poorest in our community have to spend money on rent that they would normally have spent on food, clothing and essentials. That has a multiplier effect in terms of a loss of expenditure in the city.

For the first time in Bradford's history council house rent arrears passed the £2 million figure some weeks ago. That has an enormous effect on the general standard of living, the general revenue of the council and the general welfare of the citizens of Bradford. The story is the same in other cities. Doncaster has one of the lowest levels of council house rent arrears. However, since the introduction of the new social security measures on housing benefit, debts in council house rents to the Doncaster local authority have increased by 50 per cent. On a television programme we saw and heard about a gentleman who was paying rent. The proportion that he had to pay had increased from £6 to £26. To ask an unemployed man to find an extra £20 a week is a harsh imposition.

Can the Minister give us some idea of the Government's views on that issue?

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): I shall respond to the reasonable comments of the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer). Until we have certain audited reports from local authorities, I cannot give him, as I think he realises, an exact final outcome. That is why we have a money resolution.

It may be that over the number of years concerned we will pay out rather more of taxpayers' money to local authorities than we would have done had we not made these changes. Any argument that people are losing or being cheated under these arrangements falls to the ground. We expect that over the years the amount paid out will be even-Stephen, but I cannot guarantee that. My guess is that it might be a little more than we expect. As long as it is not too much more I should be sympathetic, because it would prove that everything that I have said is true. The hon. Member for Bradford, South was right to raise the matter, and I hope the House will accept that as a reasonable assessment in advance of the audited reports.

The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) generously and politely explained that he would have to leave, but he has returned, so I shall say what I intended to say in the first place. I am sorry that I did not give way to him, not because of what happened thereafter—although I was glad that it happened openly rather than in the dark corridors of this building—but because I gave way generously to many hon. Members, and at some point one has to say no. I thought that he was mature enough an hon. Member—he said how long he had been an hon. Member—to take it in the way that it was intended. I have nothing against the hon. Gentleman, and we have crossed swords with pleasure——

Mr. Haynes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Normally, the Minister says "No, I am not giving way any more", but he said to me "I am not giving way to that hon. Member", which is different. I am asking the Minister to put things right.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. That was the last debate.

Mr. Gummer: If the way in which I refused to give way to the hon. Member for Ashfield caused him embarassment or remorse, I apologise. I very much enjoy crossing swords with the hon. Gentleman, but I refused to give way to two of his hon. Friends and I thought that it would have been invidious to pick him out after our long association in agriculture matters. I am pleased to note his interest in this subject, and I should not have liked to miss it.

The House is indebted to the hon. Member for Ashfield, because if he was not the hon. Member for Ashfield we might have had the present deputy leader of Nottinghamshire county council. Had that gentleman been chosen, although we would have done Nottinghamshire county council a favour, we would have rued the day to a degree that I should not like to contemplate.

The Conservative-controlled city of Nottingham—I am trying to apply this closely to the money resolution—has done much good for its people. I was lucky enough to see the extremely good refurbishment of council houses, which it now takes five weeks to complete instead of a year. Young couples are able to obtain council houses, which is an opportunity that they would never have had if the Socialists had been in control. I disagree with the comments of the hon. Member for Ashfield about one of the best-run councils in the United Kingdom. I am sad that the hon. Gentleman—a man of such upstanding and outstanding worth—should have looked forward to linking arms with a Communist to control the city——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Now perhaps we can get to the money resolution.

Mr. Gummer: I was coming to that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The money resolution has been attacked by the hon. Member for Ashfield, who said that the closure of nine coalfields would have an effect on——

Mr. Haynes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I did not refer to the closure of nine pits. I referred to the closure of five out of nine.

Mr. Gummer: I am sorry—the closure of five out of nine coal mines. That meant that the rates that would have come from those five hypothecated coal pits would no longer come to the local authority. That is true. But the rate support grant that is given to the local authority is adjusted to take account of the reduced local resources. The hon. Member for Ashfield always wants to have it both ways. I now see that I should have given way to him. That would have been a useful point to make in the middle of a debate that was perhaps even better attended than this one.

It was a pity that the hon. Member for Ashfield referred to laws that "that lot"—the Conservatives—had passed. These are not laws that we have passed. They are laws that Parliament has passed. It is important in a democracy to accept that, when Parliament has decided, we have all decided and we all obey those laws. We now have an Opposition who say that they do not pay taxes that they do not like, who advise other people not to pay taxes that they do not like, and who do not sack Opposition spokesmen who promote that view. Therefore, the hon. Member for Ashfield is only taking his cue from his leader.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) asked whether there would be extra payment for the legal costs of disentangling the arguments that would result from the money resolution. One reason for this simple stocktaking system is that we do not want to have vast legal costs and arguments to decide whether this or that audited report is right or wrong, or whether this or that date which this or that local authority decides is right is the right one. We have a simple system about which legal arguments cannot obtain, because it is what we received on 7 July. There is a good reason for doing that.

Cardiff city council had a very long time—well before it produced its budgets and well before 7 July was near—to make such adjustments to its spending as it thought suitable. It did not do so. I find it difficult to say that Ministers, the House and the whole of the United Kingdom must wait for Cardiff city council to decide at what point it will please it to meet the statutory requirements. It is not unreasonable, when all that time has been given, to take the figures that were given by the council's financial officer, and signed by him as the best estimates that he could give, as the figures upon which the Government could act. I cannot see that there is an alternative if one is moving from one system to another.

Mr. Michael rose——

Mr. Gummer: We are about to move into the Committee stage of the Bill and I do not wish to presume upon your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I have a suspicion that you might suggest that detailed discussions of the Bill's effect on Cardiff city council would be more appropriately dealt with when we come to the clause which covers that matter.

Mr. Michael rose——

Mr. Gummer: I am happy to continue arguing with the hon. Gentleman, but I have given way to him, if not four times, then certainly three, so I do not intend to do so again.

Mr. Michael rose——

Mr. Gummer: I gave way three times and my hon. Friend the Minister gave way once. That was four times in one debate. It is not unreasonable to complete this debate without giving way.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) talked about staffing resources. I do not have an exact figure. We have suggested that, with a system that most people can understand, it is likely that fewer people will be needed to organise it at local authority level than if it were complicated. That is all that has been carried out.

I cannot accept that it is reasonable for local authorities such as Brent to fail to deliver their figures months after the date on which they are supposed to do so. I cannot see that one can run a public authority on the basis that Greenwich runs its public authority when, after having repeatedly been asked for the figures, it still does not give them. Greenwich received the form for 1986-87 on 26 May for return by 31 July 1987, but had still not returned it by 7 July 1988.

How can we have accountability and a sensible system of running local authorities when people cannot produce a form a year after it is sent to them? A private business would be struck off the companies register if it behaved in that way. Someone would make it clear that it had to be done and would come round and collect the form. It is certainly not reasonable for the hon. Gentleman to complain that the Government should have allowed more time. We cannot give him the figures that he wants, because some authorities seem to find it difficult even to fill in a form on time.

I do not know how Brent intends to deal with this, just as we do not know how Brent intends to clean up the streets. The hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) is no longer present—I am sorry that Labour Front-Bench Members are not here to discuss the money resolution which their supporters regard as so important—but, in the light of his comment about people wanting their streets kept clean, I hope that he will go to Brent and see what happens when a Left-wing Labour authority cannot, and in certain areas says that it will not, keep the streets clean.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Gummer: No, I shall not give way. The hon. Member who made the point is not here, so he deserves to have it thrown back at him.

I was surprised to hear the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Wall) raise the subject of rent arrears, as one of our problems has been that Labour authorities have not called on people to pay the rent that is due. They have not collected the rents, and have very often then asked taxpayers elsewhere, in local authorities which have collected their rents, to make up the shortfall. That seems wholly unacceptable. The hon. Gentleman must look a little beyond Bradford and ask himself whether it is fair that other people should bear the burden of an authority that has failed to collect its own rents.

As for the hon. Gentleman's comments about the Social Security Act, we are spending more money on social security, not less, but we are concentrating that greater amount on those who most need it. The result, therefore, should be more regular payment of rents rather than less. It is only because of Labour party propaganda that anyone has used that Act as an excuse.

The battle in Bradford, and in many other places, is not so much about the town hall being run by one lot of people rather than another, but about whether it should be run by cosy arrangements with the unions or on the basis of value for money. If local authorities were run on the basis of value for money, the money would be available to provide the services that are necessary in so many areas. The hon. Member for Bradford, North will rue the day he raised the subject of rent arrears, because in this regard Labour authorities are the experts. It is they who have failed to collect the rents and then had the effrontery to ask the general taxpayer to pay for their incompetence and their uselessness.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): The debt counselling unit of Bradford citizens advice bureau has done an impressive job in reducing rent arrears by advising people how to manage their affairs more effectively, but the CAB is threatened with closure because the new Tory controlling group is threatening to remove its funding from the budget as well as refusing to provide additional funding for the debt counselling unit. We share the Minister's concern about the rent arrears and other debts that are building up as a direct result of Government credit policy. Will he therefore ensure that Bradford CAB receives the necessary support to continue its important work and that extra funding is made available by the Department of Trade and Industry to the CAB nationally so that people can be given more advice about managing their affairs, which will help to reduce the debts about which he and I are so concerned?

Mr. Gummer: Although I understand the hon. Gentleman, there appear to be two precisely opposite points. The hon. Member for Bradford, North said that the amount of rent arrears in Bradford had increased out of all proportion. The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) has asked me to congratulate the CAB on the reduction in rent arrears. It must be one or the other. I have great respect for the CAB, which is an extremely efficient body that works hard in my constituency. I do not know the precise arrrangements in Bradford for its funding because I believe in local government and I expect Bradford city council to make its own decisions on how to spend its ratepayers' money. Unlike the hon. Gentleman, I do not believe in central control over how local authorities make decisions.

Mr. Wall rose——

Mr. Gummer: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman because I have been very tough about his remarks.

Mr. Wall: Rent arrears in Bradford have risen to above £2 million for the first time. However, that does not conflict with what my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) said. Considerable efforts have been made to reduce that debt. The problems of debt arise, not because people deliberately want to defraud other citizens who are paying their rent, but because of the impossible position in which those people now find themselves.

I deliberately refer to Doncaster, which has a Labour administration. According to the Audit Commission, it has one of the best records for rent collection in the country. It is not the most prosperous area, but it has the Yorkshire tradition of meeting its bills. If rent arrears in Doncaster have risen by 50 per cent., it is a sign of real problems for families. The problem will be compounded even further by the increase in rents in Bradford well above the level of inflation, and in electricity prices nationally. It is really striking home that the CAB has had to put at least half its staff on to debt counselling, which shows that there is a real problem, not just some invention.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman must still face the fact that the Government have increased the amount provided for social security, but have directed it at those who are most in need. Therefore, those who were least able to pay their rents should now be able more easily to pay them. That is a fact of life. If hon. Gentlemen insist——

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone) rose——

Mr. Gummer: I shall not give way, as I have given way many times already during this debate, as I did in the previous one.

If we are to have a society in which we try to help those who are least well off, it means that those who can afford to pay their rents should be encouraged to do so as a matter of priority, rather than that being put at the bottom of the list.

Mr. Allen McKay rose——

Mr. Gummer: I shall not give way. I have already told the hon. Gentleman that.

It is clear that Labour authorities are less willing, less enthusiastic and less hard working in the collection of rents than are Conservative authorities. Until that is changed I shall take no lessons from those who fail to produce the figures, but who ask the remainder of the community—decent, hard-working people who pay their rents—to pay their rents in advance.

It being three-quarters of an hour after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business).

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Rate Support Grants Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to that Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other Act.

[Mr. Gummer]

Foreign Marriage (Amendment) Bill [Lords]

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time—[Mr. Neubert.]

10.59 pm

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): The Bill tidies up the legislation relating to marriages abroad. In their report on the subject published last year the English and Scottish Law Commissions decided against recommending a comprehensive reform of the choice of law rules relating to marriage, but, nevertheless, they considered that there was scope for detailed reform of some provisions of the Foreign Marriage Act 1892. The useful result is this small Bill. The schedule alone perhaps merits a footnote in the text books of constitutional history.

I am grateful to the House for the support that has been accorded to the Bill and to the Law Commissions for their endeavour, and I commend its Third Reading.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed, without amendment.

Road Traffic (Penalty Points)

11 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I beg to move,

That the draft Penalty Points (Alteration) Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 21st October 1988, be approved.

It is not just the law that has led this country to having the lowest road casualty rate of those countries that have cars and whose populations drink. In about 1983, in relation to population and the number of motor vehicles, Japan's casualty rate improved dramatically and, I think, led the world. It is generally recognised now that Britain is in the lead. Last year, our casualty rate dropped by 10 per cent. We had about a 5 per cent. reduction in casualties. In 1987, the number of people killed and seriously injured was reduced by about 5 to 6 per cent. There are many things to be grateful for.

What we cannot be grateful for is that road offences contributed to a large number of the 5,200 people who died and the 300,000 who were injured on our roads last year. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State set a target of cutting the number of casualties by one third by the year 2000, so that, within the next 11 years, we want to save about 1,700 lives and about 100,000 injuries a year.

There can be nothing more serious in transport than safety. During the last year or so, the House has heard about many transport safety issues. The House rightly gives attention to air safety, public transport safety, and safety at sea. Tragically, one can add up the deaths on other forms of transport but they would not amount to more than the number of road deaths in a month or two in a bad year. We cannot put names to the people who will die or be injured, but we know roughly how many child pedestrians, cyclists, car drivers, lorry drivers and so on will be killed or injured. The facts are too obvious and too serious to allow the present situation to continue.

I now refer to the role of the law. Obviously, the police have an important job in enforcement, but it is not purely in enforcement. They do a great deal of work in school road safety education. They are welcomed in most schools. I acknowledge that there is little political in road casualty reduction. The police do good work, road safety officers do good work, and many parents do what they can to encourage road safety training for children. I pay tribute to the media, especially local and regional media—radio, television and newspapers—who constantly return to what we can do to make safer our co-operative interaction on the roads.

There is a role for the courts, which is imposing penalties after due convictions. The purpose of the order is to increase penalty points for four road traffic offences. Those offences are careless or inconsiderate driving, failure to stop after an accident, failing to give particulars or report an accident, and driving without insurance against third party risks. The order, if passed, would come into effect on 1 March 1989.

The increases arise from recommendations in the report of the road traffic law review, the North report. I pay tribute to those who served on the committee. I recommend those who have an interest to read the report, which is closely argued and well presented in plain English.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): My hon. Friend has referred to the North committee, which reported in April, and he invited many outside bodies and organisations to comment on the report by September. My hon. Friend is bringing forward proposals that pre-empt any of the consultations which may or may not have taken place. In other words, he has not really given sufficient time for outside bodies to bring forward their views on the North report. Why is my hon. Friend being so hasty?

Mr. Bottomley: The North committee put out for consultation some initial views. My hon. Friend rightly says that the committee reported in April. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave his preliminary response to the North report on 26 July. In that was the decision to recommend to the House the four specific changes that are before us. Anyone who reads the 16th and 17th chapters of the North report will find the reasons for that.

My hon. Friend will recognise also that the Government are not putting to the House precisely what the North committee recommended. Our proposals incorporate more flexibility than that which the committee recommended. It is worth noticing also that the primary body with the most major concern is the Royal Automobile Club. As an associate member of the RAC, I lean rather more to the Automobile Association's views than those of the RAC, but I do not want to try to balance the numbers in either organisation.

We are trying to deal with the problems that arise from a range of careless or inconsiderate driving offences, along with failure to stop after an accident, failure to report an accident or give particulars of it, and driving without insurance against third-party risks. The issue is why there should be further delay if the House comes to the conclusion, as the North committee did, that these problems should be brought into the open.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Does my hon. Friend agree that one body that might have an interest in this matter is the Magistrates Association, whose members have to administer the law? What has the association's response been to these proposals, and what account has my hon. Friend taken of its views in coming to his conclusion?

Mr. Bottomley: I have taken fair account of the association's views and I have spent quite a lot of time with magistrates. I have not been able to get round to all the county associations, but when I was with 300 magistrates in a particular county, not one of them raised one of the four issues that are before us, even though the relevant announcement was made on 26 July.

I welcome the views that are submitted by the association, but I do not believe that there is a burning sense of injustice that the discretion that magistrates traditionally want, which was not recommended by the inter-departmental working party report in 1981, nor by the North committee, has not been given to them.

It is obvious to the majority, and certainly to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King), whose motoring interests are well known to me and to the House as a whole, that there are three opportunities for the exercise of discretion. Perhaps the middle one is not really discretion. The first opportunity rests with whether a motorist is charged. The police can issue an informal warning or a caution. The second opportunity lies with whether the court finds that an alleged offence is proved. The third opportunity arises when consideration is given to what the penalty shall be. It is worth noting that in none of these offences are we talking about immediate disqualification. Instead, we are discussing a range of penalty points.

If a motorist subsequently or previously accumulates penalty points, it is up to the court to exercise its discretion when determining what the period of disqualification should be. If a motorist feels that he has been unlucky in being charged and has been wrongly convicted, and has penalty points, he may have a sense of grievance. Such a case would require the magistrates to impose a period of disqualification which would be disproportionate to the various offences.

I do not think that anyone would claim that any particular range is necessarily precise or that no argument could be advanced for a wider range or for no range at all, so we should remove the discretion element. I submit that what is before the House makes sense.

It might be sensible if I were to end my introductory remarks now, listened to hon. Members' views and responded in greater detail later rather than trying to anticipate what might be said. There has been much discussion about undercharging and, in the Government's view, the careless driving offence should go to the top of the proposed range. I remind the House that the North committee recommended that any offence that would earn two penalty points would more properly be dealt with by a caution or a warning.

The number of people who fail to stop after an accident, possibly because of links to drink driving, has been rising. The failure to give particulars or report an accident where necessary is an important offence and can lead to a lack of compensation and redress for innocent parties in crashes. To drive without insurance is a serious office and the House should demonstrate that by accepting the proposed changes.

If there are points to which I should respond later, I will do so.

11.10 pm

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): The issue of consultation has already been raised by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) and I have considerable sympathy with his view. I do not think that it is satisfactory to come to the House and say that, because the Government's view was trailed, that is an excuse for not allowing the consultation process its full merit. It is worth considering what the North committee said about consultation. Paragraph 1.8 states:

"It was, in our view, very desirable to give the widest opportunity for that experience to be made available to us. For many people the use of the roads is the aspect of their lives where their own behaviour and the rules laid down by Parliament and enforced by the police most often come together. We took the view, therefore, that it was essential that road traffic law should command the widest possible support. This made it important that everyone concerned about the areas of road traffic law to which we were directed should have, and feel that they had had, an opportunity to convey their views to us."

I commend that principle to the Minister. Inevitably the way in which the public perceive the laws and penalties that Parliament imposes is of fundamental importance to the success with which our road traffic laws are operated.

On this occasion I am in the rather unusual position of agreeing essentially with the Government's proposals, but there is a real issue about consultation. I hope that in future the Department of Transport and the Ministers involved will accept that the public are more reassured by a proper consultation exercise and the belief that it takes account of a diversity of views even though inevitably in the nature of things where views are contrary some will have to be ignored.

I join the Minister in saying that many hon. Members view with some seriousness the fact that road traffic offences are seen in a different light from many other forms of behaviour that bring the individual into conflict with the law. There is a sense in which road traffic offences are seen as being morally neutral or acceptable. In passing laws, it is important that the House makes it clear that they are backed by the sanctions of Parliament and that, where offences have serious consequences for society in general, there can be no argument other than that the penalties should reflect the serious consequences.

The Royal Automobile Club wrote to all hon. Members, commenting on the changes that the order seeks to introduce, and perhaps it will help if I go through them one by one. Careless driving must be seen in the light of the North report's general comments—that that offence must be taken in the context of other changes that the report recommends.

It is a little unsatisfactory that we have a small measure before the House tonight when major legislation is, one assumes, to be delayed for at least one full Session. Perhaps the Minister will say what is in the Government's mind in introducing a more substantial review of the law in the light of the North report.

There will inevitably be some dissatisfaction if the present offence of reckless driving will, at the lowest level, attract only one penalty point more than careless driving. I do not want Conservative Members to imagine that I am over-sympathetic with the view that a nine-point penalty is not appropriate for careless driving. North and his colleagues clearly make the point that there are certain circumstances in which careless driving must be viewed as a very serious offence; they describe it as "a quite serious offence."

There are circumstances in which "a quite serious offence" merits an individual being subject to a penalty level that will take him three quarters of the way to disqualification, which is the argument put forward in the report. I should not want Conservative Members to assume that, because I sympathise with the view that we are in danger of having too narrow a differential between the offences of reckless driving and careless driving, I believe that the maximum penalty for careless driving should be altered. That, too, is a serious offence, and the nine-point penalty reflects that it is.

I accept the point made in the report and reiterated by the Minister that, at the lower level, if an offence is not worthy of at least three penalty points, the offender should not be required to appear before the courts. However, such a policy needs to be clearly defined by the Department and thoroughly understood by those responsible for its administration. It is at the point where people are brought before the court for a relatively trivial offence, and consequently feel a sense of injustice, that the law will cease to command the respect of the motoring public.

For the offence of failing to stop after an accident or failing to report one, the balance that is before the House tonight is about right. In most circumstances, that ought to be viewed as a serious offence. The RAC makes the point that there are circumstances in which failing to stop after or to report an accident may seem a trivial or technical offence. If it is the result of ignorance, then, as North comments, no offence can really be said to have been committed. Again, a purely technical or trivial offence ought not to merit court proceedings.

The alternative is the calculated offence of deliberately failing to stop after or to report an accident. It must be viewed seriously in the light of the increasing number of such offences, particularly the oft quoted example where the offender concerned has been drinking and driving, and whose failure to stop or report the accident is a way of getting round automatic disqualification.

I believe that I am correct in thinking that one of the reasons why the Government diverge from North in that respect is the way in which the law is structured. They insist that, rather than have a fixed penalty, it is necessary to substitute one range of penalties for another. Therefore, this Parliament has inevitably saddled itself with some slight untidiness in its primary legislation.

Driving without insurance should be viewed as a very serious offence. I do not feel that it can be argued that there is such a thing as a technical offence in this context. Failure to be insured should command little sympathy from hon. Members, for the consequences are potentially very serious for those who may be accident victims. I have little sympathy with the suggestion that a "technical offence" should receive a lower penalty. I consider that, if anything, the upper range is about right, although the courts will be able to use their discretion in applying a penalty of between six and eight points. But it must be firmly established that two offences of failure to possess adequate insurance cover would lead to disqualification, because it would be criminal folly for the offence to be repeated. In some circumstances, the deliberate failure to carry insurance should, in my view, lead to automatic disqualification, but that again would have to be taken into account by the courts.

It would be helpful if the Minister took us into his confidence and told us how the North report generally will be dealt with, and if he would comment specifically on consultation. As I have said, I have some sympathy with his hon. Friend the Member for Northfield, who has his own doubts about that aspect.

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): I consider tonight's proceedings very unsatisfactory. If I were speaking on behalf of all motorists, which I do not claim to do, I should feel that they, too, would think this an unsatisfactory way of handling a matter that is of such importance to so many people.

I share the pleasure of my hon. Friend the Minister at the reduction in the number of road casualties, but I would ask him—with respect for what he has done in this regard—if we could proclaim it a little less often. Circumstances in one country are so different from those in another, and it is a simple fact that 5,000 deaths a year are far too many. Perhaps if we increase the rate of congestion and reduce the speed of cars still further—I believe that the average in London is now 11 mph—we would reduce the number of road casualties even further. But the number of casualties is terrifyingly high, and I fear that we are tempting fate if we proclaim too often that we are better than other countries.

Why do I feel that today's debate is so unsatisfactory? Many motorists who break the law are often guilty of criminal behaviour—criminal in the fullest sense of the word. In many cases they should receive prison sentences for their crimes. Sometimes they do, but perhaps not often enough. Many others, however, are perfectly decent, ordinary citizens who are guilty of one error of judgment, or sometimes of technical errors.

Because there is such a range of difference between these people, I believe that we must always leave it to the magistrate to make the final judgment about whether they should receive a very severe or a very minor penalty. There is a difference between the technical and the criminal offence. That is where I disagree with the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd), particularly in regard to driving without insurance. It is a very serious offence, and in some cases a sentence of imprisonment may be appropriate, but in others it may be a technical matter. That is why I worry about the proposals that we are debating.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Will the hon. Gentleman nevertheless accept that even in the most technical offences the absence of insurance can have dramatic consequences for the victims of accidents, for instance?

Mr. Moate: I agree. We do not regard it as a serious enough offence. In some circumstances it should be treated very seriously, but please let us leave it to the magistrates to judge when such an offence is a technical one and when it merits further penalties. The maximum penalty is not enough, but we ought not to apply strict minimum penalties, as is done throughout the order, for a range of offences which sometimes are only technical.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Moate: No. I should like to make my general point. I do not intend to speak for very long.

The North report is tremendously important, but we have not debated it. The Government announced in July what they intended to do, and organisations were invited to comment by the end of September. A number of hon. Members have gleaned information about it, but only a very small number of hon. Members are here. We have picked up information from whatever sources are available to us. That is a most unsatisfactory way in which to debate very important matters. I am not attacking my hon. Friend the Minister. I know that he is passionately concerned about these matters. We must not, however, be cavalier or superficial, which we are becoming, simply because there is a large Government majority, with orders of this kind being carried almost automatically. We must not take the parliamentary procedure for granted. In this case we are in danger of doing so.

I feel very strongly about this issue. The penalties that we are allowed to impose are in many cases not severe enough. I fear that the order will provide an excuse for inaction rather than for action over road penalties. I am particularly concerned about the maximum penalties that magistrates can impose if people drive while disqualified —people whose activities are near-criminal, because they go on the road time and time again, although they have already been proved to be a menace to other road users. The same applies to people who drive time and time again without insurance. The magistrates do not have the power to impose sufficiently harsh penalties.

This minor order, which is defective in many ways, has been introduced late at night, without very much notice, and the House is taking very little notice of it. I do not believe that that is the way to deal with serious matters of this kind.

That is my general complaint. My specific observations are these. I should have liked the order to retain lower minimum penalties. I do not object to the higher maximum penalties. To drive while uninsured or while disqualified, and also careless driving and failing to stop after an accident, can be technical offences. In those cases, magistrates ought to have the power to take account of the circumstances and impose a lower penalty. If the minimum penalty imposed in such cases is so high, it might result, if another not very serious motoring offence is involved, in the disqualification of a driver who ought not to be disqualified.

It is all out of balance. Often we penalise, I shall not say the innocent, because nobody on the road is innocent; we are in charge of motor cars that can be dangerous. We cannot plead innocence or ignorance if we infringe the law. However, we often penalise disproportionately the decent citizen compared with the way in which we deal with the near-criminal person who disregards the law, takes his vehicle on the road and endangers other people's lives carelessly, frequently and time after time. The subject is worthy of much more debate. The order does not arouse my admiration.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): I welcome this attempt to distinguish between minor traffic offences and serious traffic crimes, in particular when unsafe and dangerous driving is involved. I am pleased that the legislation increases the penalties for careless driving—a charge that in practice is often laid because of the difficulty of identifying bad driving as reckless driving. It has often proved to be difficult clearly to define reckless driving, which warrants the imposition of stricter penalties than are imposed for genuinely careless driving.

Careless driving covers a variety of driving offences. If we provide a wider range of penalties, covering anything from leaving a junction without paying due care and attention to hitting a stationary vehicle, we are giving the courts flexibility to distinguish between different offences.

I take this opportunity briefly to raise an issue arising from an incident in my constituency. A Ministry of Defence lorry drove into a car carrying some of my constituents. The car had stopped at a junction and the traffic lights had been red for some time. My constituents tell me that they were told that the police no longer took action in such cases. That seems extraordinary. It is to be hoped that the order will go some way towards correcting the position. I am raising the matter in the meantime, and I hope that the Minister will feel able to comment on that general point. He is indicating that he will not, which is understandable, but I hope that we shall be able to get to the root of the matter, as it gives cause for considerable concern. In the case to which I referred, serious whiplash injuries were suffered, as well as major damage to the car, and it seems extraordinary that no action should have been taken.

[Mr. Matthew Taylor]

I have some reservations about the minimum penalty for failing to report an accident, which is being increased from four to eight points. I understand why some hon. Members say that it is a serious offence in many cases, but I agree with the hon. Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate) that that is not always so. It seems a somewhat questionable move to set the minimum level at eight points, given that the penalty for drunken driving is 10 points.

I feel very strongly about the penalties for lack of insurance. If we are to attach high penalty points to that offence—as I believe we should—we must be sure that people are made aware of the technical breaches that exist so that they can avoid them. Many people with "any driver" insurance assume that that term means what it says. In practice, they are usually not insured for under-25s or for people with a record of accidents.

I have spoken to insurance brokers and to members of the general public. The general public are often not aware of the problem, whereas many insurance brokers seem to regard it as neither here nor there. It is just one of those things, and people do not pay much attention to it. Even those brokers who mention it to drivers they are insuring do not really expect them to remember it. Is there anything that the Government can do to draw people's attention to the potential seriousness of not being properly insured? Even if someone is not directly responsible for an accident and no careless driving has been involved, his lack of insurance can have very serious consequences for those whom he injures.

I support those hon. Members who have complained about the consultation process. It is not acceptable for the Government to say that responses have to be in by September and then make the announcement in July. There may be general support for what the Government seek to do in this measure. We would certainly all support the objective of reducing accidents and ensuring that people are properly compensated when their vehicles are damaged or when they are injured. However, that is no reason for the Government to announce a consultation period and then to short-circuit it.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In precisely what way are the Government or the North committee supposed to have been deficient in the consultation process?

Mr. Taylor: I shall give the Minister a straightforward example. The RAC understood that its response had to be submitted by September——

Mr. Bottomley: There may be a lot of reliance on the RAC, and I pay tribute to it in many respects, but it will have seen the Secretary of State's press notice of 26 July, which talks about what is accepted in principle, what conclusions are accepted where views are sought, and states:

"Regulations will be amended"—

which is shorthand for saying proposed to Parliament——

"in the autumn to change the penalty points awarded for the offences of driving without insurance; failure to stop after an accident; and for careless driving."

It then gave the proposed new ranges. It was about as specific a statement of Government intentions as is possible. It was made in July. It seems to me that, given the great interest in the House and outside in having the North committee's report and the Government's response brought forward, the one thing of which we cannot seriously be accused is lack of consultation. In anticipation of winding up the debate, may I say that paragraph 1.8 is the North committee talking about its own consultation.

Mr. Taylor: What the Minister has said is of some interest to hon. Members. We shall see what the response is. It would have been helpful to organisations if they had known that the Government intended to bring forward their basic response. If the Minister is saying that there is still time for the fine tuning of consultation, perhaps organisations could have been told, or perhaps there might have been a separate procedure.

I hope that the Government will learn from these criticisms and will not repeat the exercise. Nevertheless, I think that there is general support for what the Government are trying to do, and I hope that the order will be approved.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): I declare my non-financial interest as a member of the RAC public policy committee, which examines proposals for legislation and comments on them. There has already been much discussion of the briefing that the RAC has sent out.

The RAC is as committed as the Minister—I can give it no higher praise—to road safety. It strongly believes that people who flagrantly disobey the law should attract the highest penalty. What the RAC and I, as a motorist, object to is not the increase in penalties at the top, but the lack of flexibility. It is not good enough to say "If it is a technical offence the case will not be proceeded with." The law is the law. I fear that some policemen are slightly overzealous and might push prosecutions which others would not.

The danger associated with imposing higher penalties is that treatment could be very unequal as between different parts of the country. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister wants to avoid that. The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) said that an "any driver" certificate would not cover any driver under age 25. I do not think that that is quite correct, but the small print, which the driver or owner often does not read, can make a tremendous difference to the cover. In such circumstances, there can be much innocent breaking of the law, or at least unintentional breaking of the law. That is to say nothing of cover notes that do not arrive, cover notes that are incorrectly written, postal strikes and other factors.

Mr. Bottomley: It would be helpful, in view of my hon. Friend's experience, if he could say in what circumstances there is no insurance cover. If the cover note has not arrived but the insurance has been accepted by the insurance company, a person is insured although he does not have a cover note.

Mr. Fry: A cover note is not necessarily evidence of insurance. Some insurance brokers on the point of leaving their businesses issue cover notes like confetti and never pass them on to the insurance company, with the result that there is no cover. I assure my hon. Friend that in a whole range of cases the person who, technically, has broken the law is the innocent party because of the negligence of a third party who may be issuing the insurance.

Another example is that most insurance certificates allow someone to drive any car that is in the possession of the policy holder. There are occasions when, at the end of the year, or when the car is changed, the insurance company insists on a specified registration number, or may suggest limited terms. If the insured does not have the proper document at that time, I understand that there is a risk that a fairly high penalty point can be imposed against him. As has already been said, two comparatively minor offences can lead to a driver automatically losing his or her licence.

As for not reporting an accident, we all want the motorist who does not report an accident because he has had too much to drink, or because he has caused injury and is afraid of the consequences, to face the most severe penalty. However, I can give my hon. Friend an example that happens nearly every day. Many cars have offside mirrors, and when two cars are travelling down a narrow road their offside mirrors may touch. Technically, by not reporting that those mirrors touched, the drivers could be accused of not stopping and not reporting an accident. In that extreme circumstance, I do not think that many cases would go to court, but it illustrates that there is a vast difference between technically breaking the law and an accident in which someone has been run down and left by the side of the road and the motorist has driven away with no intention of reporting the accident.

I believe that my hon. Friend is guilty of not giving magistrates the necessary flexibility. I ask him to think again, particularly about the lower limits on driving without insurance and failing to stop after an accident.

It is very rare that the two Houses of Parliament debate the same subject. In the debate in the other place earlier tonight, not one speaker approved of the order. We want many of the recommendations of the North report to come into effect, but I agree that we should first have a major debate on the issue. If we do not have that debate, there will be the feeling that some people will be penalised because, late at night, a handful of us allowed this order to go through. Would it not be wiser for my hon. Friend to withdraw the order tonight, to complete the consultation period, to have a full parliamentary discussion and then to come forward with his proposals in toto in the spring? I suspect that then nearly everyone who is criticising him tonight will be with him in the Lobby.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry), I regret very much that my hon. Friend the Minister has brought the order before the House tonight, in this form and with so little notice. It it extremely unsatisfactory.

I understand that the order has been brought forward now because a consolidation of the road traffic law is taking place. No doubt my hon. Friend is anxious that that consolidation should include the revised number of points for different offences so that the law is not immediately out of date. I am a member of the Joint Committee on Consolidation, &c. Bills, so I understand that there are reasons for wanting to tidy up the law in a sensible fashion, but quite frankly that is not sufficient reason for overriding the views of many parties who have an interest in the matter and for bringing forward an order without adequate consultation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough spoke about the RAC. It is unsatisfactory that an announcement should be made about a change in the law when the consultation period is in mid-stream.

The Magistrates Association is different from meetings of individual magistrates, because it brings together the views of magistrates as a whole. It has not yet met to consider its formal response to the North report, but it has submitted a draft response. I understand that the meeting to consider and confirm its response will take place on Thursday. Even so, many changes to the recommendations of the North report are implemented in the order. Is my hon. Friend aware that the Magistrates Association, in its draft response, has said that the present minimum of five points for failure to stop is too high and should be reduced? Is that not something that we should debate properly? Surely we should consider the association's views before we implement the law. It is the magistrates who will have the job of ensuring that the law is administered.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I disagree with the view that the low limit should be even lower, but the hon. Gentleman is right in saying that that matter should be properly debated by the House. When we take into account the fact that the order will not come into force until March next year, there can be no argument against the fact that the laying of the order could have been delayed until the consultations for which the hon. Gentleman and I are arguing have taken place.

Mr. Waller: The hon. Gentleman is right. The only reason for bringing it forward now is to include the points tariff in the consolidated law, and that is not a sufficiently good reason.

It might be helpful to go back to 1981, when my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate) and I were on the Standing Committee that considered the original tariff and penalty points proposals. It is interesting to note that when the Government initially brought forward their plans relating to failure to stop there was a single six-point system. We debated that for a full morning in Committee. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) went away after the debate and supported the views that had been expressed in Committee. He came back, after giving the matter considerable thought and having consulted widely, and introduced the range of five to nine points for that offence. It was not something that somebody thought of off the top of his head. It was carefully considered.

On page 172, in paragraph 16.23, the North report refers to the failure to stop. The committee concluded:

"Of course prosecution discretion would filter out many minor cases".

That is quite right. However, other cases would not be filtered out by discretion. Is my hon. Friend the Minister saying that there should be no mid-point between a caution and eight points? Offences do not happen like that. Many different types of offence are involved in a failure to stop. The idea that one can distinguish clearly between those which should have a caution and those which should have eight points is nonsense. Further thought should be given to that.

When the Standing Committee considered that matter on 19 March 1981, it was not argued that we should be more lenient. One of the reasons why we argued the point so fervently was that we believed that some cases should have more than six points. It is interesting that, when one looks back at the points that one made, one still agrees with them. I said:

"However, in this case of failing to stop after an accident, it seems to me that the variation between the most minor type of offence of this nature and the most serious is enormous. That is why I propose that a considerable amount of discretion should be left to the courts. In fact, I propose that there should be a minimum of two points and a maximum of ten."

The Committee debated various options and there was a vote on a range of four to eight points, on which the Committee divided equally. There was strong feeling that a considerable range of options should be considered.

I continued:

"In the event that someone drives into a bus queue, knowing full well that he or she has had far too much drink and that there is no possible way that he or she could pass a test for the presence of drugs or alcohol, that person has a considerable incentive to get away as quickly as possible. Surely we need a penalty which takes account of that sort of incentive. In other words, I think that ten points is not too high a penalty for such an offence and that the six points specified in the Bill is too few to deter someone who wishes to make such a getaway."

I later referred to the more minor type of offence and said:

"I argue that there is variation in the range of accidents and that an accident in which a driver knocked people down and then drives off to escape the consequences is considerably more serious than many other incidents of failure to stop."

Many hon. Members referred to cases of failure to stop. The late Martin Stevens, who was a magistrate, said:

"there is hardly a motoring offence that comes before the courts where the degree of gravity varies more widely than the offence of failure to stop. It can be a purely technical offence."

This is the offence for which my hon. Friend the Minister proposes that there should be a range of only two points. Martin Stevens' words are worth recalling. He said:

"It is not unknown for motorists to suppose that they have reported the offence whereas, in reality—because no proper note was taken or they did not give their name and address in the proper form, or because of a technical deficiency either in the way in which they made their statement or in the way in which it was recorded—what they thought they had done does not amount to reporting. They therefore find themselves, to their surprise, accused of failure to report.

That is the type of case—there are many—where a magistrate would give a defendant an absolute discharge, where there is no guilty mind and the defendant is possibly the victim of someone else's error."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 19 March 1981; c. 1144-48.]

In such a case, someone could be charged with failure to stop.

I should like to refer to a case that has been brought to my attention recently. A lady was driving off a motorway slip road and as she stopped at a roundabout she felt a tap at the rear of her car. She realised that the following car, whose driver had failed to pay attention to vehicles approaching from the right of the roundabout, had moved and slightly struck the rear of her car. Because she thought that no damage had been done and the roundabout was a dangerous place to stop—the accident clearly was not her fault—she drove off. The incident was witnessed by the police, who stopped her and warned her. Although it was not her fault—she had not thought it a good place to stop—she was told that she would be reported with a view to action being taken against her for failing to stop and report an accident. I do not know the outcome of the case, as no decision has yet been made. It is a case where an innocent party, who made an error of judgment in not stopping as soon as she could, may find that she has eight penalty points on her licence.

There are many minor offences of that kind, and if one doubts that one should look at the table of offences in Scotland, which is included in the North report. In 45 cases in 1986, only a fine of up to £5 was imposed. In a further 228 cases, a fine of up to £10 was imposed. Should not the points tariff bear some relationship to the fine and the way in which the magistrates have assessed the case but found a technical offence? It must. It is nonsense to rely on discretion not to bring a charge. Often there will be such a charge.

There has been inadequate consultation on this matter and magistrates feel that this is unsatisfactory. If my hon. Friend the Minister presses ahead with the order, if will be passed. There are many hon. Members who have not heard the debate, but who could, if necessary, be called upon to support the order. If my hon. Friend withdraws the order, he will get great support from people throughout the country who will recognise that he has been willing to listen, that he wants to consult properly and that he intends to introduce another order soon, after it has been properly considered and debated, so that the House can give its view. If my hon. Friend does not do that, I am afraid that his reputation, as one who is concerned to change the law so that it reduces casualties, will be damaged. People will feel that we have not got off to a good start in passing the order.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Croydon, North-West): I share my hon. Friend's concern about discretion. The offences of failure to stop and exchange particulars and of failure to report can be extremely serious. In the worst examples, disqualification and imprisonment may be appropriate. I am worried that, by passing the order, we will put the fairly innocent offender in the same camp as the very guilty.

First, I shall give an example of failure to stop and exchange particulars. A man and his wife park their car in the high street. The man reverses the car gently and it bumps the car behind him. He says to his wife, "Will you give the people the particulars? I have to nip into the bank." The wife stays to exchange particulars and the man goes off to do his business. He is guilty of failure to stop and exchange particulars. There can be no doubt about that. He stands to get eight points, and we may think that that is wrong.

Secondly, I shall give an example of failure to report. A man driving home along a country lane after work skids going round a corner. His vehicle comes slightly off the road and hits a five-bar gate, causing it slight damage. He waits for a few minutes. No one is around, so he goes home. The next day, at lunchtime, he rings his police station and says, "By the way, I bumped a gate yesterday. No one was hurt." He is guilty of failure to report because the obligation is to report as soon as reasonably practicable. If he can report the incident in the evening when he gets home or at breakfast time, he must do so. If he reports the next day at lunchtime, he is guilty of failure to report. No other car or people were involved, only a fence. Do we want to put such a man in the same camp as the very guilty? If the order is passed, he, too, will get eight penalty points.

In those two examples, without doubt the offences of failure to stop and exchange particulars and of failure to report have been committed. It is not good enough to say that the police will exercise their discretion and not prosecute, because those are two reported cases where they have prosecuted. We must ensure that magistrates have the discretion to say, "This is a technical offence and we shall deal with it leniently," or, "This is a terrible offence and we shall deal with it harshly." The problem is that we are imposing a harsh penalty on the relatively innocent. That is unfair.

Mr. Den Dover (Chorley): Given the number of hon. Members who, to a man, have spoken against the order, it is clear that my hon. Friend the Minister should withdraw it. I appreciate that he wanted to let the traffic world know his and the Department's views and I therefore applaud to some extent his announcement in July, but I must question why just a few offences have been pulled out from the whole array of motoring offences. Surely the whole matter should be considered at length and in detail as it was in 1981. Only then can one balance and counterbalance the various ranges of penalty points against one another and provide heavy or light weighting for appropriate offences.

I sincerely hope that my hon. Friend has the authority to withdraw the order today as it is clear that wider consultation would be of benefit in deciding on the allocation of points to the various offences. There is a great deal of grievance on both sides of the House about this, and I very much hope that the order will be withdrawn.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): At this hour I shall detain the House for no more than a few moments. There has clearly been a lack of opportunity to debate the road traffic law review report, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will give us that opportunity at an early time.

There is certainly a need for wide publicity of penalties. In this context, I commend to my hon. Friend the possibility of sending out a list with the annual registration renewal form. In this debate, I shall deal briefly with just two or three examples.

Reference has been made to careless driving. Nine points for that offence would surely be draconian—just one point less than for reckless driving, although the whole House recognises the difference between the two offences.

For failure to stop after or report an accident, an automatic move to eight to 10 points will restrict magistrates' choice. We have heard examples of trivial and technical offences which come into this category, so a scale of two to 10 points would be more appropriate. Here I make not just a constituency point but a personal point. If one takes the trouble to report an accident—one may be involved in an accident with a third party—the police should be encouraged to keep one aware of what is taking place. Having done my public duty after a number of constituency engagements and reported a hit-and-run or other such incident to the North Yorkshire police, I have then not been informed at all of what subsequently took place. I have been delighted to hear of their vigilance and of the fact that prosecutions have been brought, but had I not persisted in asking I should still be in the dark.

Finally, on the subject of driving without insurance, will my hon. Friend the Minister have discussions with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to ensure that we move to the system used in some countries whereby a valid insurance sticker must be displayed? If the insurance is cancelled, the relevant sticker is removed and returned to the insurance company. In that way, the public can tell at a glance from the relevant colour whether the vehicle is insured and whether the insurance is up to date.

I believe that the order is rather too hasty and has not been well considered by the Department. The wider scale of penalties that we should all like to see, not just on behalf of motorists but on behalf of those who enforce the law, is not available. I therefore urge my hon. Friend the Minister, whom I hold in very high regard in respect of road traffic matters, to heed what has been said today and to consider all those factors.

12.4 am

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): I shall be brief because my hon. Friends have covered most of what I had intended to say. I am not yet convinced that there has been full consultation. It is strange to say that there will be consultation and then to introduce amendments to the four major items on which most people would want the opportunity to comment. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister could tell us about the attitude of the police to the recommendations that he has put before the House tonight.

One snag is that, if the goalposts are moved on the four important offences, what will happen with the linkage with all the other traffic offences such as speeding and so on? Without considering them all as a whole, there is a danger of going over the top with some and going light on others when the time comes to consider them all.

The most important consultation must surely be with this House. We could certainly have assisted in the debate on the vital issue of traffic safety. That concerns everyone, not only drivers, because we all have some connection with the roads. We could have put our views on whether to accept parts of the North report.

I agree with my hon. Friends about the question of failure to report an accident. On many occasions innocence could cause the unreporting of an accident. A bump at Hyde Park corner may, with a shrug of the shoulders and a certain gesture, make one party think that there is no damage. He might drive off and not report the accident, but subsequently the other party might report it and he is then guilty of a high penalty offence. A level of eight to 10 penalty points is too high, and perhaps a return to a lower minimum of four points would be better.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) gave examples of the conflict that could occur with uninsured driving in quite innocent circumstances. With a six to eight range of penalty points, there is not sufficient distinction between the car thief, the joy riders and those who wilfully ignore the law and the old lady or gentleman whose memory has lapsed and has committed a technical offence. They may be guilty of driving while uninsured, but there is a great difference between their offence and that of the car thief or joy rider.

Ideally, my hon. Friend should postpone this order to a later date, but I do not think that he will do so. I hope that he will comment in some detail on the points that have been raised tonight.

12.8 am

Mr. Peter Bottomley: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker—[Interruption.] I am not sure whether the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) would want me to repeat his remark. It is, perhaps, an echo of what some of my hon. Friends have said.

My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate) offered a friendly caution against telling the truth about the reduction in road casualties. I am not in any way complacent about the cut in the number of casualties. I simply believe that there would not have been the significant reductions last year and, to some extent, this year without a large number of people modifying their behaviour.

There has been no change in the law on sentencing or in enforcement during the past two years, yet there has been a continued reduction in road casualties even though the mileage driven has risen. It has been almost across the board, with the exception of child pedestrians. Motor cycle rates have reduced faster than the drop in motor cycling itself and the car casualty rate has also reduced. Much of that has happened because we no longer put the burden solely on the police and the courts. Most people are now trying to drive better more often because they realise that that is important for themselves and that it is their duty as road users.

I do not want anything in this debate, which is about penalties available to the courts, to take anything away from us all realising that, if we were to drive from here to Birmingham, most of us would commit enough offences to lose our licences, even under the existing penalty point system.

Mr. Roger King: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Bottomley: I do speak for myself.

Because it goes with the job, I was asked to take the Institute of Advanced Motorists test and the RoSPA advanced driver test. I told them both that they would get more publicity if they failed me, but they still said that I had passed. I am aware that I am by no means perfect in my driving. I try to improve. We shall all realise that we make mistakes. As my hon. Friends have said, driving is one of the few areas where carelessness can be a criminal offence, and we should be aware of that. It is one of the major themes running through the North report. The House will join me in paying another tribute to the committee members who went out to consultation.

Two groups of hon. Members have spoken in the debate. Contributions have come from my hon. Friends the Members for Faversham and for Keighley (Mr. Waller). Other hon. Members may also have been involved in the 1981 legislation, which went from totting up three equal offences to losing one's licence, to the points system that has generally been welcomed.

There is a range of views. I was asked for the police view. The police and others put forward the view that, especially with a failure to stop offence, if one is in a large vehicle and is not aware that one has been involved in touching someone else's vehicle or having an accident, it would be unfair to have major penalties. As my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Malins) said, if one is unaware that that has happened, one is almost certain not to have committed the offence of failing to stop after an accident. One must have knowledge of the crash, collision or scrape to be successfully charged and convicted.

Mr. Fry: How does one prove it?

Mr. Bottomley: I do not have the answer to how one proves most things in court.

I emphasise that a certain voice has not been heard in the debate. I do not criticise hon. Members for that. Last Saturday, the annual general meeting of the Campaign Against Drinking and Driving was held. People met, and the only thing that they had in common was that a member of their family had been killed by a drinking driver. Many of those families had to bear a court prosecution for careless driving in which the fact of death was not even reported, because it was not apparently the intention that anyone should have been killed. Often, when someone is convicted and sentenced, people start to discover the full circumstances. Many people in Britain feel a grievance that the person who was involved in the crash or collision that affected them had been under-charged.

I refer hon. Members to chapters 16 and 17 of the North committee's recommendations. They were not fully summarised in some of the representations that were put to some hon. Members. If I singled out the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor), it is not because I want to pick on him, but when he was going on about this matter I realised that he had perhaps not had a full opportunity of reading chapters 16 and 17.

Paragraph 16.24 of the report states:

"We recommend that failure to stop after or to report an accident should carry 10 penalty points in all cases, and that the Magistrates Association should review its guidance on the use of disqualification for these offences with a view to securing an increase in the use of disqualification."

It continues:

"The appropriate bodies in Scotland should consider issuing guidance."

More argument appears before the statement, but the beginning of paragraph 16.24 states:

"The Magistrates Association's 'suggestions for traffic offences penalties' already advise magistrates to consider disqualification where both failure to stop and failure to report are present."

A motorway case was put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley. I thank him for letting me see details of it in advance. That case emphasises that the duty to stop when people know that there has been an accident is important. It protects the innocent, provides a reminder to those who may have been at fault—obviously, it is difficult to tell in advance who is at fault—and provides a basic protection. It is important that those who are involved in bumps should stop. There is the example of two wing mirrors touching each other, and one motorist stops but the other does not. The motorist who stops has a defence if he is subsequently charged with failing to stop after an accident.

Mr. Waller: Of course a person in that situation should stop, but is a misjudgment of that kind really on a par with being drunk in charge of a motor vehicle? It carries a penalty of 10 points, which is only two more than the minimum that might be imposed for failing to stop in the most superficially minor case.

Mr. Bottomley: That argument is advanced on the assumption that motorists are failing to stop after minor accidents and that the Crown Prosecution Service is taking them to court. Points by themselves mean little. It is when they add up to 12 that disqualification takes place. The magistrates then have to decide what period of disqualification should apply, and, as I understand it, disqualification can range from one day to an extremely long period. We must take these issues together.

Mr. Malins: I mentioned two examples of offences that would be at the bottom end of cases of failure to stop and exchange particulars—we must not forget about the failure to exchange particulars. Are such offences not so wholly different from offences at the top end of the scale that a substantially different points penalty should be made available?

Mr. Bottomley: We need to——

Mr. Roger King: Just say yes.

Mr. Bottomley: If there is a growing number of cases of failure to stop, and if it is in general the intention of failing to stop that leads to the charge, followed by conviction and the penalty, we are on firmer ground. I expected to be criticised for watering down the North committee recommendations, which was for a flat 10 points. In the 1981 debate, it was the intervention of Conservative Back Benchers that led both to a minor lowering and a significant increasing of what the Government were then proposing.

I want to divorce the four offences and the penalties that are applicable to them from the major consideration of the North committee's recommendations. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made plain in July, there is a difference of treatment. Perhaps we could rightly be accused of complacency, although I recognise that we have not been this evening, if we had left these recommendations so that they could come with the fuller response in January. I was asked when the response will come. The Government plan to bring it forward in January.

My hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) talked about the importance of publicity on penalties. We shall consider how we can both publish the penalties and the reason why the offences are offences. We should not talk merely of what will happen if I offend, for example. We must talk also of why it is important that drivers should stop after an accident and carry insurance. It is important that we should publicise the extent of careless or inconsiderate driving. It has been said that the one point difference between the maximum points penalty for careless driving and the penalty for reckless driving seems small. In practice, the CPS has to decide whether to bring a charge of careless or reckless driving and we need to see a significant overlap.

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): I have not spoken in the debate, but I do not understand the timing of the order. Has my hon. Friend consulted representative bodies in Scotland, for example? I would accept that that might be an irrelevant issue this evening. Why is my hon. Friend bringing the order forward so quickly, given the remarks that he has made recently and the comments of some of my hon. Friends? What is the rush?

Mr. Bottomley: In July, the Government explained in a parliamentary answer and in a press notice that we wanted to take action on the recommended adjusting of penalty points by lifting the maxima and some of the minima. That is a plain way of putting it.

I meet the RAC frequently, and normally without disagreement. Even when we disagree, it may be advancing a point of view to which we need to pay attention, which we do. I meet also the representatives of various motoring interests. There are few who get around the country as often as I do to meet these interests, whether it is the police, the magistrates or motorists. I have had few representations on this proposal, with the exception of that presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller), either inside or outside the House.

It is important to continue reiterating that this is a specific example of change following the North report. The committee began sitting before I took over the job of Under-Secretary of State, which was at least two and a half years ago. There is one point that I want to make plain to the House. This is the only proposed change that we intend to bring to the House before the Government have responded to the North report early next year.

Mr. Waller: As a matter of record, will my hon. Friend confirm that in the press notice in July, although notice was given of the intention to change the tariff for three penalties, there was no mention of failure to report? The three included failure to stop, but failure to report was not included and no notice was given of that until the order appeared.

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend is correct about the early part and it would take me a little time to read through the subsequent pages. However, in paragraph 16.24 the North committee takes the two together.

My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West referred to the example of someone who goes into a bank and the person who interferes with a five-bar gate. One can find examples of apparent triviality in all cases. If a motorist believes that it is appropriate to report the five-bar gate incident, that should be done as soon as possible. That was the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West. I find it difficult to believe that a magistrates court would apply a significant penalty if the five-bar gate incident took someone up to or above the 12 points. The period of disqualification is not mandatory and that is where the magistrates maintain their discretion. There is a fair amount of discretion within the system.

It is perhaps wise for me to realise that the interest expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House for consideration in depth should be reported to my right hon. Friends who manage the affairs of the House. Obviously I cannot say if and when there will be a major debate on road casualty reduction or about the law on road traffic offences to which the North committee addressed itself.

There is unanimity in the House over the fact that the law has a part to play in getting more of us to drive better more often. I repeat a basic theme of the North report: many examples of carelessness can lead to a criminal offence being committed. The North committee does not expect the police to arrest people for all the examples. Some big issues must be considered later as the North report is examined. There are proposals for determining a charge by the consequences rather than by the intent. Many of our legal friends will have a fair degree of interest in that.

Most of the reaction to the North committee recognises the committee's approach. It is obviously difficult for many people outside the House or outside the area of road casualty reduction to read the whole report because it is rather longer than most. However, that is a reflection of the effective way in which Dr. North and his colleagues went through the issues. It was one of the most open procedures that any committee has gone through since the Beveridge report. A combination of outsiders and public officials sat on the committee and the report has been public since April this year. The order represents one part of the report which, on reflection, the House will recognise did not have to wait for a fuller response on some of the other issues.

There is provision in the Road Traffic Act 1981 for modifications to be made to the range of penalties. As my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley rightly said, road traffic legislation is being consolidated, but that is not the overwhelming reason for having this debate. It fits in with the Government's response made in July when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that this was one area in which the Government proposed to take action in advance of the further consultation on many of the other specified issues set out in the written answer of 26 July.

I am probably the Minister who least relies on changes in the law to bring about better results. There are times when it is necessary to propose changes to the law. In general, I ask those who still feel strongly about these issues to reread and reconsider the arguments and facts that the North report advances and to recognise that those involved had the benefit of wide consultation on two occasions. I hope that the House will pass the order.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Penalty Points (Alteration) Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 21st October 1988, be approved.

Textile and Clothing Industry

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

12.25 am

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): I applied for this debate to highlight the increasing danger of a major upheaval in the textile and clothing industry. It is my belief that unless the Government act now to halt the present uncertainty and allow the industry to plan and invest in the future, thousands of jobs, right across the industry, could go. My message tonight to the Minister and to the Government is clear and unequivocal: they must act now and seriously to address the problems facing the industry. In the short time that I have available to me tonight, I shall attempt to highlight those problems.

First, I emphasise that the textile and clothing industry is vital to our economy. It is not, as some would have it, a sunset industry. In the United Kingdom, it employs more than half a million people—10 per cent. of the total work force. Its contribution to the national economy is greater than that of the car industry, and three times greater than office machinery and data processing. There is strong regional dependence on the industry, which is concentrated in areas where unemployment and poverty rank high: 30 per cent. in Northern Ireland, 22 per cent. in the east midlands, and 17 per cent, in my own area of west Yorkshire.

The textile industry went into rapid decline in the late 1970s and early 1980s, and there is deep concern that it could witness a rerun of the situation in 1980-82, when more than 300,000 jobs were lost. Those parts of the industry that survived became much more capital-intensive and automated, and some survived more intact than others. Woollen and worsted, for example, has increased output by 80 per cent. per head, and exports account for 60 per cent., of output. That part of the industry is least affected by imports, but it still finds itself vulnerable and threatened for other reasons. I hope that the Minister accepts that the industry has fought back. Workers in the industry, never noted for their militancy, have become even more flexible—in fact, wages remain very low—and, because of the Government's mishandling of the economy, they are once again threatened by redundancy.

High interest rates are particularly damaging to the industry as they push up the value of sterling and add immediately to costs. Fluctuating exchange rates and the high prices of our exports when the pound is strong create a disinclination to invest and prevent any serious forward planning. Present sterling levels make imports cheaper and our exports more expensive. I am sure that the Minister will not argue against that.

Inflation is also causing concern. High energy and water prices have an effect on costs, and the high cost of water after privatisation has been drawn to my attention by woollen manufacturers, who use large quantities of water in their processes. Other factors, including EEC changes, are adding to the problems. The existing multi-fibre arrangement will end in 1991, and any new MFA is likely to have a quota set for the EEC as a whole. The free market that will exist in the EEC after 1992 means that the entire quota for a particular product could be targeted at just one country. Already within the EEC there is concern that some Governments are finding ways of subsidising textiles, despite rules against doing so. Not so in the United Kingdom, unfortunately, where present policies seem to be positively harming the industry.

Such concern is not felt just on these benches. I draw the Minister's attention to the parliamentary question asked by the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) on 26 October. The hon. Gentleman asked for "the latest position regarding the French Government's allegedly illegal subsidy to Filature du Hainault to manufacture polypropylene filaments."

The Minister for Trade replied:

"The EC Commission announced on 27 July that it had approved the French Government's proposed aid to Filature du Hainault and that that aid did not conflict with the objectives of the Community's synthetic fibres discipline."

The Minister went on to sympathise with the hon. Member for Colne Valley, saying:

"I have told my hon. Friend that I share his anxiety and doubts about this."—[Official Report, 26 October 1988; Vol. 139, c. 293-94.]

There have been other instances, of which I am sure the Department is aware, in France and Italy, and I have other suspicions of subsidies. Within the EC exports in relation to imports fell dramatically between 1978 and 1985. In United Kingdom trade with West Germany, for instance, United Kingdom exports as a percentage of imports fell from 65 per cent. to 29 per cent. In trade with France there was a fall from 73 per cent. to 46 per cent., and the fall in the Netherlands was from 96 per cent. to 40 per cent. In the EC as a whole, the fall was from 65 per cent. to 37 per cent.

I believe that the implementation of the single market will make matters worse, particularly for constituencies such as mine where there is still a heavy reliance on manufacturing. Market forces will inevitably relocate activity to more favoured parts well away from centres such as Halifax and west Yorkshire. All of us are worried by recent events in Halifax, where one of the major reasons cited for the closure of the KP Foods factory was the need to obtain even more profits in the run-up to 1992. A thousand jobs were sacrificed on the altar of the single European market.

As I said earlier, these economic indicators, coupled with potentially damaging legislation from the United States in the form of the Textile and Trade Apparel Bill —recently vetoed by the President, but hanging over our heads like the sword of Damocles—could, if implemented, increase US protectionism for the next 10 years, forcing many Third-world countries into the European markets. Imports are already damaging those markets, particularly our own. During the first six months of 1988 textile imports increased by 12 per cent. to £3·4 billion, increasing the balance of trade deficit and leading directly to redundancies and mill closures. If there were more time, I would cite some of those closures.

Almost a third of our balance of trade deficit is in textiles and clothing, and sooner or later the Government will be forced to act on what is a major crisis in trade imbalance. All sides of the industry agree on the problems, and there is a fair measure of agreement on the solutions. Only the Government, with their adherence to the free-market philosophy, seem to be at odds with that agreement. Peter Booth, the national secretary of the Transport and General Workers textile group, recently said:

"What we have at the moment is a double constraint on British Industry, first of all by the false level of sterling making it impossible to compete fairly and secondly by the punitive interest rates designed to push the pound even higher. In effect the Government are garotting British Manufacturing by their myopic economic policies based solely on interest rates. Unless there is a change of course the many improvements in productivity and efficiency in our industry will be swamped by the ever increasing tide of lower priced imports. Tax cuts in June are no use at all to the 1,000 textile workers facing the dole in September."

Just eight days later Barry Spencer, president of the British Textile Confederation, said:

"First the recent strengthening of sterling against continental currencies is now making our highly successful export performance more difficult to sustain in Europe. Second, I turn to the associated question of interest rates. The recent series of increases in the base rate adds to uncertainty and is a disincentive to investment, in what is now a highly capital intensive industry. Finally, I want to call attention to the impact of rising textile and clothing imports on the national trading deficit. There is rightly considerable concern about the likely size of the national deficit this year."

Exchange rate movement has encouraged companies to buy yarn abroad instead of manufacturing it here. Tootal gets much of its yarn from China and two thirds of its employees are overseas, while 55 per cent. of its textile materials are bought outside the United Kingdom. It ships in cloth from India, sends it to Germany for finishing, to Mauritius for stitching and then sells it in the United Kingdom. The trend is very worrying. Marks and Spencer, which traditionally has supported British manufacturing, has recently opened a purchasing office in Hong Kong, joining the shift to far eastern "sourcing".

Imports of acrylic yarn from Turkey have increased from 600 tonnes to 4,500 tonnes in three years. The 1988 quota is 5,000 tonnes. There is massive exploitation of textile workers in Turkey. The labour laws in that country are repressive and very low wages are paid. State assistance is massive. Huge subsidies are provided for the industry.

I want the Minister to tell the 5,000 people in my constituency who are still employed in the industry what he intends to do about these unfair practices, because they have been on the receiving end of his Government's lack of concern. In Halifax, wages are well below the national average and there is still a great deal of part-time work. A recent economic survey carried out by the local authority showed that 45 per cent. of the work force is still employed in manufacturing, so what is on offer for them?

West Yorkshire is ranked the 46th most disadvantaged region after countries such as Northern Ireland and Sicily, but there are no new policy initiatives for the area. In France, however, two textile closure areas, which are ranked 103rd in the same table, have already had a financial input, so what is the Minister prepared to do to redress the imbalance?

There are many other regional disparities in the EEC. Emphasis is shifting to less well-developed areas and away from declining industrial areas. In the past, Halifax has received help under the non-quota textile area funding. That ends in 1989. My local authority tells me that Calderdale is not included among those parts of west Yorkshire that the Department of Trade and Industry submitted to the European Commission in connection with eligibility under its second objective—reform of the structural funds. I take this opportunity to ask the DTI, through the Minister, to reconsider that decision.

I understand that the Department has recalculated the published unemployment rates to include the self-employed and that the average rate of employment recorded in Calderdale during the last three years on that basis is 12·35 per cent., compared with the Community average of 12·5 per cent. We failed to qualify by 0·15 per cent. If, however, the Department were to take the published unemployment data and did not allow for the self-employed, Calderdale would qualify. In the past, self-employment data have proved to be notoriously unreliable. I ask the Minister to take that point on board.

Calderdale is the only district in west Yorkshire that is not being put forward in connection with the second objective. Economic activity there is certain to be sucked into surrounding areas, where firms can obtain European regional development fund grants and where local authorities can provide improved infrastructure with that kind of assistance.

Finally, I must press the Minister for assurances on a number of points. First, will he urge the Government to renogotiate the multi-fibre arrangement and other trading arrangements to allow for fair competition? Will he ask the Government to include a social clause that would make employers in foreign countries, who are exporting to the United Kingdom and other EEC countries, treat their work force humanely?

Secondly, will he press for Professor Aubrey Silberston, of the Imperial College of Science and Technology, to be replaced as the expert who is due to report on the multi-fibre arrangement and other trading arrangements? The professor is a well-known free marketeer, whose 1984 report recommended phasing out the multi-fibre arrangement. It was widely attacked by all sides of the industry.

Thirdly, will the Minister take up with the Chancellor of the Exchequer the question of high interest rates and point out that manufacturing and trade are vital to our future prosperity? Trade is all that some of us have by which to earn our living, once the oil runs out and everything has been sold off.

Fourthly, will he tell the Government that they are destroying the textile industry's ability to plan for the future by their worship of the free market and their mishandling of the economy? I say in all earnestness to the Minister that the free-market philosophy is endangering the livelihoods of my constituents and contemptuously damaging their efforts to restore the local economy. They have been through one trauma and dragged themselves up, with very little help. Halifax, my town, had its assisted area status taken away in the early 1980s.

The industry has dragged itself up. Parts of it have recovered. We now want the Government to use sensible interventionist policies to ensure fair competition and to make sure that the healthy growth of the textile industry in my constituency continues, rather than allow a return to the position in which the industry found itself in the early 1980s.

I beg the Government not to persist with their policies. Anyone can see that they are forcing up costs, increasing our export prices and subjecting us to cheap imports.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Do the three hon. Members representing Bradford constituencies have the consent of the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) and the Minister to intervene in the debate?

Mrs. Mahon: Yes.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Eric Forth): Yes.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) for giving us the opportunity to discuss this serious subject.

I emphasise the fact that the import of cheap Turkish acrylic fibre yarn has caused at least 600 job losses in the Bradford area, many of them affecting my constituents. Mills have been running on short time and redundancies have resulted. Can the Minister say whether his Department is in a position to require the EEC to take action under the safeguard clause of the treaty with Turkey, especially as the likely increase in Turkish yarn imports is causing grave anxiety to the industry?

No doubt the Minister will want to refer to the record of the last Labour Government, as most Ministers do, so let me tell him that employment in the West Riding woollen industry was much higher in 1978, when we were in office. I hope that the Minister will aspire to that level of employment and to the improved quality and output that were achieved under the Labour Government.

I have no time for anything more, other than to endorse the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax that high interest rates are also very damaging. The damage is not clear yet, but it is working its way through and jobs will be lost in the near future.

Mr. Pat Wall (Bradford, North): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) for introducing the debate. The textile industry represents the sixth largest sector of the British economy, employing 450,000 workers. It is larger than the car industry and had £2 billion more value added in 1985 than the aerospace industry. The British Textile Confederation newsletter of July 1988 said:

"Continued control of inflation is obviously vital; and the textile industry is not looking for an under-valued currency to make life easy. Far from it. But, particularly with the move towards a Single European Market by 1992, the industry needs to plan ahead with reasonable confidence that its own efforts—in productivity improvement, new equipment, product development, marketing and so on—will not be undermined by changes in competitiveness due to increases in sterling."

Given that interest rates have doubled in 10 stages and that we have one of the highest rates of inflation in Europe, for textile workers and the textile industry, which has already faced a rise in import penetration from 31·5 to 44·6 per cent. in the period 1980 to 1986, the prospect of 1992 is a nightmare.

We face a further problem. There is the possibility of the American Government introducing a quota Bill restricting America's imports to a 1 per cent. increase per year. As my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax said, that will not only directly affect British exports to America, but will mean that far eastern and other suppliers will look for markets in Britain.

The issue of imported acrylic yarn has been brought home to me graphically. I live opposite a mill which, for the past two years, has found good employment for workers. Plenty of overtime has been worked because of the low average wage. For the past fortnight, however, owing to the import of vast amounts of subsidised acrylic yarn from Turkey, the employees have been working part time. That will continue for the foreseeable future. That mirrors the position of textile workers in the West Riding as a whole.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) on securing this debate and declare my interest as a Member sponsored by the Transport and General Workers Union, the textile group of which represents many thousands of men and women who work in the textile, clothing and knitwear industries. Thousands of jobs in those industries are now under threat, for within the next few weeks—certainly in the next few months—thousands of redundancies will be announced in them.

I appeal to the Minister to take urgent action to safeguard textile employment, as it is often in areas that already suffer from high rates of unemployment. I urge him to convene a crisis conference of the textile, clothing and knitwear industries, the textile committee of the Trades Union Congress, employers' organisations that represent the industry, Members of Parliament who represent textile constituencies and local authorities where the textile industries are important so that the Government can be given clear information about the range of action that they should take to assist those industries and the dangers that they face.

I urge the Minister to put to one side his reputation as a free marketeer and recognise that urgent Government action is necessary if these jobs are to be saved. That is the crisis that confronts the Government. Continued complacency is not an option that they can afford. If they are complacent, many more thousands of men and women in the textile, clothing and knitwear industries will be cast on to the dole queue.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Eric Forth): I congratulate the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) on obtaining this debate. I recognise the importance of this matter to her and to the other hon. Members who have spoken. I shall cover as many of the points that have been raised as possible, but I may not be able to deal with all of them in the nine minutes that remain, so perhaps I might respond later in writing to those that I cannot cover now.

I acknowledge the vital importance of the textile and clothing industries to the British economy. They are spread throughout the country, and are not confined to the constituencies of those hon. Members who have spoken. In the hon. Lady's constituency, however, there are some 20 firms, ranging from small establishments with fewer than 20 employees to a subsidiary of one of our largest firms which has more than 300.

I acknowledge, too, the scale of the industry, even after the retrenchment that has taken place over some decades. We are talking of some 15,000 firms which employ up to 500,000 people. That is equivalent to about 2 per cent. of employment in the United Kingdom, and almost 9 per cent. of manufacturing employment. Output in 1987 was about £12 billion, making it the UK's fourth largest manufacturing industry.

Exports of textile and clothing products in 1987 totalled more than £3 billion, forming one of the largest exporting sectors in the United Kingdom. Many firms have major international links throughout the world. Some of those links are long established, and others are more recent. By any standards, we are talking about very large industries. I salute them on their achievements, and I should like to identify some positive points that have not been brought out fully tonight about the industry's resilience.

We must pay tribute to the skilled and adaptable work force and the improved management standards that have recently been experienced throughout the industry. The increasing use of more and more sophisticated technology must be acknowledged. It has produced significant productivity gains. We must also remember the critical importance of good design.

My portfolio includes design, and I should like to take this opportunity to emphasise its importance. Remarkable progress has been made, establishing London as an acknowledged centre of fashion.

All those factors are of the greatest importance and have produced industries which can match fair competition and respond rapidly to the changing demands of the market place. However, we recognise the great difficulties that those sectors face.

My Department has a close relationship with the industries through its contacts with individual companies and with trade associations. Ministers and officials meet regularly, and only this morning my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade met representatives of the British Clothing Industry Association and the Knitting Industries Federation to discuss current trade issues. That may go some way to answering the point raised by the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), who called for a special meeting. I emphasise that such meetings and discussions are a continuing process. Although I cannot concede his point, I hope that he will acknowledge that that goes some way to recognising the difficulties that the industry continues to face.

We acknowledge that there are still significant concerns which I shall do my best to cover. First, I should like to deal with the problem of Turkey, which has been raised by all the hon. Members who have spoken.

I am aware of the concern about the situation which has arisen in the past year in the acrylic yarn spinning sector, which, as the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) rightly pointed out, has resulted in redundancies and short-term working.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Trade has met representatives of the Confederation of British Wool Textiles and hon. Members to discuss the problems and officials have followed the situation closely. When the Turkish voluntary textile restraint arrangements with the European Community were renewed last year, we were able to secure a new restraint limit on Turkish acrylic yarn exports to the United Kingdom, although the level was higher than the industry had sought. However, at the time of negotiations, there was insufficient evidence of serious disruption to United Kingdom industry as a result of those imports. The economic data that have to be taken into account in negotiations of this kind—such as the trends of domestic production, consumption and exports—did not at that time show the sort of systematic downward movement which was necessary if we were to be able to make a case for a tighter restraint level. Indeed, United Kingdom production levels remained high well into 1988, although we recognise that the position has changed in recent months. However, it is also relevant to note that imports of Turkish acrylic yarn have also fallen very sharply in the first nine months of this year compared with the same period last year, and currently represent only about 25 per cent. of the agreed restraint level.

It was factors such as these which have created difficulties for the anti-dumping application made by the European industry, including the United Kingdom, against imports of acrylic yarn from Turkey. This application also covered imports from Mexico. We were disappointed that the Commission did not feel able to take action. I am sure that the hon. Member for Bradford, South, with his unique involvement in European matters, will be able to pursue this matter through the institution of which he is such a distinguished member.

The Department's unfair trade unit assisted the United Kingdom industry in the preparation of its part of the complaint, but on the basis of the information available it was not possible to establish injury attributable to the Turkish imports. Other contributory factors, such as fashion changes which have led to a fall in demand for knitwear, did not help either. I am afraid, therefore, that there does not appear to be an early prospect of returning to the Commission—where the dumping complaint remains on the table—with a renewed request for action. However, the Department's unfair trade unit is continuing to monitor the situation closely in conjunction with United Kingdom industry.

Before I leave anti-dumping, I should say that work proceeds on other textile cases. Two investigations and one review of earlier measures are in progress at present and a number of other complaints have been lodged with the Commission or are in various stages of preparation. Again, our unfair trade unit is carefully monitoring progress on all these cases.

I should like to turn briefly to the multi-fibre arrangement. The current phase of the MFA, phase IV, expires in 1991, as hon. Members have pointed out, and details of any successor arrangement have yet to be worked out. The MFA is in any case one of the many trade issues under consideration in the GATT multilateral trade negotiations now under way, known as the Uruguay round. In these negotiations, taking place in Geneva, we and the European Community generally are committed to examining the "modalities" for the return of trade in textiles and clothing to normal but strengthened GATT disciplines. The Government believe a lasting return of textiles and clothing trade to GATT rules can be achieved only if the right conditions are established. In particular, we will be looking for a satisfactory safeguards clause to guard against sudden surges of imports, for better market access, and a reduction in trade barriers by developing countries, particularly the newly industrialised countries.

At the mid-term ministerial meeting in Montreal in December we shall be pressing for a clear reaffirmation of the commitment entered into by trade Ministers of all parties in Punte del Este in 1986 that the "modalities" for returning textiles and clothing to GATT depend upon strengthened rules, and we shall be looking for progress elsewhere in the GATT discussions.

The news that the United States Congress had failed to override the President's veto of the Textile and Apparel Trade Bill was of course most welcome. Had the Bill passed, it would have imposed limits on legitimate United Kingdom exports to the United States and it could well have resulted in the diversion of third country exports to EC markets. On the other hand, the United States has passed a major new general Trade Act and we shall be monitoring its implication closely. The United States has been left in no doubt that, if the new Act is used in a manner—

HEALTH

NHS (Pay and Conditions)

1. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations have been made to him by trade unions with members employed in the National Health Service about the pay and conditions of their members.

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): Recent representations that I have received have been concerned with the implementation of the clinical grading structure for nurses and the grading review for the professions allied to medicine. Pay settlements have now been concluded for 1988 covering more than 90 per cent. of all National Health Service staff.

Mr. Wareing: In view of the most recent leak—about the Autumn Statement—by this leakiest of Governments, will the Secretary of State tell us how he will ensure the full funding of the pay award to the National Health Service ancillary staff? The AHAs say that £2 billion is necessary even now. Will that necessitate the media going to another Spanish beach before the people in the Health Service are told by the Government that they will receive a real reward for the hard efforts that they have put into the service?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman will have to contain himself and wait for the Autumn Statement, which I believe he will find contains quite good news. Meanwhile, I can only remind him that 90 per cent. of our staff have reached satisfactory settlements, and these settlements have now been put into effect for the staff concerned.

Mr. Soames: Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that his Department's successful achievement in the pay settlement has been received with considerable pleasure? Is he aware that nurses find it difficult to move, especially to the south-east of England, because of the very high cost of housing and living expenses? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the time is fast approaching when we must move to regional pay? What hope can he give that the Government will take that step?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend, because obviously it is necessary that we recruit and retain people of the required quality in every part of the country. We all know that the costs incurred for staff vary from place to place, as do difficulties in recruitment. We have put in our evidence to the nurses review body the suggestion that we should now move to greater geographical variation and local flexibility, and similar discussions are taking place in the Whitley council about management and administrative staff. I believe that common sense dictates that we should start to reflect local variations in conditions in future pay negotiations for a giant service such as this.

Mr. Orme: Is the Secretary of State aware of the anger and dismay being expressed by nursing sisters about regrading? I have evidence from Hope hospital and Park hospital in the Greater Manchester area and from many other areas. What will the Secretary of State do to resolve that problem?

Mr. Clarke: When the new G grade posts are created in the new year, about three quarters of all sisters will be on the higher grades. If the right hon. Gentleman has found discontented sisters, he has no doubt looked hard and had the assistance of COHSE, which is trying to make difficulties over the minority of sisters who find themselves on the lower grade. The unions agreed to this grading structure, and it is preposterous now to claim that everyone should have gone on the higher of the grades available to sisters. Sisters have been graded according to their skill and the responsibility of the post.

Sir Peter Emery: Will my right hon. and learned Friend make it clear that the fear expressed by a number of health authorities that they could meet the pay award only by reducing services is unjustified? The Government have made extra funds available so that the whole of the award to nurses can be made without any reduction in services within the National Health Service.

Mr. Clarke: Yes, Sir. I am glad that I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. We had to adjust the estimates of the cost as the grading exercise went on and as it became obvious that our first estimate was too low. We have honoured our commitment to fund the cost of the grading exercise in full. We used the regional health authorities' own figures as the basis for doing so, and the authorities have all confirmed that they are satisfied that that funding has been made available in full. That means that there is no reason why patient services should be affected in any way by this desirable improvement in the career structure of nurses.

Mr. Robin Cook: As this is the Secretary of State's first appearance at the Dispatch Box since his appointment, may I welcome him back to Health and express the hope that he will be with us for rather longer than his predecessor? May I invite the Secretary of State to reconsider his decision of two weeks ago not to meet the trade union side? Is he aware that, in the recollection of the Royal College of Nursing, he is the first Secretary of State who has declined to meet it when requested, which appears all the more odd as his predecessors were doing double the job? Does he agree that most of the 20,000 appeals which are now going through the system could have been avoided if he had agreed to the trade union offer to go to binding arbitration? If he is so confident of his case on regrading, why did he intervene personally to veto arbitration?

Mr. Clarke: First, I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind words. I look forward to his contribution to our discussions on the Health Service.

I declined to meet the staff side of the Whitley council because it is quite improper for the Secretary of State to put himself in the place of the management side in a negotiating body of that kind. We had plainly reached the stage where continued negotiations were getting us nowhere and where, in my opinion, the trade unions were trying to reopen the basis on which everybody had accepted the grading structure earlier in the year. I concluded that we should get on and implement the Government's declared intention in the new grading structure and provide the funds to meet it.

Of course, I look forward to meeting the staff side of the NHS at some time in the future when we have a sensible agenda and when we are not trying to supplant proper negotiations within the Whitley council.

Doctors (Pay)

2. Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much in real terms doctors pay has increased since 1978.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Doctors' pay has increased by 36·4 per cent. in real terms since 1978-79.

Mr. Key: May I be first on this side of the House to congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his first appearance at the Dispatch Box in his new post—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear".]—and say how warming it is to find such a robust and positive attitude at the Dispatch Box? Given that the average target pay for general practitioners is now about £28,000 and that that represents only one of a number of variable factors, for which it is hard for anyone to budget, is there any hope of a unitary Health Service as long as we have family practitioner committees? Should not family practitioner committees be abolished and brought within the district authority health service?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks and for the lively reaction behind me. I suspect that that will not be the only lively reaction behind me before this day is out.

We are looking at the future of the family practitioner committees, just as we are looking at practically every aspect of the service in the current review. My hon. Friend will recall that we set up the FPCs on their present basis only three or four years ago and, whatever we do, we must ensure that we consider the special qualities of the family practitioner services and of the family doctor service in particular. We do not want the family doctor service to be overlooked by being drawn into the net of the general hospital service.

Mr. Fearn: Will the Secretary of State comment also on the pay scales of junior doctors and tell us whether they have had the same increases during the past 10 years as those he has just mentioned? Will the Secretary of State relate that information to the hours of work that junior doctors are now putting in?

Mr. Clarke: Junior doctors also are much better paid than they were—and certainly they deserve to be, because of their heavy commitment to the service. We are looking yet again at the vexed question of the hours of work of junior hospital doctors, which has been tackled by this Government on more than one occasion and to which I am glad we have made some worthwhile improvements. The fact is that getting things improved requires the commitment of the Government, the authorities and the whole profession. Although at every level the representatives of the profession are fully supportive of what we are trying to do, we sometimes encounter local practice where consultants are not as helpful as they might be about the type of cover that they want. I have also encountered some junior doctors who do not really want their hours reduced because they do not like the fall in pay that goes with it. At the moment we are trying to get rid of one-in-two rotas —and so we ought

Waiting Lists

3. Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what reduction in hospital waiting lists he expects after removing those patients who have already had treatment or who no longer require it.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. David Mellor): Many waiting lists will contain the names of patients who no longer, in fact, require treatment. It is not possible to put a figure on this, although some studies suggest that it could be 10 per cent. or more.

Mr. Galbraith: The Minister is correct. Many studies suggest that the figure is at least 10 per cent. and sometimes as high as 30 per cent. I thank the Minister for that answer and welcome him on his first appearance at the Dispatch Box in his new post.

The Minister will realise that the thinning of waiting lists that takes place when those patients are removed greatly improves the efficiency and delivery of care. What plans has he to ensure that every health authority thins its waiting list in this appropriate manner and therefore improves patient care throughout the country?

Mr. Mellor: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his welcome. I appreciate his expertise in these matters and the non-partisan way in which he has put a question that goes to the heart of our concern. We are keen that waiting lists should realistically reflect the workload of a district. To that end, we have been sending out questionnaires and requests to districts to ensure that they improve their information systems. The new Körner system is giving us much better statistics than we used to have. We also see an obligation to try to improve the mechanisms, whether in human terms or in terms of the machines needed to ensure that proper records are available. It is crucial to the efficient management of a district that we know exactly the state of a waiting list. It should not be swollen by people who do not want an operation after all.

Dame Jill Knight: Will the Minister tell the House the percentage numbers of patients on waiting lists for spare part surgery, where there must obviously be difficulties in moving them from the waiting list?

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend is right. One of the major constraints of spare part surgery is the availability of organs to be transplanted. She will have noted the initiative taken by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), the Under-Secretary of State for Health, to encourage more people to carry donor cards, which would assist that process. We are proud of the fact that there has been a marked expansion in spare part surgery. We started heart transplants in 1979 and now have a programme that enables almost 300 a year to be done, and I hope that we shall be able to do more in the near future.

Medical Physics Technicians

4. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received about the pay of medical physics technicians employed in the National Health Service.

11. Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received about the pay of medical physics technicians employed in the National Health Service.

Mr. Mellor: A settlement was reached in the appropriate Whitley council on 19 October. Before that, we had received numerous letters from right hon. and hon. Members and individual technicians.

Mr. Skinner: Is not the truth of the matter that, over the past nine years, the people who work in those backroom capacities, in laboratories, have lost ground in relation to other people? Will the Minister confirm that there are currently recruitment difficulties as a result of that? Is it not a scandal that, when the Government are prattling on about a booming Britain, 46·3 per cent. was handed over in wage increases to business executives last year, while these people are having to potter about on single figure pay increases?

Mr. Mellor: I hope very much that business executives will feel further incentives to generate the wealth which we can tax and from which we can pay the wages of medical physics technicians. There are now 30 per cent. more medical physics technicians than there were in 1979 and, although there may be recruitment difficulties in some areas, our innovative ideas on regional pay will help adjust those. I look forward to the hon. Gentleman's enthusiastic support.

Mr. Boateng: Does the Minister recognise that, while business executives are busy generating wealth, the Parkside health authority has problems, not only with recruitment, but with the retention of suitably qualified staff? What special assistance can be given to such health authorities on that difficult problem, which is beginning to affect patient care?

Mr. Mellor: It is a serious problem. I, too, represent an inner London constituency, and I am aware of recruitment difficulties. I am aware also of the problems that are faced by staff who are not beneficiaries of the review body system. We want to try to address these matters. In the nurses' pay award there was a 9 per cent. additional supplement for inner London, which is the beginning of a move towards regional pay. I believe that that will be the only way in which we can recognise the difficulties that people have in working in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and in mine, as against many areas in the rest of the country where living costs are much lower. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we recognise that there is a problem and that we want to try to do something constructive to resolve it. Any constructive suggestions that he has will be seriously considered.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that regional pay is important and that those who do not have the emotional pull of nurses—for example, technicians and others who work in extremely important areas within the Health Service—should not think that the Government ask themselves, "How little can we pay them and get away with it?" We must ensure that market forces are in full play so that we can recruit those who are necessary in technical and other areas. May I have the assurance of my hon. and learned Friend that the Government will work vigorously to introduce reasonable pay differentials so that health authorities in areas such as my constituency in Dorset will be able to recruit staff who are essential for technical departments?

Mr. Mellor: I think that both my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State and I were nodding in assent during my hon. Friend's supplementary question, which made the central point that all those who work within the service are valuable to it. We must ensure that every group is properly considered, and that is more easily said than done. It is plain that there is room in which to examine the issue, and we shall do so.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I welcome the Minister's response to the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), but I ask him to reconsider his use of percentages to show a decided increase in staffing levels. Does he recognise that over the years there has been a tremendous advance in the use of science and technology in the service of medicine? That being so, there will be an increase in numbers. Will he recognise also that sometimes some of those who are included in the numbers that are returned are not in post for various reasons? Will he accept that perhaps we are overstraining the commitment of medical staff and technicians to the Health Service and their care of patients?

Mr. Mellor: I am not quite sure what point the hon. Gentleman was making in the first part of his supplementary question. Self-evidently, unless there were a good reason for appointing 30 per cent. more staff in any given grade, the Government would stand condemned for wasteful employment of unnecessary people. It is clear that there has been an increase in high technology medicine. That has required more staff in certain grades and a mass of others in the service with greater qualifications. Our job is to try to ensure that our increased resources touch on the conditions of these people and allow us to recruit the numbers that we need to keep the service going. We must ensure that we look to some of the lesser groups and not only the large groups. We must bear in mind those who do not necessarily have the public emotional clout of some others in the service.

NHS (Value for Money)

5. Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how he intends to improve value for money in the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We remain committed to ensuring that health authorities continue to improve efficiency in all areas in order to maximise the resources available for patient care. We expect authorities to look critically at all their unit costs, including supplies, energy and, increasingly, clinical costs. Substantial progress has already been made by authorities with over £700 million worth of cost improvement savings expected to have been diverted into providing patient services by the end of this financial year. Health authorities have increased the number of patients they have treated at a faster rate than the increases in their expenditure, and they should continue to do so.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I am sure my right hon. and learned Friend will agree that few reasonable people would quibble with the concept of value for money in the Health Service or anywhere else in the public service. I seek assurances on behalf of the well-run districts which believe in value for money and sensible budgeting, and understand that there are 12 months in a year, and not 10 or 11, as some districts seem to think. I ask for an assurance that sensible, well-run districts will not lose money as a result of the activities of profligate ones, and that their income will be properly protected.

Mr. Clarke: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. The Department allocates all its money each year and does not keep any in reserve centrally. Authorities receive their allocation—allocations are based on the same principles throughout the country—to improve their patient services by a combination of the new money and their efficiency in making use of it. It would be wrong to raid the budgets of better-run districts to help those who get into difficulties. The Health Service sees increasingly that authorities have the remedy in their own hands when they face any short-term financial problems.

Dr. Moonie: Does the Minister agree that the poorest value for money in the Health Service arises from closing acute units for two months at the end of the year? Will he guarantee that that disgraceful situation which occurred in the Health Service last year will not be repeated this year?

Mr. Clarke: I covered that point in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo). We allocate money in England on the same basis to all authorities, using the RAWP formula. The vast majority of health authorities are extremely successful at using that money, increasing their efficiency and increasing the number of patients they treat. Obviously all the authorities face difficult problems and some get into difficulty with their services. I believe that we have provided the funds to enable the service to be expanded and we should see a reduction in local difficulties which crop up from time to time.

Mr. Latham: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that mothers-to-be will not regard it as value for money if the Leicestershire health authority tries to close all rural maternity units? Will he tell the authority that such policies are simply not acceptable in rural areas?

Mr. Clarke: We have a well-tried procedure whereby there is full consultation about proposals of that kind. Eventually the proposal comes to my Department and my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State would have to approve any closure proposal. There are long-standing arguments all over the country about whether the service is most effectively provided in small maternity units or in the maternity sections of large district general hospitals. If the proposal comes to us, we will look very carefully at the particular situation in Leicestershire and at any representations that my hon. Friend and his constituents wish to make.

Mr. Allen: Does the Minister agree that the best value for money is to be found in preventive medicine rather than in trying to treat ailments after they have developed? Will he therefore even at this late stage read the document produced by his district health authority's local dental committee and the document from the local optometrists, which demand that the changes in the amounts charged for dental examinations and eye tests should not proceed today? Will he read those documents?

Mr. Clarke: I have read those documents, and obviously it would be most sensible for me to address myself to the arguments that they contain later, when the hon. Gentleman and I will have an opportunity to debate the matter. Of course I agree that preventive medicine is the best value and should be encouraged. I do not agree that the proposed charges will reduce the amount of preventive medicine. I would regard a decision to keep the charges in the pockets of the six out of 10 of the better off who will be liable to them as a very poor use of resources which could be put to much better use elsewhere in the Health Service.

District Health Authorities'

6. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the variations in efficiency between different district health authorities.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mrs. Edwina Currie): The actual cost per in-patient case in 1986-87 varied from £456 to £1,117 in non-teaching districts and from £699 to £1,334 in teaching districts. At least part of those substantial variations remain unaccounted for. We are certain that there is still scope for some authorities to make better use of resources to improve services to patients.

Mr. Hunter: Does not my hon. Friend's answer show the value of performance indicators in assessing relative efficiency and, further to what has just been said, that many health authorities still have a very long way to go to improve their efficiency in spending taxpayers' money?

Mrs. Currie: Oh yes. I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware of the Health Service indicators for the Basingstoke and North Hampshire district health authority, which covers his constituency. The average looks OK, but when we analyse them more clearly it is clear that Basingstoke's throughput is low, the length of stay is too long, the turnover intervals—the length of time that beds are vacant between patients—are too high and the length of time to clear the waiting list is too long. Basingstoke is being reviewed today by the regional chairman and no doubt he will take note of the figures.

Mr. Eastham: Is the Minister aware of the growing bad reputation of the National Health Service as a late payer? As a consequence it is losing discounts on purchasing equipment. Crumpsall hospital in Manchester is so short of equipment that even in the casualty ward there was a shortage of drip equipment. Is that the kind of thing the Minister thinks about when she refers to value for money?

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Gentleman has asked two different questions. I agree with the first part of his question. We do not regard it as a good idea to be late payers. Apart from anything else, that simply pushes up the price of the equipment that we have to purchase. I take note of the second part of his question and will contact him to tell him exactly how the situation stands.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Will my hon. Friend ensure that districts such as Lancaster, which do well in performance indicators, are not penalised for the benefit of those which do less well, such as some of those represented by Opposition Members?

Mrs. Currie: My hon. Friend is right. The cost per case in Lancaster is £625, which is well below the national average. However, I hope that the Lancaster health authority will not be complacent and will ensure that it obtains the maximum amount of patient care for that money.

NHS (Pay and Conditions)

7. Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received about the pay and conditions of service of ancillary staffs in the National Health Service.

Mr. Mellor: Since the last time this matter was raised during questions on 12 July we have received three letters from right hon. and hon. Members and six from members of the public.

Mr. Pendry: Will the Minister take it from me that should, in the current negotiations, the management side of the Whitley council not recognise the essential part that those overworked and underpaid workers in the NHS play, he will be receiving strong representations from the union side? If the talks end in deadlock, as seems likely, will he give a guarantee now that he will use his best endeavours to ensure that both sides in the pending dispute go to arbitration?

Mr. Mellor: We have enough trouble already without anticipating trouble that may not come. The hon. Gentleman's predictions about what may or may not happen at the end of a pay round that has barely begun do not excite my interest at the moment. The hon. Gentleman does us a disservice. During the course of the previous negotiations the 40-hour week was reduced to 39 hours, which meant that the lowest basic hourly rate for ancillary workers was increased by 9 per cent. That is a much better deal than they obtained under the Labour Government when, he might like to recall, the pay of ancillary workers fell 10 per cent., compared with an increase in spending power during the Conservatives' reign.

Mr. John Townend: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that the higher that wage settlements in the NHS are in the coming year, the less money will be available for improvements in patient care?

Mr. Mellor: Yes. One thing is absolutely clear. Some people talk about the NHS as though it was merely a basis for increased pay for those who work within it. Already we know that of the substantial resources that go into the NHS, over 70 per cent. goes towards the pay of those who work within it. We recognise that one of the greatest assets of the service is the skills of those who work within it, but a lot more needs to be done and, plainly, improving patient services is something to which we intend to give even greater priority than we have in the past.

Nurses (Pay)

8. Mr. Haynes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his latest estimate of the cost of funding the nurses pay settlement; and what plans he has to fund it in full.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I announced on 13 October additional financial allocations to English regional health authorities to meet in full, the best estimates of the final costs of the nurses' pay settlement, including the clinical regrading exercise. An additional £98 million has been made available, bringing the total cost for England to £731 million.

Mr. Haynes: Is the Secretary of State aware that he has let the nurses down? He has broken a promise to the nurses. The Secretary of State represents a constituency just down the road from mine. I have had nurses from all their organisations coming to have a go at me at my surgery on a Saturday morning when they should have been having a go at him. There is no doubt that, because of what he has said at the Dispatch Box today, he is not holding surgeries to have those nurses come to see him. I want to know whether the Secretary of State will live up to his promise and give the nurses the money to which they are entitled.

Mr. Clarke: I, too, hold my surgeries on Saturday mornings and my constituency is so close to that of the hon. Gentleman that I can almost hear him addressing his constituents. The announcement that we have made honours in full every commitment that we gave to the nursing profession. It represents on average a 17·9 per cent. increase across the country and it is the best deal that the nurses have ever had in the NHS.

Mr. John Marshall: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that, following the nurses' pay increase, their salaries will be 45 per cent. higher in real terms than they were in 1979?

Mr. Clarke: That is absolutely correct. It contrasts with a drop of 20 per cent. in real terms that took place during the period of office of the Labour Government.

Ms. Harman: Will the Minister agree to meet myself, the nurse managers for nurses in hospices and Help The Hospices, which is the umbrella organisation for hospices, to discuss our concern about the effect of the pay award on nurses in hospices? What financial arrangements will he make for pay awards for nurses working in hospices that currently receive no grant from their district authority, such as St. Oswald's in Newcastle, St. Clare's in South Shields, and the Hartlepool hospice?

Mr. Clarke: I can assure the hon. Member that a Minister from my Department will meet her deputation. Obviously it will be left for the most convenient arrangements to be made when she contacts my office. We remembered the hospices in the settlement that we made, although their case was not pressed upon us by anyone in the trade union movement; perhaps the hon. Lady may have done so. We have made a provision of extra money to cover regrading and pay increase costs in those hospices that currently have a relationship with health authorities. We are still discussing how best to distribute it, and we shall listen with interest to whatever the hon. Lady has to say on behalf of individual hospices throughout the country.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm what was said by his predecessor, that under the award, nurses will receive equal pay for equal work and responsibility, but that it will be made clear that some nurses have more responsibility than others in the work that they have to do, and that that is a crucial factor in deciding whether they are graded G or F?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is right, and seeking to ensure that such is done on the right basis throughout the country has been a complicated process. I think that that exercise has been extremely successful. In some cases a new G-grade post will have to be created. My hon. Friend is right to say that there will have to be some competition, so that the health authority may choose the best candidate for the extra skill and responsibility involved. We have ensured that once that skill and responsibility is being carried, it will be properly paid for under the new arrangement.

9. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received on the implication of the nurses pay award.

17. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from trade unions and professional bodies with members in the nursing profession about the recent pay award.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government's decision to provide substantial additional funding to meet in full the estimated final costs of the nurses' pay settlement has been welcomed by health authority chairmen and managers and by responsible representatives of the trade unions and professional bodies.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Does the Secretary of State agree that his cavalier refusal to meet the nurses' organisations at an earlier point in the disagreement arising out of the current pay dispute has resulted in poor morale in the Health Service? Although the Minister has so far committed himself to paying the estimated cost of the award, it could yet be that the award will be still higher than the level of money currently being discussed. In those circumstances, will the Secretary of State guarantee that further money will be made available?

Mr. Clarke: The morale of all Health Service staff would be raised if the Government, management and trade unions all took part in responsible discussions on these matters. At certain stages in the negotiations over the detail of the grades and structure, I believe that people were seeking meetings with me more for the benefit of securing publicity for themselves than for the purpose of furthering the nurses' pay settlement.

The money that we have found—which is a very substantial sum of almost £1 billion for the United Kingdom as a whole—is in full and final settlement of the cost of implementing the new arrangements. It is based on the regional health authorities' own figures. Clearly, we must now put that behind us and concentrate on what is now in hand, which is the giving of evidence before the nurses' review body for next year's settlement.

Mrs. Mahon: If the Minister believes that he has treated the nurses very generously, can he explain to the House why so many nurses and midwives are angry and have seen through his outrageous regrading swindle?

Mr. Clarke: Certainly one of the trade unions involved is having remarkably little success in its continued attempts to find nurses with a sense of grievance about the settlement. I regret the fact that some trade union leaders continue trying to find opportunities for dispute. I particularly deplore the fact that they are trying to organise industrial action in one or two places up and down the country. I am sure that they will not succeed, and I am sure also that the public recognise that the great bulk of the nursing profession is very satisfied with such a very generous award.

Mr. Ralph Howell: In 1985 my right hon. and learned Friend's Department was unable to tell the Public Accounts Committee whether we were employing too many or too few nurses. Can he tell us now whether there are too many or too few?

Mr. Clarke: We certainly have much better information than we had a few years ago about the number of staff whom we employ, and we are improving the quality of nurse management. Now that we have given them a new career structure, it is extremely important that those responsible for the management of the skilled professional staff make the best possible use of their trained manpower. We are looking for the best deployment of nurses in all grades to ensure the maximum quality of service for patients.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: I am sure that the Secretary of State will have read in yesterday's Western Mail that nurses in Wales are not to be paid their new rates or be regraded at the same time as their colleagues in England, because the Treasury has intervened. Will he now consult urgently with the Secretary of State for Wales so that they can go back to the Treasury and say that nurses in Wales are entitled to the same pay rates as their counterparts at the same time?

Mr. Clarke: I regret to say that I have not read the Western Mail, and this is plainly a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. However, the regrading exercise was carried out on exactly the same basis in Wales as it was in England, and should produce the same satisfactory conclusion for nurses and midwives in both countries.

NHS (Review)

10. Mr. John Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to publish the results of his review of the National Health Service.

13. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to publish the results of his review of the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We shall bring forward a White Paper in the new year.

Mr. Garrett: Does the Secretary of State expect the review to confirm the principle of a tax-funded National Health Service, or does he expect it to follow his charges for preventive tests, with charges for accommodation and food in hospitals? Or is he waiting for the Prime Minister to make up his mind for him?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman will have to wait for the review, but I can assure him that it will be consistent with our policy of seeking to improve and develop the NHS. As for the charges, it was a Labour Government who, in 1951, introduced the principle of payment for dental, optical and pharmaceutical services by those who could afford it. The Labour party has never gone back on that, except for a very short period. Labour raised charges when it was in office, and it is obvious that this is a sensible way of raising revenue to finance the considerable expansion of the NHS that we are implementing.

Mr. Cohen: Is not creeping privatisation the cup of poison that the Government have planned for the NHS? Are they not planning a further rundown in the NHS to help the rise of the private sector, although that sector does not train nurses but only steals them from the NHS? Will not this pernicious privatisation mean more personal bankruptcies from bad health and the shrinking of available treatment on the NHS?

Mr. Clarke: The answer to all three questions is no. The hon. Gentleman should not base questions on such a parody of our policies after a period when we have plainly improved the NHS greatly, compared with its performance under the preceding Labour Government.

Mr. McCrindle: If, as my right hon. and learned Friend seems to suggest, there is a certain slowing in the pace of the NHS review, will he take the opportunity to focus particularly on treatment of the elderly? Although I do not exclude the advantages that the elderly can gain from private health insurance, will my right hon. and learned Friend try to appreciate even more than he does now that the elderly rely perhaps more heavily than any other section of the community on provision by the NHS?

Mr. Clarke: We welcome all contributions to our discussions while they continue, and I certainly welcome any from my hon. Friend. One reason why demands on the NHS continue to rise so inexorably is that an ever higher proportion of the population are living into old age and need to have more recourse to the service. We have so far managed to keep ahead of that rising demand, and we must continue to do so.

Mr. Yeo: When my right hon. and learned Friend publishes his White Paper, will he address the question of AIDS? Bearing in mind the lack of accurate information about the rate at which the virus is spreading, will he introduce at the earliest opportunity a system of anonymous blood tests so that future policy can be formed on the basis of accurate information?

Mr. Clarke: As my hon. Friend knows, we are making available considerable resources to deal with the advance of this pandemic. We must continue to do so on the best estimates we have of the continued increase in patients. We are actively considering anonymous testing as a contribution to studies of the epidemic, but it raises a number of difficult ethical and legal problems.

Mr. Robin Cook: In reaching his conclusions on the review of the NHS, will the Secretary of State bear in mind the warning provided by the experience of Mrs. Veronica Barnes, who, despite paying 40 years' subscriptions to Private Patients Plan, has had her cover for treatment for cancer withdrawn. Will he give weight to her observation:

"Private insurers seem keen enough to get you when there is nothing wrong with you, but as soon as you are really ill, they don't want to know."

Does not her case demonstrate the danger of running down the NHS to boost private medicine and show precisely why we need to keep the service free to everybody when they need it?

Mr. Clarke: It is ridiculous to say that the Government are running down the National Health Service, when one compares our nine-year record with that of our predecessors. I only hope that the hon. Gentleman's random question, with a letter from one person, is not part of his support to his junior spokesman, who is still conducting attacks on private medicine more suitable to the politics of the 1960s than today. It is obvious that in a more prosperous society an ever-higher proportion of the population will look to private insurance for part of their health treatment. That is a good thing, because it relieves pressure on the National Health Service.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Ms. Walley: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 1 November.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Ms. Walley: When the take-up of family credit is as low as one in three, how can the Prime Minister justify the sacking of 4,400 civil servants? Does she agree that those people would be best employed increasing the take-up of benefit in places such as my constituency of Stoke-on-Trent, North?

The Prime Minister: No. The work of the social security officers in dealing with the unemployed has reduced substantially. I am sure that the hon. Lady is very pleased about that. That also applies to social security offices. There is no point in keeping on people who have no work to do. Where we need extra efficiency, we are trying to get it by improved use of all the latest office equipment. Where we need people to do specialist work we shall take them on, but we shall take on only a particular kind of person.

Q2. Mr. John Townend: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 1 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Townend: Does my right hon. Friend agree that those who have benefited most from the substantial reductions in income tax, particularly those on high incomes, should be prepared to accept the personal responsibility of paying for their own eye tests and dental examinations? Will she make it clear that it is not Government policy, it never has been and it never will be, to levy charges on children, the low-paid and the partially blind? Will she confirm that 20 million people will be exempt from such charges?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is correct in saying that some 20 million people—more than one third of the population—will be exempt from charges on sight tests and dental examinations. Most people can pay small charges for dental and eye examinations. They are very willing to pay small charges. They cannot pay the big charges for operations for cataracts, hip replacements and so on. [Interruption.] Small charges amount to a very considerable sum which enables us to have reductions in waiting lists, such as the initiatives we have had in the past. If we are deprived of those small sums, people will not be able to get the operations they really need as soon as they otherwise would. Many people would be quite put out if they were not allowed to pay—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister has not finished answering the question.

The Prime Minister: Many people would feel that it was quite wrong if they were not allowed to pay the small sums which they can well afford, to enable substantial developments in the Health Service to take place.

Mr. Kinnock: There is now conclusive proof that family credit reaches only 30 per cent. of eligible families. When a targeted benefit misses 70 per cent. of the people it is supposed to help, had the Prime Minister not better do something about her aim?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security has said that we shall have a major effort to get more people who are entitled to family credit to receive it. That will mean, among other things, a major programme of television advertising. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not then object to that expenditure.

Mr. Kinnock: Is the Prime Minister not aware that, at the outset of family credit, the Government budgeted for only 60 per cent. take-up? Actual take-up has been half that. Does that cause the Government and the Prime Minister any regret, or is it yet another attempt to ensure that money can be saved at the expense of the poor?

The Prime Minister: More money is being spent on the poor and not on better-off people. The right hon. Gentleman is aware that people can claim family credit with a family of two up to an income of £9,300 a year. I would have hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would join in trying to get people who are entitled to family credit to go along and claim it. If he will not, why not?

Mr. Kinnock: I am rather more in favour of the poor getting money than is the Prime Minister, on the basis of her record. Last week the Government again froze child benefit. They spent £70 million on family credit. If the Prime Minister is so keen to provide money for the poor, why did she not spend the whole £206 million previously earmarked for child benefit on providing family benefit for people who are most greviously in need of it as a result of the means tests that the Government have applied to them?

The Prime Minister: Never has more been spent on social security payments and the Health Service, because the wealth created by enterprise under this Government has enabled us to do that. Family income supplement, as it used to be, was introduced by a Conservative Government. Family credit—an enormous improvement which helps people on low wages—was also introduced by a Conservative Government. There have been no such things under Labour.

Mr. Adley: I welcome my right hon. Friend's continued support for the Channel tunnel project. Is she aware that there appears to be no co-ordination between the British Government through British Rail and the French Government through Societé Nationale des Chemins de fer Francâis of the investment criteria governing the construction and development of rail services at each end of the line? Does my right hon. Friend think that this is necessary? If so, will she please arrange for the two Departments of Transport to meet soon to discuss the matter?

The Prime Minister: I would not necessarily accept that. I think that there is co-ordination. I think that my hon. Friend is probably referring to the fact that the French need the high-speed train in any event, whereas we do not have the same need for it on this side of the tunnel for services to London. I will, however, look further into the matter.

Sir Russell Johnston: Is the Prime Minister aware that those of us who struggle with tobacco addiction—it is some struggle, as I am sure the Leader of the Opposition agrees—are interested to read speculation that she is contemplating some legislation in this area? Is she aware that in West Germany for example, tobacco companies are compelled by law to print on cigarette packets the nicotine and carbon content of cigarettes, thus at least enabling people to choose the least injurious? Will she consider leaning on tobacco companies to do that voluntarily in the United Kingdom?

The Prime Minister: I am not aware of any further legislation. The health warning on the packet does not seem to have had very much effect. Persuasion is a far better weapon than legislation on this issue.

Single European Act

Q3. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if she will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the question of the use by the Commission of the powers given it in the Single European Act.

The Prime Minister: No, Sir. The Single European Act did not confer additional powers on the Commission and the power of final decision remains with the Council of Ministers. The Commission has used its existing powers to bring forward proposals for the completion of the internal market, as required by the Single European Act. I do not see a need for any increase in its powers.

Mr. Taylor: Does not the message of my right hon. Friend's splendid speech at Bruges point out the real danger that the much publicised free trade in 1992 will be a major disappointment and let-down for Britain so long as the Commission, under Mr. Delors, uses the powers of the Single Act to promote pointless measures of harmonisation instead of putting forward the real free trade measures so very much required by British industries such as the insurance industry? Is there really nothing that the British Government can do to stop the Commission from using its anti-dumping powers as a measure of blunt protectionism?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that this is a matter on which we must remain watchful. We want the single market and the Common Market to come into effect by 1992. We do not want to see highly complex regulations or new barriers set up around the Community. We want freer trade and the restraints on trade removed. We shall be watchful so that we do not have a complex plethora of new regulations. Where the regulations are particularly important, as in tax and the movement of peoples, all of us in the European Community have arranged to require unanimity to bring those directives into effect.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Prime Minister realise that Mr. Delors was wrong in the 80 per cent. forecast? Is she not aware that we have already, since 1958, reached that forecast of EEC legislation, let alone the amount in 10 years' time? Does that not suggest that the prime problem is not a future United States of Europe, but the legislative competence which is already enjoyed by the unitary but interlocking institutions of the EEC? What legislative competence for originating legislation is beyond that of the Commission today?

The Prime Minister: The Commission is committed to carrying forward all the programme of some 300 measures in its 1985 White Paper. The hon. Gentleman is very much aware of that. Where there is an extremely important directive, for example on tax matters, there must be unanimity, and therefore we would have to vote for it. Where there is any change in legislation in terms of the treaty, that matter, too, must come before the House. I know that the hon. Gentleman is keen that we should have maximum scrutiny of all these orders. It is very necessary that we do.

Sir Ian Lloyd: My right hon. Friend has opened up in her characteristically forthright and effective way a major debate on the future political structure of Europe. Does she ever envisage a time when a representative of the Council of Ministers stands before the Dispatch Box of the European Parliament as she does at the Dispatch Box here, answering for the policies and actions of that Council over which national Parliaments no longer have effective control and over which the European Parliament has not yet gained any influence?

The Prime Minister: I would not quite like to forecast that, but it has been impressed upon me that the Parliaments in other countries belonging to the European Community do not seem to have quite the cross-examination process to which Ministers are subjected in this country. Therefore, Parliament does not play such a central role in some of those countries as it does in ours.

Mr. Bernie Grant: Will the Prime Minister confirm that Commonwealth citizens who presently have the same status as British citizens——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the question is on the Single European Act.

Mr. Grant: My question is on the European Act. Will the Prime Minister confirm that those citizens will have the same status after 1992 as they do now—the rights to vote and to stand for Parliament, and so on?

The Prime Minister: As far as I am aware, the 1992 Act does not alter that. We are concerned that the immigration rules which we have now shall not be affected by the Single European Act. We are concerned to keep controls at borders to ensure that that is so.

Q4. Mr. Patnick: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 1 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Patnick: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the growing action of local communities, highlighted by the Daily Express, in removing litter, graffiti and fly posting from our streets? Should that not be encouraged and more people involved so as to rid this blot from our streets, towns and cities?

The Prime Minister: I wholly agree with my hon. Friend. There could be a major improvement in the appearance of our towns and cities if people did not throw down litter, if any litter thrown down was promptly picked up and if people did not leave large black refuse bags outside restaurants and shops in London. I congratulate Tidy Britain Group on its efforts. I also congratulate the Daily Express on its effort and I am delighted that so many groups have been organised to keep Britain tidy.

Autumn Statement

3.30 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement.

Cabinet today agreed the Government's public expenditure plans for the next three years. I am therefore taking the earliest opportunity of informing the House of the contents of the Autumn Statement: that is to say, the public expenditure plans for the next three years, and the expected outturn for this year; proposals for national insurance contributions for 1989-90; and the forecast of economic prospects for 1989 required by the Industry Act 1975.

The main public expenditure figures, together with the full text of the economic forecast, will be available from the Vote Office as soon as I have sat down. They will also appear in the printed Autumn Statement, which will be published next Tuesday.

I turn first to public expenditure. For the current financial year, 1988-89, the public expenditure planning total now looks likely to amount to some £153¼ billion, or some £3¼ billion less than was allowed for in the last public expenditure White Paper. In other words, only around £¼ billion of the £3½ billion reserve I provided for is in fact likely to be needed.

The main reasons for this shortfall are an extra £1 billion in privatisation proceeds, a reduction in social security spending of almost £1 billion as a direct result of the sharper than expected fall in unemployment and a saving of some £¾ billion largely due to extra housing receipts under the right-to-buy programme. Taken together with the strong growth in the economy this year, and the containment of debt interest now that the Budget is in surplus, this means that total public spending this year, even excluding privatisation proceeds, will be less than 40 per cent. of national income—the first time this has happened for over 20 years.

Not so long ago, the share of national income spent by the state seemed to rise inexorably. Over the past six years, that trend has been decisively reversed. Since 1982-83, public expenditure, excluding privatisation proceeds, expressed as a share of national income has fallen by seven percentage points—the largest and longest sustained fall since the wartime economy was unwound. Over the whole decade since this Government first took office, from 1978-79 to 1988-89, public expenditure has grown by under 1½ per cent. a year in real terms. This is exactly half the rate at which it grew over the whole of the immediately preceding decade.

Looking ahead, Cabinet agreed in July that public spending over the next three years should keep as close as possible to the existing planning totals, and should continue to fall as a share of national income. The plans I am about to announce meet both those objectives.

For 1989-90, the planning total published in the last public expenditure White Paper was £167 billion. It will remain at £167 billion. This important outcome has been made possible, despite the many claims for increased public spending, by a rigorous reassessment of priorities, coupled with the continuation of two of the factors that have contributed to this year's shortfall; that is to say, benefit savings from lower unemployment and increased receipts from council house sales.

For 1990-91, however, though these two factors will persist, the planning total has been set at £179½ billion, some £3½ billion more than the previously published figure. For 1991-92, the planning total has been set at £191½ billion. These totals all include the same level of reserves as in last year's plans; that is to say, £3½ billion in the first year, £7 billion in the second year, and £10½ billion in the third. They also incorporate an unchanged estimate of privatisation proceeds of £5 billion a year.

Over the three survey years as a whole, the real growth in spending on programmes will be over 3 per cent. a year. This can be afforded only because of the fall in the burden of debt interest brought about by the dramatic improvement in the Government's finances from Budget deficit to Budget surplus. As a result, overall public spending, excluding privatisation proceeds, will rise by less than 2 per cent. a year, well within the prospective growth of the economy as a whole. In other words, total public spending, excluding privatisation proceeds, will continue to decline as a proportion of national income. At the same time, substantial additional funds have been made available for the Government's most important public expenditure priorities.

The figures which I am about to give all represent increases over the plans in the last public expenditure White Paper.

First, health. An extra £1¼ billion—£1¾ billion—is—[Interruption.] An extra £1¼ billion—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a very important statement, and I am sure that the House wishes to hear it.

Mr. Lawson: An extra £1¼ billion is being provided for the National Health Service in England in 1989-90—[Interruption.] The Opposition may not be interested in the National Health Service, but we on this side of the House are interested in it and are providing a lot more money for it.

An extra £1¼ billion is being provided for the National Health Service in England in 1989-90, and an extra £1¼ billion the following year. There will be corresponding increases in Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland. On top of that, health authorities are expected to receive an extra £100 million a year from sales of surplus land. Continuing the rate of cost improvement savings achieved in recent years will produce an extra £150 million in 1989-90 and an extra £300 million the following year.

In addition, the Government are accepting the recommendation of the Government Actuary, in a report published today, that NHS employers' superannuation contributions in England and Wales should be reduced, which will save the Health Service a further £300 million a year.

In total, the increases for the Health Service in the United Kingdom as a whole will be over £2 billion in 1989-90 and over £2½ billion in 1990-91. These are by far the largest increases the Health Service has ever received. Comparing next year with this year, the increase in real resources for the NHS should amount to some 4½ per cent.

Second, roads. An extra £220 million is being provided next year for building and repairing motorways and trunk roads, and for strengthening bridges, with a further £250 million the following year.

Third, housing. Gross provision for public sector housing investment is being increased by around £440 million in 1989-90 and £340 million the following year. But thanks to the success of the Government's right-to-buy policy, this is more than financed by extra receipts.

Fourth, law and order. An extra £290 million has been made available in 1989-90 and £430 million in 1990-91, principally for a further expansion in the prison building programme. This will provide a further 3,000 places by 1991-92. Provision for local authority spending on the police has been increased by £240 million.

Defence spending is to be increased by £150 million in 1989-90 and by £600 million in 1990-91. These significant increases are designed to provide a firm framework for the next three years within which our defence programme can be planned with confidence.

So far as the massive social security budget is concerned, lower unemployment has saved more than £1½ billion in both 1989-90 and 1990-91. But substantial increases in planned spending on other benefits, particularly for the disabled, mean that the social security programme will be only marginally reduced in 1989-90 compared with previous plans, and some £1·7 billion higher in 1990-91.

On science and technology, we have altered the balance of public support within an increased total. In particular, provision for spending by the Department of Education and Science has been increased by £120 million a year, with the DES science budget up by 16 per cent. in 1989-90 compared with 1988-89. This reflects the importance the Government attach to basic and strategic research.

The new plans imply an overall increase of £2¼ billion in public sector capital spending in 1989-90. This includes extra investment in hospitals, housing, prisons, and roads. There is provision, too, for higher investment by the nationalised industries, including further anti-pollution investment by the water authorities.

That the Government have been able to strengthen their priority programmes within an unchanged planning total for 1989-90 is, in large measure, a reflection of the success of their policies. The improved performance of the economy has eased pressures on a number of programmes, giving the Government more scope than ever before to shift resources where their own priorities, rather than circumstances, dictate. The details of these and other changes are provided in the material in the Vote Office and more details will be published in the printed Autumn Statement next week.

I turn next to national insurance contributions. The Government have conducted the usual autumn review of contributions in the light of advice from the Government Actuary on the prospective income and expenditure of the national insurance fund, and taking account of the statement on benefits which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security made last week.

The lower earnings limit will be increased next April to £43 a week, in line with the single person's pension, and the upper earnings limit will be raised to £325 a week. The upper limits for the 5 per cent. and 7 per cent. reduced rate bands will also be increased, to £75 a week and £115 a week respectively. The upper limit for the 9 per cent. rate for employers will be raised to £165 a week.

Over recent years, we have steadily reduced the Treasury supplement, the taxpayer's contribution to the national insurance fund. From 18 per cent. in 1979, it now stands at 5 per cent. My right hon. Friend and I now propose to carry this policy to its logical conclusion and to abolish the supplement altogether. The necessary legislation will be introduced early in the new Session.

However, because of the healthy state of the national insurance fund, this decision will not require any increase in contribution rates. Thus, the main class I contribution rates will remain unchanged at 9 per cent. for employees and 10·45 per cent. for employers.

Finally, I turn to the Industry Act forecast. Growth this year looks to be turning out at 4½ per cent. compared with the 3 per cent. growth forecast at the time of the Budget. Investment is particularly strong, growing twice as fast as consumption, with manufacturing investment expected to show the biggest rise of all, at 18 per cent. Indeed, it is striking that total investment has grown almost twice as fast as total consumption over the whole of the past five years.

The continuing vigour of the British economy is testimony to the transformation that has taken place in the supply side of the economy, a transformation which has enabled the seven years to 1988 to record a combination of strong and steady growth unmatched since the war.

As a result, unemployment has been falling rapidly. Since the middle of 1986, it has fallen by very nearly 1 million—the largest fall on record. Over the past year, unemployment has fallen faster in the United Kingdom than in any other major country.

Inflation, as measured by the retail prices index, is likely to be a little over 6 per cent. in the fourth quarter of this year. Part of the rise in recorded inflation reflects the impact on mortgage payments of the higher interest rates needed to tighten monetary policy and thus get inflation firmly back on a downward trend. Excluding mortgage interest payments, the RPI in the fourth quarter is likely to be around 5 per cent., compared with the 4 per cent. rise in the RPI forecast at the time of the Budget.

Exports have continued to perform well, with manufactured exports up 7½ per cent. over the past year. Over the past seven years, the United Kingdom's share of world trade in manufactured goods has remained steady after decades of decline. However, with investment booming, and consumer spending increasing fast, total imports have grown even faster than exports, rising by 13 per cent. in the year to the third quarter. This has led to a substantially greater current account deficit than forecast at the time of the Budget. For 1988 as a whole, this now looks like turning out at some £13 billion, equivalent to 2¾ per cent. of GDP. The stronger than expected economic growth this year means that total tax revenues are likely to exceed the Budget forecast by £3½ billion. Both income tax and VAT have been particularly buoyant.

In the Budget, I set a public sector debt repayment—or PSDR—for 1988-89 of £3 billion, equivalent to around ¾ per cent. of GDP. With higher than expected Government revenues and lower than expected public expenditure, this year's PSDR now looks likely to turn out at some £10 billion, equivalent to over 2 per cent. of GDP.

This will be the second successive year of debt repayment, something that has not hitherto been achieved since records began in the early 1950s. Moreover, this year, the Budget would still be in surplus, by some £4 billion, even if there had been no privatisation proceeds at all. No other major economy has such sound public finances.

Looking ahead to 1989, the economy is forecast to grow by a further 3 per cent., with domestic demand also up by

[Mr. Lawson]

3 per cent. Once again, investment is expected to grow considerably faster than consumption, and once again unemployment is expected to fall.

The slower growth forecast for 1989 inevitably implies a marked deceleration during the course of the year, particularly so far as domestic demand is concerned. Thus, comparing the second half of next year with the second half of this year, overall growth is forecast at 2¼ per cent., and growth in domestic demand at only 1½ per cent.

The current account deficit is likely to fall only slightly, to some £11 billion, or 2¼ per cent. of GDP.

Inflation, while it will inevitably continue to edge up for some months to come, is forecast to peak at some point in the middle of next year before falling back again to 5 per cent. by the fourth quarter.

In short, after two years of unexpectedly rapid expansion, growth next year is forecast to return to a sustainable level, and one which compares well with the economic performance of the 1970s, while inflation will resume its downward path.

The public finances are in substantial surplus and will remain so, with public spending on priority programmes continuing to increase, while overall public spending continues to fall as a share of GDP, to a level in 1991-92 not seen for a quarter of a century.

The prospect that lies before us is yet further testimony to the success of the policies we have been pursuing these past nine and a half years and will continue to pursue, and to the economic transformation that those policies have wrought.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): With the Chancellor's admission just before he sat down that inflation will rise beyond 6 per cent. by Christmas and that the balance of payments deficit will be an unparalleled £13 billion by the end of the year, will the Chancellor concede that the economic prospects that he promised us in the spring were not the economic realities of high interest rates, high deficits and higher inflation that we face in the autumn?

With imports rising this year by an astonishing 12 per cent. but exports by only 1·5 per cent., with our trade deficit of £2·5 billion now quadrupled for each of the next two years and with the deteriorating trade gap that is the Government's distinctive trade mark, will the Chancellor confirm that the trade deficit that he defends is almost as big a share of our national income as was the American deficit that he once so deplored?

Will the Chancellor confirm that inflation is running at almost twice the level of January, that it is more than twice as high as in our competitor countries—France, West Germany and Japan—that Britain will have the highest inflation rate of our competitor countries in 1988 and well into 1989, and that, far from being a temporary blip, 1989 will be the fifth year in a row when inflation will be above the European average? Does the Chancellor recall his objective, set out in 1984 and 1987, of zero inflation? Does he think that that promise is still credible when, after five Budgets and six Autumn Statements, inflation is now higher than when he became Chancellor?

Last November, when inflation was 4 per cent. and falling, the Chancellor told us that the minimum figure for public spending for next year would be £167 billion. After adjusting for the extra inflation that the Chancellor has caused, that figure should be £172 billion. Now that the Chancellor tells us that he will provide only £167 billion and that there is therefore a shortfall in real terms of £5 billion, will he confirm that by failing to compensate for inflation there will be a real deterioration in our essential public services and that over the next year this Chancellor will preside over cuts in housing, essential services, investment and the environment?

Opposition Members welcome any additional resources for the National Health Service and any plan to break down the appallingly high waiting lists. However, is it not the case that the nurses' and doctors' pay rise will cost almost £1 billion in 1989 and that inflation adds another £1 billion to the Treasury's own figures? When health costs are rising faster than even ordinary inflation, the sum that the Chancellor has provided today will barely cover the basic inflationary pressures that the health authorities face, far less deal with their huge backlog of structural repairs. I ask the Chancellor to confirm specifically that even after his announcement today we will still be spending, throughout 1989, a smaller share of our national income on health than almost all our major competitors.

Is there anything more revealing of the Government's priorities than the fact that in the month when the Chancellor went to the Conservative party conference to affirm a new round of top rate tax cuts for those who are already rich he still refuses to find even the tiny amount that would save free eyesight tests and free dental check-ups, even for pensioners?

This is the first financial statement since the Prime Minister announced that she was converted to the cause of the environment. However, it is clear from today's figures, which show a cut in spending on the environment, that the Prime Minister has not converted the Chancellor. Will the Chancellor confirm that there will be not just cuts in spending on the environment, but huge reductions in housing investment, which will be virtually halved over two years, which will mean that thousands of young couples will have to keep on waiting for their first home?

Will the Chancellor also confirm the cuts in educational investment which will widen the training gap between Britain and our competitors at a cost of economic efficiency and our future prospects?

When, last week, Ministers awarded a 5·9 per cent. increase for pensioners and only a 4·7 per cent. increase for families on income support, did they know that they would have to come to the House this week to announce that inflation was above 6 per cent., and still rising, and that therefore the standard of living of millions of our citizens would inevitably fall? Is it not obvious for everyone to see that in this, as in so many other areas, the top rate tax cuts that the Chancellor gave to a few individuals in the spring are now being paid for by reductions in public investment for all our communities this autumn?

This is an Autumn Statement which compounds rather than corrects the errors of the Budget. It is an Autumn Statement which condemns an already congested Britain to further deteriorations in our public services. It is an Autumn Statement which, by the neglect of investment and a policy of high interest rates, leaves the British economy ill equipped and ill prepared for the challenges of the 1990s.

Mr. Lawson: It is apparent, I think, to the whole House that the hon. Gentleman had carefully written all that out before he had seen or heard the statement that I have made. Let me reply to the various points he made.

The hon. Gentleman said that next year, in 1989-90, there would be a real deterioration in public services. That is what he said. It is nonsense. If he looks at the figures, spending on programmes next year is due to rise by 2¾ per cent. in real terms. That is the truth of the matter.

Secondly, as far as the Health Service is concerned, the hon. Gentleman failed to listen to what I told him—and I explained carefully how this was arrived at. Real resources for the National Health Service next year will be 4½ per cent. higher than this year, far and away more than anybody has ever hitherto suggested. And I may say, spending on health as a proportion of total public spending is far higher today than it ever was under Labour.

As for housing investment, the hon. Gentleman alleged that there would be cuts in housing investment. That again is totally untrue. What he is talking about, of course, is the right-to-buy programme, but gross housing investment by local authorities and new towns will be up in real terms as well as in money terms. He said public investment will be down. In fact, public investment will be up by £2¼ billion. It was the Labour Government—the last Labour Government—who slashed public sector investment and we have maintained it and, indeed, outside the housing sector, it has increased under us.

The hon. Gentleman also called for more investment. As I pointed out to the House in my statement, over the past five years, total investment in this country has risen almost twice as much as total consumption. Indeed, taking the whole of our period of office since 1979, investment has risen more than consumption. Under Labour—they had admittedly a much smaller increase in consumption—the increase in investment was infinitesimal, only about one eighth of the increase in consumption. That is what happened when they were in office. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman's account of the economy showed again that he has no contact whatever with reality.

The hon. Gentleman talked about inflation. I am not going to take any lessons on inflation from the hon. Members opposite, when inflation, when they were in office, averaged 15½ per cent. and never once—not in one month, not in their most favourable month—was it ever as low as it is at the present time, even though it is still too high and it has to come lower; nor did he mention once record exports, record productivity, record investment, record output and record employment, too. I would have liked to have heard some acknowledgment of that from the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I am grateful for the additional funds that the Government have provided for the National Health Service, but am concerned that the Chancellor is taking more money out of housing through local authority council house sales revenues than he is, on his own admission, putting back into it. Is he not singing, "Don't worry, be happy", when he is presiding over a high-risk strategy with interest rates which will remain high and feed through into mortgages and pay claims, with inflation which could touch 8 per cent. even within the forecast that he has given, with a balance of payments deficit which will not go down significantly so far as the eye can see, with the risk of a sterling crisis and with the money supply not within the target range? Is it not obvious that, instead of merely introducing an autumn statement, he should have brought forward an autumn Budget at the same time or, at the very least, indicated that he would not make further tax reductions in his next Budget, or does he not expect to introduce another Budget?

Mr. Lawson: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for letting me know about the difficulties of conducting economic policy. I have to tell him that I was already well aware of them and am already satisfied that the policies that we have in place are adequate to the situation, as, indeed, they have been for the past nine and a half years. There is no question of an autumn Budget, I can tell the hon. Gentleman. That only happened under the Labour Government which he supported.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): The House will agree that my right hon. Friend would be well advised to ignore the carping criticism of the Opposition, particularly with their record of the management—or mismanagement—of our economy when they were in office. Does he agree that his statement will be welcomed, not only in this House, but in the country? I hope that he will emphasise the fact that the Government are unique in that they have cut taxation, increased public expenditure in real terms and have been repaying the national debt. Those are three very good things.

I am sure that the House will wish to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on the admirable way in which he has dealt with the £167 billion. It will be welcomed that the percentage of national income going on public expenditure is now below 40 per cent. and is going lower. It is an achievement to have stuck to the £167 billion and he deserves our congratulations.

Mr. Lawson: I agree with everything that my hon. Friend said and, in particular, with his congratulations to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary. Of course, I have to confess to the House—I did not expect my statement to be welcome to the Benches opposite. I did not expect them to welcome the fact that we have succeeded in holding the planning total at £167 billion. I did not expect them to welcome the fact that we have got total public expenditure below 40 per cent. of GDP for the first time in over 20 years because, of course, the only thing they know about is increasing public expenditure, increasing it faster and faster, and faster than the economy can afford, and we know where that led to. It led to the humiliation of having to go cap in hand to the IMF, and they have learnt nothing from their experience last time.

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): Is the Chancellor aware that, by his performance today, he has confirmed the Prime Minister's assessment that he is not leadership material? Is he also aware, in the light of his confident statement, that last Thursday the Shropshire health authority confirmed a large hospital closure programme for want of £3 million? If he is now putting his money where his mouth is, will he please write to the Shropshire health authority, telling it that it is no longer necessary for it to undergo those cuts because he is in fact proposing a real increase in income?

Mr. Lawson: As the hon. Gentleman knows—even though he has had to switch constituencies, I think he is probably now reasonably familiar with his new one—unlike the slashing cuts in hospital spending under the Government that he supported, there have been substantial increases in hospital building programmes under this Government, not least the large new general hospital at Telford.

Mr. Terence L. Higgins (Worthing): I welcome an autumn statement which shows that it is possible to combine the tax cuts of the last Budget with substantial increases in public expenditure and a far greater repayment of the public debt than anyone expected at the time of the last Budget.

Clearly, a growth rate of 4·5 per cent., which was also higher than predicted, is not sustainable. Is it now my right hon. Friend's intention to keep the growth in demand in line with the productive potential now being achieved?

Mr. Lawson: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. Yes, indeed, it is necessary that we should keep the growth in demand in line with productive potential, and the growth in productive potential, fortunately, is the success of the supply side policies of this Government. The growth in productive potential now is greater than we have ever known in the past, but, of course, it is not as large as 4½ per cent. and there has to be a slowing down. That is right.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be more specific. In the economic prospects for 1989, he forecasts that there will be a slightly smaller current account deficit than £13 billion. Will he put a figure on that? Is it £12 billion or £11 billion? He goes into the question of a 5 per cent. inflation rate in the fourth quarter of 1989 and warns that it will peak in mid-1989. Is he talking of an 8 per cent. rise in the second or third quarter? The Chancellor also forecasts that unit labour costs will grow more rapidly than 1 per cent. over this year. What figure is he estimating for unit labour costs?

Mr. Lawson: On the last point, I do not have in my head the figure for the expected increase in unit labour costs, but the right hon. Gentleman will be able to find that in the material that is published today. It is, of course, only a forecast, and has the same status as other forecasts made by anybody. As regards the current account of the balance of payments, I did quote the figure that is being forecast for the current account deficit next year. It is a deficit of £11 billion. I am not surprised that the right hon. Gentleman did not hear it because of the barrage of noise that was coming from the Opposition Benches, which is such a deplorable feature of the House of Commons these days.

Mr. Leon Brittan (Richmond, Yorks): May I join in congratulating my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on his formidable achievement in continuing the downward path of public expenditure as a proportion of national income while at the same time providing extra resources for priority areas of expenditure? Does he agree that if top priority is to be given to reducing the present levels of inflation, fiscal policy must reinforce monetary policy? That means envisaging an even higher level of debt repayment in the coming year than would otherwise be necessary.

Mr. Lawson: My right hon. and learned Friend obviously speaks with the particular authority of a former Chief Secretary to the Treasury, and I take note of what he says. The fiscal policy—the fiscal stance that we have now in the United Kingdom—is exceptionally tight, and looking at the fiscal stance one has to look at both sides, taxation and public expenditure, and, indeed, at the surplus, which is the difference between those two. As for the question of the Budget judgment, my right hon. and learned Friend will understand that I am not going to be tempted on to that ground now. The Budget judgment is something that I will take at the appropriate time in the normal way.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on Trent, South): Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer please take note of the fact that yesterday I received a letter from a man who is paralysed from the neck down—a tetraplegic. He said that, as a result of the Government's cost-cutting social security changes in April, he is £13 a week worse off despite transitional protection. Will the right hon. Gentleman write to this man and thank him for contributing to his pot of gold in the form of a budgetary surplus? Will he console him with an assurance that, despite the appalling fall in his income, the British economy is bigger, stronger, more successful and so on?

Mr. Lawson: Well, of course, I do not know about the particular circumstances of the individual case that the right hon. Gentleman spoke about. What I do know is that spending on the disabled has increased by 90 per cent. since this Government took office, and there is provision for a further substantial increase in spending on the disabled in the public expenditure plans which I have published today.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend and his Treasury colleagues on withstanding the blandishments of some of their high-spending colleagues and keeping the planning total down to the level that was published last January? Does my right hon. Friend agree that repayment of the national debt, much of which was incurred by the profligacy of the last Labour Government, brings continuous benefit to our children and grandchildren? What is his long-term target for reducing public expenditure in terms of gross domestic product? Will it be reduced to the level of the 1960s, when we had another successful Conservative Government?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right about the enormous value in having a Budget surplus and repaying the national debt year by year. There is the benefit in the short term that we see—being able to spend more on public expenditure programmes because debt interest is taking a smaller amount of the total public expenditure cake. It also, of course, is very important for future generations—reducing the burden of debt interest that future generations have to bear. It was the Labour Government who were entirely, if I may coin a phrase, a "me now" Government.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): The Chancellor of the Exchequer partly attributed the increase in inflation to the increase in interest rates and the effect on mortgages. Does not he realise that eight of the 10 large building societies are not increasing mortgage payments until April 1989? That means that a political and economic time bomb will hit inflation in April, May and June 1989, just in time for the European elections. Will he reconsider the use of interest rates as a short-term lever, and will he tell the House what his assumptions on interest rates are for the next two years?

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension about what he calls the political and economic time bomb. The way the RPI is constructed, the increase in mortgage rates is fed into the RPI immediately the building societies announce it. It does not wait until they implement it. Therefore, there is nothing further to come in April. It does mean, of course, that because one or two building societies, notably the Halifax, do not in fact require the people it is lending to to pay more until April —some of them do it much earlier and, of course, for new mortgages it is earlier—the tightening in monetary conditions that occurs as a result of putting up interest rates, and mortgage rates going up, is not something that happens instantaneously. It happens progressively, and there will be a progressive tightening for the very reason that the hon. Gentleman said, but the effect on the RPI is immediate.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): Does my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer recall that when he made his Autumn Statement last year there was well-founded apprehension that the crash in world stock markets would have a damaging effect on the British economy and the world economy generally? Will he accept that today's statement is a great tribute to the underlying strength of the British economy and to the timely measures that he took to ensure that the effects of the crash did not have a damaging effect on the British economy? Only the churlish would use hindsight to say that he was wrong in taking those steps in terms of ensuring adequate liquidity, or would criticise the measures that he has now taken to tighten monetary conditions so as to squeeze inflation out of the system.

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. I do vividly recall the very different circumstances in which I introduced last year's Autumn Statement. I believe that the measures that we took to avert a world recession at that time were fully justified, even though, as I have said on another occasion, they may have stored up some problems later on. What I do recall is that the Labour party was urging me to cut interest rates far more and to expand far more than I thought it prudent to do at the time. I also recall more recently, incidentally, in our Budget debate that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) said:

"current taxation revenues without privatisation receipts should exceed current expenditure, he did not balance the Budget last year or this year, and he will not balance it in years to come."—[Official Report, 21 March 1988; Vol. 130, c. 103.]

I hope that he will now concede that that is precisely what I have done.

Mr. David Blunkett (Sheffield, Brightside): Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer confirm that the base from which his announcements on the Health Service funding were predicted was £25·683 billion? That has been increased already by the announcements made over recent months to £26·571 billion. Contrary to what the right hon. Gentleman said to my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), this means that, taking into account the Government's optimistic prediction of 4·7 per cent. inflation and the dubious statistics on once-off sales of land and superannuation changes, the Government will be short of £200 million in meeting the 4·7 per cent. increase in inflation for the Health Service. If this is not a sleight of hand, it has to be misleading and mischievous given the impact that it will have on those working in the Health Service and on those who receive the services that are provided by it. Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that there has been a decrease, not an increase?

Mr. Lawson: I confirm no such thing. For example, it is absurd to suggest that the £300 million a year superannuation contribution—which NHS employers used to have to pay and will no longer have to pay and therefore the money will go straight into providing health care—should not be counted. That is an absurdity. That is £300 million of extra money. As I said, even after taking into account inflation, the real increase in health spending next year is around 4½ per cent.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): Does my right hon. Friend agree that his reduction in income tax rates have helped to fuel extra taxation revenues and that the highest rate taxpayers now pay a larger proportion of those revenues than they did under a Labour Government? Will he also agree that, with the extra 3 per cent. above inflation for future spending programmes, the Conservative party has more humanity, more justice and more ability than the Labour party ever possessed?

Mr. Lawson: Certainly the Conservative party in government has a great deal more success in achieving economic growth as well as getting inflation down, therefore enabling more resources to be put to the purposes which I understood the Labour party was in favour of. Of course, the Labour party is totally oblivious to the facts and, after five and a half years as Chancellor of the Exchequer, I am beginning to believe that it is extraordinarily difficult to educate Labour Members.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): While it may be true that the British economy weathered the stock market crash in the autumn of 1987, it has weathered less well the chaotic and catastrophic handling of the exchange rate and the tax reductions for higher earners introduced in the Chancellor's Budget this year. Will the Chancellor confirm that he is relying on the speculative movement of capital into this country to finance the deficit in our balance of payments which is now four times what it was forecast to be in last year's Autumn Statement? If that balance of payments deficit is to continue into the 1990s, how will it affect public, national and international confidence in our economy? If interest rates are to be the only barricade against the loss of confidence, how high will they have to go to maintain that international confidence?

Mr. Lawson: Clearly, so long as there is a deficit on the current account of the balance of payments, there must equally be an inflow of capital from overseas because the balance of payments must balance. Some of that inflow capital will be money that is lent and is securing interest. Some of it will be direct equity investment in this country. There will be and there are both kinds. More and more mobile funds today are looking for a good home and for a home where they have confidence in the political stability and economic policies of the Government concerned. That is why there is so much capital actively seeking a home in this country. The deficit on the current account of the balance of payments will in due course diminish quite significantly, but in the meantime, as the markets show very clearly, there is complete confidence in this country and no problem whatever in financing the deficit that we have.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): While dealing with the many large and justified claims on the public purse, was my right hon. Friend this year able to accommodate a small one, and remove the injustice suffered by colonial service pensioners who are not allowed to count war service in their pension entitlement?

Mr. Lawson: I certainly recognise the very determined work of my hon. Friend and some others in lobbying for this. I am pleased to be able to tell them that provision has been made for war service credit in the calculation of pensions of ex-colonial service men. Up to 6,000 pensioners should benefit from that.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): When does the right hon. Gentleman expect the balance of payments to come back into surplus?

Mr. Lawson: Fortunately, under the Industry Act 1975 I am not required to forecast any further than the year ahead. It will not come back into surplus in 1989.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): I know that my right hon. Friend is a very kindly and sympathetic man. His statement sets out the most magnificent record of economic management and very reassuring prospects for our economy. Will he spare a thought for the appalling problems that he has caused the Opposition? It is quite impossible to argue with such a record and say anything remotely sensible, as was demonstrated from the Opposition Front Bench. The prospect of £10 billion of public sector debt repayment next year is splendid, but its effect on demand will be negated if it is compensated by net household dissaving. I know that my right hon. Friend is concerned about this and that is why he has raised interest rates. Will he give us some estimate of how he sees the savings ratio moving over the next 12 months?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is clearly a most perceptive observer of the political scene. It is essential that there should be an increase in the savings ratio and that is why I increased interest rates quite substantially which will both deter borrowing and increase the incentive to save. It will incidentally provide an enhanced income for savers among whom, in particular, pensioners tend to be numbered. That is something which the Opposition have failed to acknowledge at any time during our debates. As for when the savings ratio will turn, that is one of the hardest things to forecast, but I expect that it will not be too long before we can see a turn up in the savings ratio.

Ms. Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): The Chancellor told us today that the RPI increase will be about 5 per cent. in the fourth quarter assuming that mortgage interest payments are excluded. If they are included in that equation, will pensioners receive a 5·9 per cent. increase or less?

Mr. Lawson: As I have said, RPI in the fourth quarter is likely to turn out at 6¼ per cent. Under this Government pensioners have had an uprating every year and will continue to have that, according to inflation in the previous years. They will not, as occurred under the last Labour Government, be cheated by the switch from the historic basis for uprating to uprating on the basis of some spurious forecasts.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on granting an additional £120 million for basic research in the United Kingdom. That will be a tonic to British science and we hope that he will bear it in mind in future contributions. How much of this money will be applied to our international commitments in CERN and in space?

Mr. Lawson: I know my hon. Friend's long-standing interest in this and a number of other scientific and energy matters. I am afraid that I cannot answer his question, but I am sure that if he puts his question to the Minister responsible for these matters he will receive an answer.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): I congratulate the Chancellor on a wonderful statement and speech but may I tell him—[Interruption.] The figures surely represent lies, damn lies and Tory propaganda. If he does not understand that, there is something wrong. The reality is all around us. There is a major crisis in the economy and that will not be resolved simply by juggling the figures or by the Chancellor making pretty statements here.

The Chancellor has not mentioned Scotland. We appreciate in Scotland that there is a struggle going on against the poll tax, a very regressive tax which obviously benefits the rich at the expense of the poor. Will he not appreciate that, unless that tax is removed or controlled in some way, there will be a major challenge next year? The Chancellor must understand that increasingly more and more Labour Members will be backing the struggle even if that is against the law. It is the Government's law, an unjust law and a class law.

Mr. Lawson: This particular occasion is one on which we talk about public expenditure. Therefore, I shall content myself with informing the hon. Gentleman that public expenditure per head in Scotland is far far higher than public expenditure per head in England or Wales.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is now clear that the British economy is heading not for the crash landing for which the Opposition are so desperately hoping, but for what economists are apparently wont to call a soft landing? Is not the remarkable thing about that so-called soft landing that it involves a growth rate next year of 2·5 per cent., which is extremely respectable by both international and historic standards?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right in what he says about the Opposition. It is a matter for considerable concern that the Opposition should all the time be hoping and wishing to see economic disaster. What is causing such frustration on the Opposition Benches is that year after year since they have been in opposition they have predicted it, and year after year it has failed to turn up and it will continue to fail to turn up.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Chancellor give us some insight into certain aspects of the international economy, particularly the movements in the price of oil, which vitally affect his tax-raising powers? Secondly, if a growth rate of 4·5 per cent. is not sustainable, due to certain elements of overheating which particularly affect the midlands and the south-east, and we are reduced to a growth rate of 2·5 per cent., which leaves Scotland with high and unacceptable levels of unemployment, how will his policy correct the disastrous regional imbalances which persist in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Lawson: On the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, the British economy's dependence on oil and oil tax revenues was never nearly as great as many people imagined. Indeed, since the collapse in the oil price in 1986, the importance of oil tax revenues to the Exchequer's total revenues is really very slight indeed. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman need lose no sleep over that. What I think we would obviously most like to see is the absence of a high degree of volatility in the oil price because that makes it rather harder for the oil companies to plan their investment programmes. As for regional imbalances, the Scotish economy is doing better now than it has ever done before. As the hon. Gentleman knows, continuation of that improvement is overwhelmingly in the hands of the Scottish people themselves.

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): Has the Chancellor any idea of what the regional breakdown in the expenditure that he has announced will be? For example, in the inadequate amount of public sector capital investment that he has announced, will there be any guarantee that the regions will get the direct links to the Channel tunnel that they badly need?

Mr. Lawson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport has received a particularly large percentage increase in his programme. A substantial amount of extra money will be spent on roads, but how that is allocated between different road projects is, to a considerable extent, a matter for him.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Is it not disturbing that even in the third quarter of this year the clearing banks lent a record £5 billion on mortgages? Does that not clearly show the extent of the overheating in the economy and how long and hard it will be to contain inflation?

Mr. Lawson: The battle against inflation is one that has to be waged all the time and is always a struggle, but I think that my hon. Friend should realise that what has been happening lately is that the banks have been securing an increased share of the market at the expense of the building societies and in looking at the mortgage market it is necessary to look at the banks and the building societies together, not just one part of the whole market. It is fairly clear—most people who are close to the housing market are aware of this—that the housing market has softened considerably since the summer of this year.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Will my right hon. Friend accept that these figures are truly remarkable and better than many of us expected the outturn to be, and that many of us are extraordinarily pleased about the extra money being given to the overseas aid programme, particularly bearing in mind the tragedies that have happened in the past 12 months? Do the National Health figures, which are much more than the leaked figures that we all heard yesterday, mean that Her Majesty's Government will encourage the Department of Health to spend more on preventive medicine, and will that help the outcome of tonight's debate?

Mr. Lawson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his earlier remarks. Priorities within the health programme are, in the first instance, a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The whole question of improving further the NHS is very much at the heart of the review of the Health Service and health care that we are conducting under the chairmanship of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

As for the outcome of tonight's debate, I very much hope that the measures that the Government are proposing, which are desirable and right on their merits, will be approved by the House. But I have to make it clear that if, by any mischance, that were not to be the case, there would be no question of additional funds being made available for the NHS over and above the massive increases that I announced earlier today.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must have regard to the subsequent debates that the Chancellor has just mentioned, and we also have a ten-minute Bill today. I shall allow questions on this important statement to continue for another 10 minutes and then we must move on.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the Chancellor proud of the fact that since the Government have been in office there have been cuts in housing public expenditure of nearly 70 per cent. which have resulted in a great deal of housing misery and which could be seen by the Chancellor in a five-minute walk from Downing street to the Embankment? Does not he recognise that so many of those people in housing need cannot afford a mortgage and certainly cannot afford the market rents that will arise from what is now being proposed in the Housing Bill? If all is so well in the economy, why does the Prime Minister take the view that the Chancellor is not the person to succeed her? Is he not at times humiliated by the way that he is treated?

Mr. Lawson: The Government's housing policy has two main planks. One is to switch resources from the public to the private sector, and that we have done with enormous success by private sector housebuilding increasing very substantially and, of course, by the right-to-buy programme—the purchase by council tenants of their own homes. The other element which has come to the fore more recently is the resuscitation of the private rented sector. That again is of the first importance and that was why the new business expansion scheme arrangements were put in place in this year's Budget and they are again proving extremely successful.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): My right hon. Friend correctly identifies the preoccupation with inflation. Therefore, does he agree that it is doubly important that the Opposition should not egg on every wage claim for the next 12 months? Further, will he make it clear to industry that it cannot count upon a progressive deterioration of the exchange rate to compensate for any failure to control industrial costs?

Mr. Lawson: I underline that. I believe that that is a point I have made on a number of occasions over the past two years. I happily reiterate it now. It is, after all, of the first importance that businesses have to control their own costs in order to remain competitive, and that means controlling their own wage costs. They will not be bailed out by a devaluation of the currency.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer accept that the Autumn Statement shows high interest rates and a high pound, which have inflicted so much damage on manufacturing and commerce, and does he also accept that, having inflicted damage on our public services, the future is bleak? If not, what is the future?

Mr. Lawson: I know what the future would be if there were ever to be a Labour Government, which there will not be, based on the recipe which the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths) has put forward. It would be certainly a much lower pound, lower interest rates in the short term but then having to rocket up later, an economic crisis, and raging inflation. That is what we would see if the policies which the hon. Gentleman is advocating were pursued.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): I hope that my right hon. Friend accepts the fact that the views of the Opposition are blinkered. There has, as a result of my right hon. Friend's economic policies, been massive private sector investment in north-west England, to the benefit of all concerned.

I wish to ask my right hon. Friend about National Savings—another product of the north-west. In the light of his excellent tax revenues, I seek his assurance that National Savings products will continue to be developed, to assist savings.

Mr. Lawson: I appreciate my hon. Friend's continued interest in the National Savings department. Indeed, it will have a continuing role to play. He will recall that I announced at the Conservative party conference in October of this year that we will be launching in January an entirely new National Savings instrument, the capital bond, which I hope will prove to be extremely attractive.

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): The Chancellor of the Exchequer made no mention of interest rates—his sole regulator—or of monetary growth, which is truly alarming. Given his deteriorating balance of payments deficit, is it not certain that one crucial question that should be asked of his statement is how soon it will propel him into yet another round of interest rate rises? What assurance can the right hon. Gentleman give the House, in view of today's reinforcement of domestic demand, sustained monetary growth, and the world trend towards interest rate rises?

Mr. Lawson: I am always particularly interested in what the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy) has to say, not least because it is always in complete 180-degree contradiction to everything that his hon. Friends have to say. As I have always said, the level of interest rates will be whatever is necessary in order to keep downward pressure on inflation, and they will be kept at that level for as long as it is necessary to do so.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is a huge gulf between his Autumn Statement and the series of mini-Budgets and almost monthly crises that studded the last Labour Government? Will he bear in mind that there are millions of savers in this country as well as borrowers; that those savers need to be encouraged; that higher interest rates encourage saving and will improve the savings ratio—in marked contrast to the situation in the 1970s, when savers found their returns continually outpaced by inflation?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) is absolutely right. It was the last Labour Government which robbed the savers, and the elderly in particular, by inflation—which not only gave them profound anxiety as to what their pension would buy next month, next week, whatever it happened to be, but also of course meant that they had a negative real return on the savings they had. Now the real return is positive. It has been positive for many years past, and it has now been increased. That is something which is very important to savers, and it is important at the present time to the health of the British economy.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): The Chancellor has berated the Opposition for waiting for an economic disaster to happen. I put it to him that what really concerns us are two aspects of the Government's economic policy. First, unemployment is still twice what it was when the Government came to office. If there had been the supply side miracle to which the Chancellor has referred, that would not be the case after nine and a half years. Secondly, the Chancellor said that the cumulative balance of trade deficit for the fiscal years 1988, 1989 and 1990 will total well over £30 billion and possibly £35 billion, thereby taking up most of the £50 billion oil price cushion that has been built up in United Kingdom assets owned abroad. The Chancellor is surely really saying that he is waiting for a supply side miracle.

Mr. Lawson: The supply side miracle has already happened and we are seeing the benefits of that. As for unemployment, I will tell the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) that there are more people at work in this country today than ever before in our history.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his admirable statement. Bearing in mind that the personal ratio of debt to assets has increased to about 33 per cent. and that the principal instrument that he is using is interest rates, will he give consideration to the possibility of controlling personal finance through, for example, urging the credit card companies to increase the minimum return on a monthly basis and by controlling hire purchase? The National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux says that almost 1·4 million people approached its offices last year with debt problems. With that in mind, will my right hon. Friend give urgent consideration to the other mechanisms that I have mentioned?

Mr. Lawson: I do not think that what my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) says would really help in the present situation—not least because personal borrowing and household borrowing is overwhelmingly borrowing on mortgages. Both credit cards and hire purchase are a very, very small proportion of the total —it is overwhelmingly borrowing on mortgages. No, there is no escape from the need to raise interest rates, and that is why I have raised them and will continue to keep them as high as they need to be for as long as is necessary.

As for what my hon. Friend says, however, that does not mean that there is not a responsibility—there is—on both lenders and borrowers: for lenders not to lend to those whom they think might get into difficulties, and for borrowers not to borrow beyond their capacity to repay and to service.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the House, I shall put together the Questions on the five motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered.

That the Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) Amendment No. 4 Order 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 1881) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Criminal Justice Act 1988 (Offensive Weapons) Order 1988 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Weights and Measures (Miscellaneous Foods) Order 1988 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Weights and Measures (Intoxicating Liquor) Order 1988 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Education Support Grants (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1988 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. John M. Taylor.]

London Local Authorities Bill

4.46 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This point of order arises out of the first matter of this afternoon that you, Mr. Speaker, asked to be taken now, in relation to the London Local Authorities Bill, about which you may have been alerted.

I objected to the motion this afternoon and obviously the matter has been put back. This matter arises from the last occasion that the Bill came before the House. It was objected to on the first occasion, and on the second occasion my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) objected to it as well—but I understand from inquiries I have made that that objection was not heard.

I wonder whether it is possible, on the grounds that I understand exist in "Erskine May", when a stage of a private Bill is taken by mistake, for the order that the Bill has been read a Second time to be discharged and the matter be remitted so that the Second Reading can again be put before the House and proceeded with as though the objection had been taken.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) for giving me notice of his point of order.

Unfortunately, the events about which he is concerned took place as long ago as 20 October. If a right hon. or hon. Member objects to a stage of a Bill when it is called, it is up to him to make sure that his objection is heard by the Chair. If the occupant of the Chair proceeds to put the Question and subsequently declares that the Ayes have it, as I did on that occasion, then the right hon. or hon. Member wishing to object has missed his opportunity and there is nothing that can be done about it on a subsequent day. I regret that there is nothing that I can do to help in this matter.

Trade Descriptions Act 1968 (Amendment)

4.48 pm

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to extend the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 to require the labelling of furs procured by means of the trapping of wild animals and for related purposes.

My aim is to make the potential British purchaser of furs at least aware that a fur has come from a trapped animal that has probably suffered a long drawn out and agonising death.

It will be remembered that earlier this year the Government introduced a similar amendment. Then, prior to the Toronto summit, which itself followed a debate on this issue in the Canadian Parliament in which some Canadian Members called for economic sanctions against our country, the Government dropped the proposed Bill because of legal technicalities.

One technicality was the legal definition of the term "commonly caught" by trapping. I have tried to overcome this technical difficulty in the drafting of the Bill.

Trapping is cruel, indiscriminate and unnecessary. It is not just cruel, but brutally cruel. It is bad enough for a man to be caught in a trap in the wild, but can you, Mr.

[Mr. John Browne]

Speaker, or any right hon. and hon. Member imagine the mental trauma of a wild animal caught in a trap—the feeling of sheer terror, of wild panic and mental and physical agony? A trapped animal's first reaction is to bite and to fight the trap itself, which of course is made of metal, so it invariably breaks its teeth and even its jaw. When it gives up that fight against an inanimate object, it starts to pull and gnaw off its limb that is caught in the trap to try to break free.

If it is still alive after two, three, seven or even 10 days of absolute agony and mental desperation, weakened severely by lack of water and food, the animal is then killed by the trapper. It may, if it is lucky, be shot, but shooting spoils the fur. Shooting is relatively expensive. Shooting involves the trapper in a risk of ricochet—of hitting himself—when firing at a target at such close range, as the bullet may hit a stone. So most of the animals are either clubbed or suffocated to death.

Clubbing is a very drawn-out way of killing an animal, but suffocation is even more grotesque, judging by the instructions that are found in trapping magazines. One example is the instruction to lay the exhausted animal out with one foot on its open throat and the other on its rib cage, using what is described as a rocking motion, to drive the air out of the animal's lungs while letting air out but none in by means of the foot pressure on its throat. Gradually—gradually—the animal dies, in a space of time, depending on its health at the time, of between five and 15 minutes. It is a grotesque form of death. I have pictures of these various forms of death which I shall make available for right hon. and hon. Members in the Library.

Trapping is nothing more or less than obscene, brutal and drawn-out cruelty to animals. It is also entirely indiscriminate. It is impossible to target a trap. Birds of prey are caught; endangered species are caught; even hunting dogs or the pets of people wandering in the forest and the outback are caught.

What is more, trapping is actually unnecessary. Yet it is defended vociferously as vital to indigenous life in the outback. It is estimated that more than 20 million animals are killed by trapping each year in north America alone —there are no statistics for the Soviet Union—and that there are more than 500,000 registered trappers in north America alone. They constitute a very well-organised and powerful lobby.

Yet the estimates of what I term the "native" trappers —the trappers who genuinely hunt animals by trapping for their living—are relatively small. Native trappers really exist today only in the Yukon and the North-West Territories of Canada, and in those provinces they represent fewer than 5 per cent. of registered trappers. The native trapper is in a very small minority.

Evidence shows clearly that trapping is overwhelmingly a hobby—a grotesque hobby. So let us see what the British public think of it. In a major poll conducted in March 1987 by Research Surveys of Great Britain Ltd., the statement that there should be a ban on the import of all fur and fur products made from trapped animals attracted an overwhelming 72 per cent. support. The tougher statement that there should be a complete ban on trapping animals for their fur attracted 74 per cent. support. When the sample was taken just from women—the main beneficiaries of furs in this country—a staggering 83 per cent. supported the ban.

Let us see how that public opinion has been translated politically. In this Session of Parliament we have had two early-day motions, No. 978 in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths), and No. 287 in the name of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett). Each of those early-day motions attracted about 200 signatories from the Back Benches, although the Government had dropped their proposed legislation.

I am proud to say that the British Government have made trapping illegal in the United Kingdom. I am also proud to say that the British Government have signed the Berne convention, and I am very pleased to hear that the EEC Commission strongly supports legislation such as that originally proposed by Her Majesty's Government and now proposed by me, along with my sponsors.

Public opinion in the civilised world demands action against trapping. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State needs this Bill so that he can inform individual people and so allow each person to take his own individual actions within our country.

Of course the Bill treads on many rich and politically powerful toes, but I emphasise to you, Mr. Speaker, and to my right hon. Friends in Her Majesty's Government, that when the abolition of slavery was first proposed in this House it also met massive resistance from rich and politically powerful vested interests. Yet the Members of this House stood firm, and England led the world in abolishing slavery. It is in that spirit that I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Browne, Mr. Harry Cohen, Sir John Farr, Mr. Tony Benn, Mr. Churchill, Mr. David Steel, Mr. Sydney Chapman, Mr. Charles Kennedy, Mrs. Elizabeth Peacock, Mr. Donald Anderson, Mr. John Hannam and Mr. Alan Beith.

Trades Descriptions Act 1968 (Amendment)

Mr. John Browne accordingly presented a Bill to extend the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 to require the labelling of furs procured by means of the trapping of wild animals and for related purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 221.]

Orders of the Day

Health and Medicines Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think it would be generally agreed that it is very difficult for hon. Members to relate what is actually happening to the various papers before them today. I do not expect you to reply to me substantially today, but my question is this. Does it lie within your power to order that the paper called "Consideration of Lords Amendments" be consolidated with the actual list of Lords amendments, so that we know what action is proposed by amendment in the case of each Lords amendment rather than having two different papers relating to the Bill? Or does it require a positive examination and report by the Procedure Committee before such action can be taken? I respectfully submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the chaotic papers today give the best example there could ever be of the need for reform of this matter so that hon. Members actually know what they are doing.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is right. The House often feels that it is difficult to relate the amendments to the Lords amendments when they are on separate papers. I shall look into what the hon. Gentleman has said with a view to seeing if there is anything I can do in the matter. If I cannot do anything, the matter might be referred to the Select Committee on Procedure with a view to changing the practice. Today, however, as we proceed, the occupant of the Chair will make it as clear as possible what amendments we are debating and relate them to the Lords amendments.

The first Lords amendment falling for debate this afternoon is Lords amendment No. 1. I must inform the House that the amendment is affected by privilege. With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 4 and Lords amendments Nos. 36, 37 and 44.

Clause 1

VESTING OF PROPERTY ETC. OF CORPORATION IN A COMPANY NOMINATED BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE AND DISSOLUTION OF CORPORATION

Lords amendment: No. 1 in page 1, line 20, at end insert "or rights to subscribe for any such securities"

5 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

I shall do my best to pick my way through the forest of amendments. I put on record our appreciation of the detailed revision work on the Bill carried out in the other place.

The first group of amendments refers to clause 1 which refers to the General Practice Finance Corporation. Clauses 1 to 6 provide for the abolition of the GPFC as presently constituted, and for its property, rights and liabilities to be transferred to a company incorporated under the Companies Act 1985, which I shall call the successor company.

In reply to the question why we should do that, I would refer to the original context and role of the GPFC and how that has changed during the past 20 years. As independent contractors, general medical practitioners are responsible for providing surgery premises. Back in the 1960s some doctors found it difficult to raise the capital required so that GPFC was set up under the 1966 Act with powers to make long-term loans to doctors for the purposes of acquiring or improving practice premises. Those powers were extended by the Health Services Act 1980 to include the acquisition and leaseback of premises.

The lending scheme operated by the corporation allows loans up to 100 per cent. of the cost or valuation of surgeries over a term of up to 20 years at fixed or variable rates of interest. Before making a loan, the GPFC must be satisfied that the premises have been approved by the local family practitioner committee and will be used regularly and substantially for the provision of general medical services under the NHS.

The GPFC is a non-profit making and entirely self-supporting organisation. It charges all borrowers a rate of interest sufficient to cover its own borrowing and administrative costs. It obtains funds by temporary borrowing and by issuing stock under Treasury guarantee, all of which to date—£125 million—has been taken up by the National Investment and Loans Office. The GPFC's borrowing net of repayments to NILO is classified as public expenditure and as a result contributes to the PSBR, hence our interest in removing it from that consideration. We feel that such a financial service was thought necessary in 1966, but, given that such financing is a well-established private sector activity, we need to ask why we need to make special provision for it in the public sector in respect of family doctors. I believe that the answer is that we do not.

Plenty of GPs already raise funds for their practice premises from other financial institutions. On various occasions they have been proud to show off those premises to me, and there is no reason to believe that they would be less likely to use the GPFC if it were privately owned.

Funds are readily available and there is healthy competition among lenders. In such circumstances, it makes obvious sense to concentrate our public resources on those things which only the public sector can do. In transferring the corporation to private ownership, we shall be giving a major reputable financial institution the opportunity to acquire the GPFC. We shall not be giving it away; we shall acquire some money for it and we expect that institution to administer it in the interest of doctors and patients.

As well as commanding the confidence of private sector investors, we wish to retain the interest and involvement of our family doctors. To that end we are undertaking discussions with their representatives and with the corporation about how best that might be achieved. We certainly hope and expect to see family doctors on the board of the new company so that they can contribute their knowledge and experience to the management of its affairs. We are also seeking powers to influence the content of the memorandum and articles of association so as to safeguard the main objectives of the present corporation through the successor body. We are also increasing the corporation's current borrowing powers from £150 million to £160 million to ensure that it remains actively in business pending the conclusion of the new arrangements that we propose.

The four amendments to clause 1 are important but essentially technical. They are designed to smooth the passage of the GPFC into the private sector. Amendments Nos 36 and 37 to clause 23 refer to the date when the GPFC clauses start to operate on Royal Assent.

I shall now turn to the individual amendments. Clause 1(3) enables the Secretary of State, with the consent of the Treasury, to acquire, hold and dispose of stocks, shares and other securities of the successor company. It does not refer to the rights to subscribe to securities. In other words, it does not cover rights issues. Lords amendment No. 1 seeks to ensure that it does so. It is precedented in section 52(1)(b) of the Gas Act 1986.

Clause 1(12) provides that any sums received under paragraphs (a) and (b) of it shall be paid into the consolidated fund. However, it may be necessary for the Secretary of State to discharge the liabilities either of the corporation or of the successor company and pay the balance into the consolidated fund.

Lords amendment No. 2 and Lords amendment No. 3, which is consequential upon 2, admit payments elsewhere. Lords amendment No. 4 is a technical amendment referring to a new schedule to the Bill which is Lords amendment No. 44. The purpose of the additional schedule to the Bill is twofold and I have no doubt that Opposition Members will welcome it. First, it ensures that any agreement made by the GPFC will have effect after vesting day as if made by the successor company. In particular, we wish to ensure that where the GPFC is a lessee subletting to doctors any covenant restricting assignment shall not prevent the substitution of the successor company as lessee in place of the GPFC.

Secondly, we wish to ensure that the transfer on vesting day will not operate so as to terminate the contract of any person employed in the GPFC and that the terms of the contract will not be varied in any way apart from substituting the successor company as the employer.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): Good.

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) says, "Good". It is nice to have some non-partisan support for what we are doing.

Both those objectives are secured by the amendment. I ask the House to support these technical amendments.

Mr. Ronnie Fearn (Southport): In subsection (2), consequential on (1), which was mentioned, will the Minister explain what the consolidated fund is at the moment?

Mrs. Currie: Will the hon. Gentleman extend his question so that I can give it the due care and consideration which it obviously requires? Will he explain to me at a little more length exactly what he is talking about?

Mr. Fearn: So that the Minister can get the answer in time, I shall explain. Subsection (2) enables the balance of a discharge of liability to be paid into the consolidated fund. Originally, all moneys were to go into that fund. I am not sure whether that is good or bad.

Mrs. Currie: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising this most important point. As the Bill stands, clause 1(12) provides that any sums received by the Secretary of State under paragraphs (a) and (b) in connection with the reconstitution of the GPFC must be paid into the consolidated fund, which is, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows, the account into which all public money due to the Exchequer is usually paid. That is because it was envisaged that the GPFC's indebtedness to NILO would be repaid by the purchaser and not by the Secretary of State. The National Loans Act 1968 provides that all money raised by the creation of debt is payable into the national loans fund together with receipts representing repayments of loans made from the fund or, before that Act came into effect, charged directly on the consolidated fund, and interest on those loans. The national loans fund is the channel through which all the Government's borrowing transactions, and most domestic lending transactions, pass. It is still likely that the purchaser will repay the NILO debt directly, but there could be a premium payable for premature redemption which reflects the difference between the prevailing gilt redemption yields. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is following carefully. That will be only on fixed rate stocks—variable rate stocks will, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows, be repaid at par value.

The Secretary of State might have to pay the premium from the proceeds of sale, and it would go to NILO. It is against such an eventuality that we are taking powers to enable him to pay moneys into other than the consolidated fund. It is necessary that he should be able to discharge liabilities either of the corporation or of the successor company and pay the balance into the fund. I hope that that has answered the hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. Fearn rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Gentleman can speak only once in a debate on a Lords amendment.

Question put and agreed to. [Special entry.]

Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 4 agreed to. [Special entry.]

Clause 7

Extension of powers of Secretary of State for financing the Health Service

Lords amendment: No. 5, in page 5, line 18, leave out "powers" and insert

"the powers specified in subsection (1A) below; but for the avoidance of doubt it is hereby declared that nothing in this section authorises him or any body to which he gives directions under subsection (1B) below to disregard any enactment or rule of law or to override any person's contractual or proprietary rights.(1A) The powers mentioned in subsection (1) above are powers—"

Mrs. Currie: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider Lords amendments Nos. 6 to 8 and 10 to 17.

Mrs. Currie: Lords amendment No. 5 refers to clause 7, which is about income generation. It might be helpful if I were to give a summary of what we are trying to achieve in clause 7. I am sure that it will help the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) as the amendment covers different parts of the clause and it is important that the hon. Gentleman understands exactly what this group of Lords amendments would do.

In general terms, the clause gives health authorities wider powers to generate income for improving the Health Service. That is what the preamble to the clause says. From debates about the clause since the Bill was introduced to the House almost one year ago, I sometimes wonder what some people have read into those words. The clause allows health authorities to charge at commercial rates in the case of private patients and overseas visitors. I remember that, when the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden, who is now on the Opposition Front Bench, was a mere stripling of a Back Bencher, he called on us on Second Reading to do precisely what I have described. I cannot see that there is much for the Opposition to quarrel with, but they managed to spend a good few hours in Committee airing their arguments before eventually admitting how sensible the changes are.

The clause contains a strong safeguard to ensure that none of this new activity should be to the detriment of the NHS and its patients. Indeed, the purpose of the clause is to enhance the NHS, not to detract from it.

Existing legislation did not foresee health authorities wanting to use facilities other than for purposes directly concerned with the treatment of patients. I suspect that, by accident rather than by design, existing legislation can be read to permit authorities to pursue some income generation ideas, whereas others such as advertising, catering for outside bodies or running health clubs are clearly ultra vires. There is another group of activity about which the law is unclear. We have responded to the call from our own Health Service managers that we should clear up the matter. We agree that there is a clear need for legal provision which puts it beyond doubt that authorities can make full use of their facilities for income generation.

5.15 pm

The clause deals with three strands—income generation per se, private patient income and income from charges on overseas visitors. There is, however, a common theme—the provision of additional income for the Health Service. This is a good housekeeping measure intended to encourage health authorities to realise to the full the financial potential of resources at their disposal. It will provide health authorities with a valuable source of income while remaining no more than a marginal activity in the totality of Health Service funding. We have never claimed that income generation is any more than that. It never can account for more than a tiny fraction of total Health Service funding, and we have never suggested otherwise.

Clause 7(1) contains the meat of the income generation powers—the basic powers to acquire, produce and provide, for a charge, goods, land, accommodation and services, including training. It allows commercial exploitation of suitable Health Service innovations and developments. The powers were deliberately drawn wide, which I suspect is the reason for some of the fears that have been expressed at various stages of parliamentary consideration of the Bill, so that we would not be faced with the need to enact further legislation to permit activities which were inadvertently omitted from the Bill. The powers are permissive and are qualified by safeguards. They are not mandatory obligations. We shall not require all health authorities to set about manufacturing and selling all manner of things indiscriminately. The final part of subsection (1) provides for the issue, by the Secretary of State, of directions to health authorities about the use of these new powers.

Clause 7(2) and (3) provide that the powers may be restricted by directions issued by the Secretary of State. We have already issued guidance on income generation to health authorities. More will follow if it is the House's will that the Bill should become law. We have no reason to suppose that health authorities will act irresponsibly in their use of these new powers.

Subsection (4) provides that the wide powers introduced in subsection (1) do not apply to provision for private patients. Such provision is dealt with in the original legislation and in clause 7(7) and (8), which ensure that the rather tighter conditions surrounding the provision of services for private patients shall apply, particularly with regard to the authorisation of pay beds, in respect of which we have retained central control.

Perhaps I may be permitted to go a little more deeply into the safeguards against the misuse of these powers as it was a matter of some concern in the other place and it has given rise to some of the amendments before us.

Subsection (5) stipulates that none of the powers provided by clause 7 shall interfere with the duty to provide services under the NHS, nor be used to the disadvantage of NHS patients. I am sure that the House agrees that that is important. Income generation is to be a marginal activity, and I hope that hon. Members will not propose the notion that we seek these powers to make the NHS a monolithic trading organisation. We are not doing that.

The Secretary of State's duty to provide a comprehensive Health Service is not affected in any way by clause 7, and subsection (5) makes that clear. Subsection (5) also limits the charging powers in subsection (l)(h) to non-NHS matters. That is important and worth dwelling on as Opposition Members argued, especially in Committee, that the clause would open the door to new charges for NHS treatment or services. That is simply not true.

Subsection (7) concerns private patients. We decided that health authorities should be permitted to set their pay bed charges to make a profit. The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden felt that that was wise and sensible, so I believe that he will support us tonight. The number of authorised pay beds and their location will remain a matter for central approval. We believe that market forces should apply to the pricing of private treatment in NHS hospitals, and subsection (7) permits that by consolidating and simplifying previous legislation on private patients and enabling charges to be set on a commercial basis. The NHS should benefit considerably from that. As hon. Members will be aware, we did rather oversimplify some of the private patient provisions, as the British Medical Association and others on its behalf told us. The amendments which we brought forward in another place are intended to remedy that excess of zeal.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: I have been following with great interest the excellent case which my hon. Friend has put up. In the private sector, it is possible to make arrangements whereby employees or managers who produce new ideas for generating revenue for the firm can have a percentage of the profits in the first year. It is right that the provisions which my hon. Friend recommends should enable the profits made to be kept by the Health Service rather than go into the consolidated fund. Does this permit a local health authority, or the Minister, to make an arrangement whereby new ideas for income generation can benefit the NHS employee who suggests them?

[Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop]

Mrs. Currie: The key NHS employee in most district health authorities is the district general manager. Managers are now all on short-term contracts with performance-related pay.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: The system could work all the way through.

Mrs. Currie: We would be interested in extending that proposition to other members of staff, but for the time being this applies only to senior managers. We would expect that an NHS manager who was able to generate in wise and sensible ways considerable income for his health authority would have that ability and success recognised when he was next reviewed. We would expect that, if an NHS manager were totally incapable of undertaking that kind of activity, that would be taken into account. I take my hon. Friend's point—many businesses have reward schemes. We would not want to pronounce on that matter from the Dispatch Box. We would want to leave it to the common sense of the local people. My feeling, for what it is worth, is that knowing that the money generated is being put into even better health care in that district is normally, for the people who work for us, reward enough.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): My hon. Friend said that we can leave it to the local district. Do we take it that it would not be illegal if the authority chose to do that?

Mrs. Currie: As long as the money which is generated continues to be used in the NHS——

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: To reward an employee?

Mrs. Currie: I am a little reluctant again to set out what I have said. The main opportunity to reward an employee lies in the grading of the district general manager and one or two other key staff.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: It could work right through.

Mrs. Currie: I take the point entirely. I would not be antagonistic to a suggestion that saw some kind of a reward, as long as the main benefit from such activity and improvement went straight into the Health Service, and therefore was seen to improve the health care of the neighbourhood.

As my hon. Friends know, most of the pay of the people concerned is either negotiated through the Whitley bodies or is offered to us through the review bodies. We do not at this time have the opportunity to vary the pay of individuals in quite the way that my hon. Friends suggest. I commend what they say to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health. We shall take on board those excellent suggestions.

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Sheffield, Hallam): Do the additional powers for financing the Health Service include the powers of leasing, placing money on the overnight money market and borrowing? If this is not readily clear, could consideration be given to this approach to generate income?

Mrs. Currie: The money voted to us for the NHS is to run NHS activity. About 70 per cent. of that money goes in pay. We would therefore expect that the money which we have voted for next year will be allocated in much the same way. How money is held before it is spent is a matter not just for the NHS but for all Government Departments. My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) may like to refer that question in more detail to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. The way in which my right hon. Friend handles our money has been entirely beneficial, and we have all heard the results in the Autumn Statement.

Mainly our money is spent. We can spend every penny which is allocated. The purpose of clause 7 is to ensure that those opportunities which occur to a considerable extent in most health authorities can be used to generate income, bring in more money and make a profit where no profit is legal. Money is then available to that health authority to extend and develop its services as it thinks fit and to provide all the services that we would like in health care.

Mr. Fearn: Would the voluntary bodies which are already raising quite a lot of cash for the district health authorities be taken into consideration as well? Would that money be utilised in the melting pot?

Mrs. Currie: We are about to discuss in detail one of the amendments which refers to voluntary bodies and, if I may, I shall take on that point then.

Subsections (9), (10) and (11) provide that charges for NHS treatment of patients from overseas may be set by health authorities on a commercial basis in the same way as charges for private patients. These subsections were added during our earlier consideration of the Bill, largely, again I must confess, because of pressure from the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden. Perhaps we should have had him as one of the Bill's sponsors. This is an excellent Bill, as the hon. Gentleman has said a number of times. He even told us that he thought that the White Paper was very good, but whether that will help his career on the Opposition Front Bench is another matter. We welcome the hon. Gentleman's intelligent and sensible comments.

Mr. Sam Galbraith (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): Get on with it.

Mrs. Currie: Such charges apply only to a small minority of foreign visitors. Most foreign visitors are covered by European Community arrangements—the E111—or are citizens of countries with which we have reciprocal agreements, such as the Eastern bloc countries. Nevertheless, we felt it right and proper that health authorities should be free to set their charges in the same way as they set their private patient pay bed charges.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Surely a large proportion of our overseas visitors are from the United States, with which we do not have such an arrangement.

Mrs. Currie: I think that that is right. Generally, we try to come to agreements with countries, where possible. It is worth bearing in mind that a large number of our people go abroad. In fact, we have one of the highest proportions of people who go abroad on holiday and then get care and treatment overseas. We try to make arrangements between Governments so that there are offsetting arrangements wherever possible. I am not aware that we have a huge influx of visitors from the United States coming here for treatment. Generally, they get very good treatment in their own country, and I am sure that they are pleased about that.

I turn to the detailed changes made in another place which we must now consider. The key point is that all the Lords amendments to clause 7 now under consideration were welcomed or accepted by Lord Ennals, the Opposition health spokesman in the other place, and we hope that the same will be true tonight. The 12 amendments before us include three different issues. The first, which is dealt with in amendments Nos. 5, 6 and 10, relates to the general rights of the Secretary of State under clause 7, which is why I gave the House rather a long preamble to them. The second, amendment No. 7, is concerned with the role of the voluntary bodies. The third group, amendments Nos. 8 and 11 to 17, deals with private patients.

Amendments Nos. 5, 6 and 10 were introduced by the Government in another place to meet the concerns expressed there and earlier in the House that the powers which the Government sought in clause 7(1) were too wide. Particular concern was expressed that clause 7(1)(f), and to a degree paragraphs (g) and (h), would affect adversely the rights of academic researchers and others directly employed by the Health Service in respect of exploitation of their ideas and inventions. The opportunity was taken to have a debate, which was extremely valuable, about the revision in February 1987 of the standard Department of Health research contract. At that stage, the fundamental issue was the removal of the automatic right for researchers to publish. The hon. Members for Strathkelvin and Bearsden and for Peckham will recall that we had a long and useful debate about this in Committee. In the other place, however, there is a strong interest in academia and in the rights of inventors and I took the opportunity to listen to the debate there. The concept embodied in the amendments was offered to those leading the debate and became part of a package including amendment No. 9, which will be moved later by my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State.

5.30 pm

In the light of the concerns expressed, we decided to introduce these amendments in another place. They make it absolutely clear on the face of the Bill that in using these powers the Secretary of State and health authorities acting under delegated authority cannot do anything which would take away anyone else's legal rights or property, and so on. We did not incorporate the provisions in the Bill at the outset because we did not consider it necessary, but we have bowed to the advice of their Lordships who regard it as necessary and we are prepared to accept the amendments.

Amendment No. 7 deals with voluntary bodies and inserts in page 5, line 32, the words

"(having regard to the existing work of voluntary bodies)".

When I have said a few words about this, I will give the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn) the opportunity to make his point again so that it comes in the right place.

The purpose of clause 7 is to make more money available for improving the Health Service. Clearly, there might sometimes be a potential clash of interests with the voluntary bodies which work so selfless[ly] in support of the Health Service. Organisations such as the League of Friends and the Women's Royal Voluntary Service, help by running shops, cafeterias and so on in our hospitals. Their help is invaluable and allows the provision of a really useful service which otherwise might be difficult to provide, especially in isolated areas. Some Health Service managers, however, have ambitions beyond the services that such bodies can provide and believe that, with the right encouragement, private companies with expertise in areas such as mass catering or retailing might be willing to rent space in hospitals to run major shops or commercially viable cafeterias. A lot of money could be made by the health authority in terms of rent and additional facilities would be available for patients, visitors and staff.

One major London hospital has calculated that in a typical year the total number of people passing through its front door is about 1¼ million. That includes patients, staff and a very large number of visitors. If we can tap some of their activities and offer them opportunities to spend money with us, there is scope for considerable income generation, but we must ensure that in their zeal to set up such arrangements—arrangements which, broadly speaking, we would encourage—Health Service managers do not ride roughshod over the League of Friends, the WRVS and other organisations which might already be working in the area.

Account should be taken, for example, of any existing tea bar and there should be discussion with volunteers about the implementation of new policies. Those running the tea bar might agree that their efforts could be directed to a different form of help—for example, sitting with patients who do not have many visitors or who may feel lonely and depressed and distressed. In the future, as in the past and the present, for many volunteers this may represent a better use of their efforts in terms of making the patients' time in hospital more pleasant or at least less unpleasant rather than restricting voluntary effort to raising money when in many cases more could be raised through commercial activity.

We do not wish to alienate the marvellous people who work with us through the League of Friends and other voluntary organisations. We are ever grateful to the large band of dedicated voluntary helpers who support the Health Service in such a variety of ways. That consideration was foremost in our minds in bringing forward this important amendment, which insists that we have regard to the existing work of voluntary organisations. We hold that work in the highest regard and we commend it to the House. We therefore also ask the House to agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

With regard to amendments Nos 8 and 11 to 17, the Opposition tabled an amendment in Committee at the behest of the British Medical Association which sought to reinstate both the definition of a private patient and the right in statute for consultants to admit their own private patients. To this day I remain certain, and I always shall, that the hon Members for Strathkelvin and Bearsden and for Peckham did not realise the basic purpose and meaning of the amendments suggested by the BMA, but that is certainly what they meant.

Mr. Galbraith indicated dissent.

Mrs. Currie: If the hon. Gentleman does not believe me, he may care to ask his advisers at the BMA, but that is exactly what those amendments meant.

At the same time, on a completely different point, our lawyers advised us that the revision contained in subsection (7) could well render certain collaborative schemes that we would wish to welcome ultra vires or at least fail to provide a definition of a National Health Service private patient. We were therefore sympathetic to the Opposition amendment, which would have resolved our difficulties as well as theirs had it not been defective, and I undertook to bring forward a suitable Government amendment on Report. Our amendment was virtually identical but at the eleventh hour it, too, turned out to be defective and thus was not moved. I am therefore forced today, as it were, to do a Whitelaw—to apologise yet again to the House for not having got this right in the first place and for having had to withdraw our proposal on the last occasion. With the assistance of their Lordships, however, we think that we have now got it right.

The eight Government amendments tabled in Committee in the Lords reinstate the requirement for the giving of undertakings by private patients and thus provide a convenient definition of a National Health Service private patient. They also reinstate the discretion to make accommodation and services available to consultants for the treatment of their private patients in England, Wales and Scotland. They were accepted in the other House unopposed and it is my privilege today to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendments.

Ms. Harman rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I will call the hon. Lady in due course, but not until I have reminded the House that we have a lot of work to get through. I hope that hon. Members and Ministers will put their arguments succinctly.

Ms. Harman: I shall keep my remarks as brief and as crisp as possible. Unlike the Minister, who is clearly attempting a filibuster so that important items such as charges for eye tests and dental checks will not be discussed until the small hours of the morning, I shall keep my remarks to a minimum.

On amendment No. 5, the Minister was right to mention that DHSS contracts for research were debated at length in Committee in this House and in another place. The concern was that the Government might refuse consent for publication of research merely because the findings did not fit their dogma. In a written answer on 8 March this year, the Minister went some way towards clarifying the situation. I should be grateful if she would go a little further today. Will she confirm that the only reasonable ground for refusal to allow publication would be if the research breaches confidentiality, commits libel or contains factual error? Will the researcher be told which of those is alleged so that he will know why publication is not allowed? Will the researcher or the organisation sponsoring the research have a right of appeal?

We very much welcome amendment No. 7, which deals with voluntary organisations. Such bodies as the League of Friends provide not only services to patients but an important opportunity for the local community, on a voluntary basis, to be involved in the work of their hospitals. Links between a hospital and its community should not be trampled upon in the rush to commercialise the Health Service. We shall monitor whether the income generation unit abides by the caveat in the amendment. We hope that the Minister will report on how it is being observed and on how the interests of the voluntary organisations in hospitals and in the Health Service at local level are being respected.

I wish to clarify the position on private patients. The Bill originally left out the actual definition of a private patient, so without amendment there would be no definition. My hon. Friends and I felt that to be unsatisfactory and tabled an amendment in Committee to restore the original definition. Being of suspicious mind, we did not believe that the definition had disappeared by accident. We felt that it was more likely intended to clear the way for a further blurring of the distinction between health provision in the public and private sectors. We are satisfied that the definition will now be reinstated.

I hope that the Minister will deal with my points on amendments Nos. 5 and 7.

Mr. Fearn: As I said earlier, the voluntary organisations raise a great deal of cash, which is then used to provide a specific item for a hospital. I would not want that to be interfered with. I hope that, in future, that money will not simply go into the melting pot.

The WRVS is concerned that under the income generation scheme catering firms will take over and the making of profit will mean more than the kindness being offered by the voluntary services. I hope that that will be carefully monitored.

Mrs. Currie: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall reply. The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) mentioned three grounds on which there might be some dispute between the Secretary of State and the researcher, for whose material we had paid, about whether material should be published in a certain form. Indeed, she mentioned three very good grounds on which there might be some difficulty——

Ms. Harman: The Minister gave me that information.

Mrs. Currie: That is right. There might be other grounds—for example, if there was an error of fact we would want an opportunity to discuss that with the researcher. There might be a question of someone being defamed in some way and that, too, would be appropriate for discussion. Although we think that there are unlikely to be any grounds other than those that we have set out, we want to ensure that the Secretary of State has the right to deal with them should they arise. It also brings his powers more into line with the sort of contracts available in other Government Departments.

We would always discus such matters, through our officials, with the researchers concerned. It would never be our wish simply to take an arbitrary approach. We would want to know how the money we had allocated had been spent, because we have to account for that money. We do not have plans for a formal system of appeal, but I assure the hon. Lady that we would have full discussions with the researchers. Indeed, having commissioned the work we would be interested to know how the researcher was progressing.

We are attempting to tidy up the legislation on private patients and get it correct. We want to ensure that it will hold and bite in the way that we want. We agreed at the outset that some of the definitions being offered were not adequate and would not stand up to scrutiny. We are, therefore, grateful to the other place for its work on that matter. We believe the new wording to be better than the original.

I welcome what the hon. Lady said about the leagues of friends. It is nice to hear that the Labour party is now all in favour of the volunteers who work so hard in the NHS. I hope that it will continue that stance. I am, however, bound to observe that on past occasions volunteers have been criticised by some of the hon. Lady's colleagues, who believe that volunteers and amateurs should not be involved in activities that they think would be better done by paid members of NUPE. I welcome the Labour party's conversion. All such conversions should be welcomed.

5.45 pm

The hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn) made an important point. He may recall that before I came to the House I was chairman of the health authority in Birmingham. I am on record as expressing exasperation because, at that time, voluntary organisations often raised money and bought pieces of equipment without consulting the health authorities, which put the authorities in some difficulty. Recently we have encouraged the health authorities and the fund raisers to sit down and discuss appropriate activities and campaigns. The result is that the fund raisers are providing far more useful pieces of equipment. Although that brings the criticism that fund raisers should not have to buy useful pieces of equipment, I prefer them to do that than to buy something that is quietly left in a box and not used. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would regard that as progress. We hope that the cash raised is used for appropriate purchases. To that end, we expect the health authorities to discuss with the voluntary bodies their exact plans for the use of any money raised.

I hope that with those explanations I have outlined the important changes that the amendments make to the clause, which we hope will generate a great deal of money for the NHS.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 6 to 8 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 9, in page 5, line 46, at end insert—

"(4A) The Secretary of State shall exercise the powers specified in subsection (1)(f) above only after consulting (to the extent that it appears to him to be practical) any person who appears to him to have an interest through his own previous research in the ideas or intellectual property in question as to whether he should exercise them and, if so, as to any financial arrangements."

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. David Mellor) rose——

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mellor: I am grateful for my hon. Friends' touching sign of support, which I hope will subsist throughout the evening.

I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment was incorporated into the Bill with the acquiescence of the Government to address the concerns expressed in another place that there were occasions when patent law did not give adequate protection to inventors over, for instance, whether the invention—and I use that expression illustratively—should be exploited at all, or whether, for example, its worth was now much more than could reasonably have been expected when an original contract was signed.

Although we felt unable to go the whole way towards meeting the wishes of those who wanted a requirement to obtain the specific agreement of the inventor, we accepted that it would be fair to all parties if the Secretary of State had to take into consideration the views of the inventor over exploitation. That would give the inventor the opportunity to state his case if he had views about the appropriateness of exploitation, and would also give him the opportunity to seek further financial reward if that was an issue.

As I said, this was not a Government amendment in another place, but it was moved with our full support. I hope that it goes a long way to allaying any fears in the research community.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 10 to 17 agreed to.

Clause 10

DENTAL SERVICES

Lords amendment: No. 18, in page 9, line 8, leave out from "following" to end of line 15 and insert "subsections shall be inserted after that subsection—

"(1A) It is also the Secretary of State's duty to provide, to such extent as he considers necessary to meet all reasonable requirements—

(a) for the dental inspection of pupils in attendance at schools maintained by local education authorities or at grant-maintained schools;

(b) for the dental treatment of such pupils; and

(c) for the education of such pupils in dental health.

(1B) Schedule [Provisions supplementary to s.1] to this Act shall have effect.""

Mrs. Currie: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we shall discuss Lords amendments Nos. 19, 46, 47, 49 and 50. I draw the attention of the House to the fact that some of the amendments involve privilege.

Mrs. Currie: The amendment will replace the absolute duty that originally stood in the legislation on community dental services with a duty to provide dental services at a level to meet all reasonable requirements. I think that the profession will regard our concession as something of a victory, but I do not mind that in the least. In practical terms, the proposals will not change the requirement to develop the community dental service.

Labour Members will recall that we had extensive discussions in Committee on how the community dental service should advance. We believed that the community dental service should offer an improved service to those people who have difficulty in obtaining the services of a general dental practitioner. That would remove the requirement for the community dental service to duplicate the services that are already adequately provided by general dental practitioners. The Lords amendments will satisfy the concerns that have been expressed.

Ms. Harman: I want to make two points about Lords amendment No. 18, which concerns the community dental service. First, how much do the Government plan to spend under the new arrangements on the community dental service? Will existing resources be targeted to where they are most needed, or will fewer resources be targeted to those who most need them? Secondly, how do the Government plan to ensure that district health authorities comply with the statutory obligation for the dental inspection of schoolchildren and the maintenance of the community dental service? The financial pressure that the Government are putting on district health authorities is so great that many district health authorities see the community dental service as a soft target. How will the Government keep district health authorities up to the mark in respect of the community dental service?

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): My hon. Friend will recall that when we discussed the matter in Committee I was keen to press the point that going to the dentist is a family activity. Primary responsibility for dental care falls on parents. There was a difference of opinion between the Government and the Opposition in Committee over the prospect that, following the line of argument that I had put forward, if the requirement that the Secretary of State should provide a comprehensive dental service for children of school age were removed, there might be areas in which the service would not be provided. That was the nub of the political disagreement in Committee.

I am grateful for the fact that we have come to an acceptable compromise. The Secretary of State will have the power to ensure that "all reasonable requirements" are met and, at the same time, it has been made clear that the responsibility to ensure that children receive dental treatment from either general dental practitioners or the service provided by the health authority falls basically on parents.

Mrs. Currie: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall reply.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) for his sensible summing up of where we stand on the issue. However, the Secretary of State will have more than a power in this respect. He will have a duty to provide the service as far as is reasonable. The word "reasonable" will be written into the Bill. It is a sensible compromise between those who insist that we should continue to run the community dental service in the old way—when the main problem was the poor dental health of children in particular—and those who see that the general dental practitioner service is first class and who believe that it is entirely right and appropriate that people should go to the dentist as a family, including such important people as the spouses of hon. Members and other people who regard dentistry as important.

The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) spoke about the mechanism for ensuring that the legislation is followed and that the law is obeyed. The mechanism is the review system in which Ministers review the regional health authorities and the chairmen of the regional health authorities and their colleagues review the district health authorities. As I mentioned at Question Time this afternoon, Basingstoke and North Hampshire district health authority is being reviewed today. We expect the quality of work that the community dental service does and the degree to which it responds to patterns of dental health to be taken into account in such a review and for the health authorities to be held accountable.

The hon. Member for Peckham also asked whether more or less money was to be given to the service. That is a matter for the district health authorities to decide. If the hon. Lady re-reads the White Paper, which sets out some of the provisions that we are discussing tonight, she will find that we have proposed other functions for the community dental service which need to be developed, such as the monitoring of levels of dental health and the care of special groups. It is not just a question of how much money we spend; it is a question of what we get for that money. Dental health in this country is improving extemely fast, and we have been able to identify and look after some groups that have had little dental care in the past. We are determined that the community dental service should fulfil that obligation and look after dental health in a much more general way.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 18 and 19 agreed to—[Special entry].

Clause 11

CHARGES FOR DENTAL APPLIANCES AND TREATMENT

Lords amendment: No. 20, in page 12, line 1, leave out subsection (7).

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I beg to move, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The House will know that the amendment deals with the vexed question of charges for dental examinations. I shall seek to persuade the House this evening that their Lordships made an error when they sought to remove the power from the Bill, and that the Health Service can make extremely good use of the revenue that can be raised by the introduction of charges.

It is relevant first to consider the matter against the background of the Autumn Statement and the increased spending announced today. I know from discussions with some of my hon. Friends that that announcement may be used against me by some. The argument runs that, with so much money going into the National Health Service, we do not need to seek increased revenue from those of the population whom we judge can well afford to pay a modest sum for their dental examinations. It is certainly true that this debate is taking place against the background of a fairly dramatic increase in the spending available to the National Health Service next year.

Given the difficulty of absorbing the Autumn Statement, it is possible that not all hon. Members have yet assimulated the news that we have heard. The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) described the announcement as a standstill budget. I do not understand that. It would appear from some of the hon. Gentleman's comments that he may be labouring under the misapprehension that the increased spending that we provided to fund in full the nurses' regrading exercise and pay increase is part of the £1·8 billion for England. I see that he is shaking his head, so he has appreciated that fact. What we are talking about by way of provision by the taxpayer is an increase in spending next year over and above the outturn this year, which includes all the money that we have provided for the nurses' regrading exercise and that will continue. Over and above what we have provided this year for the Health Service, and over and above the provision that we have made for the funding of the nurses' pay award, an additional £1·6 billion—£1,600 million—will be provided for the Health Service next year in England alone. On top of that, we expect continued efforts by way of cost improvement programmes and revenue generation—made easier by the Bill—to make available to the English National Health Service £1·8 billion.

The hon. Member for Livingston would not forgive me if I excluded Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland from my remarks about the Health Service. If those figures are included, the increased spending available to the Health Service next year amounts to well over £2 billion—4½ per cent. over and above the raised forecast for inflation announced by the Chancellor today. That figure includes increases in expenditure on primary health care, with which we are principally concerned this evening. At the moment, we are spending more than £5,000 million on primary health care. During this Government's period of office, the figure has risen substantially—by 43 per cent. over and above the level of inflation since 1979. Our public spending proposals include plans to increase spending on primary care services by a further £600 million over the next few years.

The National Health Service is faced with a splendid opportunity to expand its patient services—while maintaining the high quality of medical and nursing services that we know we can expect from it—to meet the increasing demands that today's population puts upon it. The relevance of that is that there may be a temptation among hon. Members on both sides of the House to say that because this money has been made available, thanks to the Government's choice of priorities in this year's public spending round, we can take it easy and relax a little.

Why do we need to look for the provision of further revenue for the Service by introducing charges for dental examinations? I hope that that reaction to the large increase in provision for the Health Service will not affect the House, and will not affect people in the National Health Service either. We will waste the opportunity that the present economic success of the country has given to us if we allow increased spending by the Health Service to be combined with easing off all that we have done to try to give priority to patient care and developing the Service from the resources that we have.

The same mood could affect National Health Service managers. There will be a temptation in some authorities to defer a difficult closure decision, even if the hospital is redundant to Health Service needs and the money could be used elsewhere. There may be the temptation, which I fear will be encouraged by some members of the trade union and Labour movement, to ease off in our efforts to raise efficiency and to make better use of our manpower. That would be a mistake and would dissipate our opportunity. I believe that it would be a mistake for the House to reverse the decision that we took before the summer recess to give these powers to raise further revenue for the Health Service by charging for dental examinations. There is a choice in all things, and there is a clear choice when hon. Members decide which way to vote on this amendment.

We are talking about dental charges that will raise nearly £50 million in a full year. The best estimate that we can make for what those charges could raise is £49 million. The choice that faces us is whether we raise that £49 million and put it into improving the service to patients provided by the National Health Service or whether we allow it to stay in the pockets of that section of the population who would not qualify for exemption, those who are, by definitions better off. The sum of £49 million is not insignificant. The choice that their Lordships made in another place was to let the people who would otherwise pay keep the money and not to put that money into the National Health Service.

When one looks at what £49 million would buy, it is equivalent to at least one new district hospital each year. If one takes the average cost, it would pay for 21,000 hip replacement operations each year. It would pay for more than 65,000 cataract operations at the average cost, if that £49 million was put to what I regard as better use. To find out what can be achieved on the margin of the Health Service, one only has to look at the Government's recent waiting list initiative. By spending £30 million on the margin, we have been able to provide treatment for 110,000 more in-patients in hospitals. The £30 million for the waiting list initiative is dwarfed by the money that we expect to raise from dental examination charges.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): Will my right hon. and learned Friend say whether the £49 million represents the number of people who are having dental examinations at this time, or is it an estimate of the number who may have them if the charges are imposed?

Mr. Clarke: I shall be coming to that crucial point in my speech. I do not believe that the dental charges will have any significant or noticeable effect on the number of people who have dental examinations. That is probably the issue that divides some of us most strongly this evening, but I believe that all experience is against that.

The £49 million is the sum at issue on this amendment for dental charges. It is no good saying that £49 million does not matter and that it is peanuts, and it is something that surely can be found from the Government's finances in their present state. It is not peanuts to the people who could have those extra operations or treatment in some other part of the Service if we allow this revenue to be raised and used properly. It is no good saying that, if the House reverses the decision that it took a few months ago and decides that, after all, it does not want to raise this revenue, we will somehow reopen the Autumn Statement and find the money to replace it. That is simply not on. I understand that an hon. Member put that to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer earlier. One cannot run a whelk stall that way, let alone a Government.

On this year's spending, the settlement that we have made in United Kingdom terms is more than £2 billion extra spending over and above this year's spending, over and above the nurses' pay settlement and over and above the £50 million that we are planning to spend, and which I certainly do not wish to forgo. I hope that that explains to my hon. Friends—it may come as a surprise to some of them, but it should not—why the discussions on this year's public spending round were not easy. I have the greatest respect for my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, who is also a personal friend. We discussed this matter for a long time. One meeting that we had lasted for five and a half hours. At the end of it, we had not settled very much, so we had to start again. Throughout those discussions I never reopened this question, because the Chief Secretary himself wanted to give higher priority to the Health Service and its patient care. They were friendly discussions, and neither of us wanted to go backwards and take out of the Service £50 million for dental charges, of which we believe the Health Service can make adequate use.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop rose——

Mr. Peter Griffiths: In the list of improvements that my right hon. and learned Friend has suggested could be made in the National Health Service from this £50 million, he has made no mention of any improvements in dentistry. Our right hon. Friend, the then Minister of Health, said in Committee—at column 262—that at least part of it would go into improved primary dental care.

Mr. Clarke: I know. I am trying not to repeat the arguments that my right hon. and hon. Friends have used extensively on Second Reading, in Committee and on Report, though I am bound to repeat some of them. Some money will be put into dental services, and that is something for which the Bill is paving the way. Measures are included to promote dental health and the prevention of dental disease, and to improve the quality and distribution of dental services. Those extend from more fluoridation to more training for the dental profession.

I must say to my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) that it is no good anyone thinking that they can vote against the new dental charges and not put any of those at risk. I am sure that we shall not be able to charge ahead improving dental services as the profession expects, quite rightly, that we shall do if the House decides to deny us £50 million that we believe we can legitimately raise from dental charges. We shall have to find the £50 million out of our previous intentions. The dental service need not think that it will be exempt, if the dentists have persuaded the House not to introduce these charges. However, I trust that we shall not come to that.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Is my right hon. and learned Friend telling the House, as a new Secretary of State in the Department, that his right hon. and learned Friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury so failed in his duty to him that he did not warn him that, when he met the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, he should do so on the supposition that there was a great probability that the original decision of the House would be reversed and that, the Lords having passed this amendment, it would very possibly be sustained by this House? Is he telling us that he had no advice whatever from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury on this matter? He has told us that he went into his meeting with the Chief Secretary to the Treasury not taking this into consideration. Did he or did he not have advice from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury on this point? If he did not, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury let him down severely.

Mr. Clarke: I have had a number of conversations on this subject with my right hon. and learned Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury since I took up my post. He, together with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security, took the measure through the House only a few months ago and received an adequate majority of, I believe, 81 for it. We know that since then people have reflected further, but the fact is that, although some of those hon. Members who now say that they are leading a rebellion against us voted in favour of these charges only a few months ago, they now claim to see great problems of principle. However, my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and myself have great faith in the logical approach—especially of our party—to these matters. We trust that when confronted with the use to which £49 million could be put—and, I hope, having considered whether there is any serious risk of people being deterred from treatment—we shall achieve that majority, or something like it, again.

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme) rose——

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way to my hon. Friend in a moment. The danger in these debates is that I shall be giving way all the time. I shall come to any deterrents later.

I would point out to my hon. Friends—this is also appropriate to the Labour party when it was in government—that in primary health care it has always been the policy of successive Governments that those who are comparatively better off when compared with the very poorest in society should contribute to the cost of optical, dental and pharmaceutical services. That point has not been raised as an issue of principle on all but the briefest of occasions since Nye Bevan found it objectionable in 1951, when the then Labour Government introduced charges. What has happened—not only during this Government's period of office—has been that those charges have been raised substantially. In our opinion, those charges are a proper contribution to the revenue that is required to support and improve primary health care services. I have already said that we have increased real terms expenditure on those services by 43 per cent. since we came into office.

At times I have taken part in the debates that have been held each year on health charges. I am afraid that at times I have regarded them as a bit of ritual and I believe that I have said so on occasions because when in opposition the Labour party makes ritual objections. On every occasion when we raise charges, people always say that that will have a deterrent effect on those people coming forward to seek treatment. I have no doubt that some hon. Members raised that point as long ago as 1976 when the Labour Government raised charges by 35·3 per cent. in one year and then raised them in the next year by 27 per cent. Our biggest increase was 32 per cent. in 1980 and in subsequent years we have always raised charges. The real terms level of those charges has always increased because the real terms cost of primary health care has always increased.

We have frequently had votes on those issues and some hon. Members have asserted that the old and the poor would be deterred from using the services if we carried on increasing the charges for non-exempt groups. However, it has never been the case that there has been any decline in the service. In fact, although Governments have increased the level of the charges every year, there has been a steady increase in the numbers of courses of treatment. Occasionally, there has been a small drop in the first part of the year, but by the end of the year—I have with me the figures for every year from 1975 to 1986-87—the numbers of courses of treatment have increased.

Mr. Churchill rose——

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston) rose——

Mr. Speaker: I call Mr. Robin Cook.

Mr. Cook: I am obliged to the Secretary of State for giving way to me. For the guidance of the House, will the Secretary of State clarify whether the chief medical officer agrees with him that he would not expect people to be deterred by a charge for dental examination or has the chief medical officer offered the Secretary of State the medical advice that that would greatly damage an important preventive service?

Mr. Clarke: I regard the advice of the chief medical officer—as I regard the advice of all my officials—as confidential—[Interruption.] I also regard this issue as tedious. The hon. Gentleman raised it repeatedly with my predecessor. He should be careful because, although his reputation is justifiably high, he blew his attack on the Government and child benefit last week by becoming obsessed with a silly letter that someone had got for him, thus throwing away any opportunity to satisfy even his hon. Friends. If the hon. Gentleman wants to take us back through his exchanges of correspondence with my predecessor about the advice of the chief medical officer, he can occupy the time of the House in that way if he wants, but I am certainly not going to move away from the long-standing convention that such advice is confidential.

The key point is that there have been steady increases in the numbers of courses of treatment every time that we have raised charges. Some of those charges are now quite high—the present maximum being £150 for a treatment. We did not start raising charges—our predecessors did that—but we have never apologised for raising charges to pay for treatment. The cumulative effect is that during our period of office, from 1979 to 1987, courses of dental treatment have risen from 31 million per year to nearly 37 million per year. That is an increse of 19 per cent. and means that there are almost one fifth more instances of people using primary health care than when we started hiking up the charges. There has been an annual increase of about 2·7 per cent.

Looking at the figures for the use of the dental service, what strikes me is that the group of the population which has raised its use of dental services more than any other is pensioners and retired people. Each year we have increased charges and each year the Labour party has gone through the ritual of opposing that, yet pensioners' use of dental services has risen faster than that of any other group. During the lifetime of this Government, pensioners' use of dental services has nearly doubled. There has been a 92 per cent. increase in the period from 1979 to 1987.

Dr. Lewis Moonie (Kirkcaldy) rose——

Mr. Churchill rose——

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) because I think that he was first.

Mr. Churchill: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for giving way. He seems to be under the firm impression that by introducing or raising such charges he stimulates the uptake—[Interruption.]—or at least there is no decline. Is he going to tell us that he is about to introduce charges for breast cancer screening and for cervical smear testing and that that would not have a deleterious effect on the uptake? If he does, quite frankly not many people will believe him.

Mr. Clarke: With great respect to my hon. Friend, who is a colleague of long standing, he does not do me a service by slightly parodying my argument. Of course, I was not saying that levying charges would in itself encourage a greater uptake—[Interruption.]—well, some people might be tempted to. It is not usually the experience that people have less regard for something that they pay for than for something that they get free. However, I have not used that argument. I am saying that against the history of some pretty steep increases in the costs that people expect to face when they cross the threshold of a dentist's surgery, the public are making ever more use of the dental service—pensioners most spectacularly.

Dr. Moonie rose——

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East) rose——

Mr. Clarke: No. Of course, we are not introducing charges for those other things. I am putting the current position firmly in the context of the long-standing charges for optical, pharmaceutical and dental services. We have absolutely no proposition to put forward charges for those other screening tests.

Dr. Moonie: The Secretary of State has correctly described the long-term trend in the use of the service. Will he confirm that on every occasion in the past 10 years on which charges have been raised the level of usage immediately thereafter has fallen?

Mr. Clarke: I think that I have said that. What usually happens is that its use falls off for a short time, but uptake then catches up. I will not labour that point any further because the figures are plainly on my side.

The increase in the use of the dental service coincides with a period during which the dental health of the nation has been improving. The number of people who have rushed to the dentist for toothache, for extractions and for fillings is certainly not increasing—if anything, it is decreasing. However, people are making ever more use of the dental service for the most expensive treatment such as bridges and crowns.

Mr. Dykes rose——

Mr. Clarke: I should like to continue my case for a little longer and then I shall give way again. The case that I am making—and I am not putting it in the manner that my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme suggested—is that all our experience shows that quite sharp increases in charges under both Labour and Conservative Governments have not deterred people from going to the dentist. Therefore, there is no reason to believe that the impact of charges on this test will be any different from the impact made by those other charges.

I shall go further, because if there is any deterrent effect —I recognise that the hon. Member for Kirkaldy (Dr. Moonie) clearly does not believe that there has been no impact—on those seeking treatment, the impact of the charge that we are proposing for this test is likely to be much less—indeed, non-existent. [Interruption.] We shall have two debates and I shall deal with each test in turn because the arguments are slightly different.

[Mr. Clarke]

The charge that we are proposing for the dental test is tiny compared with most dentistry costs and is not a significant figure for the group of people whom we are discussing who are, by definition, not the very poor and are not exempt. We intend to apply to the test the same principle that we apply to other dental services. The charge represents three quarters of the cost of treatment or, in this case, the examination, so, under the present agreement with the profession regarding the level of reimbursement for the service, the charge will be £3·15 for those people who are not exempt.

That leads me to the key point, which explains why the charges for treatment have not deterred people from going to the dentist. There are more than 20 million people to whom none of this applies because they are exempt from any form of charge. About 38 per cent. of the population is exempt. I have been a little generous to my critics when I have occasionally talked about the one in three who are exempt and the two in three—the better off—who have to pay. That is under-selling our case a little. In fact, four out of 10 are exempt, and the better-off six out of 10 will have to face this enormous sum of £3·15 about every six months if they want to go to the dentist. The exempt groups are children under 16, students under 19, other young people under the age of 18, pregnant women and nursing mothers and people on low incomes, which means primarily people receiving income support or family credit.

Mr. Dykes: I am loth to interrupt my right hon. and learned Friend's beguiling advocacy, but, on reflection, does he not consider that he was a little unfair to our hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) who voiced Conservative Members' anxieties? Does he further agree—assuming that he wins vital votes for the Government tonight—that Conservative Members are anxious that, when the charges are imposed, they may be rapidly increased? I have the greatest respect for him and believe that, if the National Health Service were to be safe in anyone's hands, it would be safe in his, but is he not the victim of a long-term Adam Smith design to impose charges on all sorts of screening services in hospitals, clinics and other institutions? Why does he not acknowledge that anxiety and assure us that, if the use of screening facilities falls drastically—assuming that the Government win the vote and impose the charges—he will reconsider the matter in, say, a year's time? Will he also solemnly reassure the House that he does not intend to impose additional charges on other screening services?

Mr. Clarke: No, I have no intention of introducing charges on any other things. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) may recollect from our previous exchanges about eye tests, I never say never in politics, so I will say now, as I said on those occasions, "for the time being". I am certainly not party to any desire to extend charges. [Interruption.] It would be a totally different argument if we did so.

I see what we are doing this evening as being consistent with a long-standing policy, which goes back 30 years, of imposing charges for optical, dental and pharmaceutical services. It would be a significant change of policy if we introduced charges for medical procedures such as those that have been cited. Certainly, the Government and I have no such present intention. The Autumn Statement contained no provision for any new charges, but that does not alter the case in respect of the dental examination charge for the 60 per cent. of people who are not exempt. That charge of £3·15 is incurred about once every six months by that section of the population who go to the dentist. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security made an announcement last Thursday about the uprating of benefit and, as a result of that, a further 90,000 people will be exempted from dental charges. It was a side effect of my right hon. Friend's welcome statement that that widened the category of people in receipt of benefit and who are, therefore, protected against this sum of £3·15.

It is not just the history of charges, but common sense that tells us that people will not be deterred by that sum. Common sense sometimes needs to be reinforced by research. Plenty of research cited in debate has been carried out among that section of the population which probably comprises quite a large number of hon. Members and who do not usually go to the dentist for a dental examination. When those people were asked why they do not go to the dentist, the cost of treatment, which can be up to £150, was ranked fourth among the reasons given, the principal reason being that many people do not see the need to do so. They also cite the pain, and the difficulty of finding a good dentist. Then comes the possibility that it might cost them money.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North) rose——

Mr. Clarke: Among better-off people, attending the dentist for a regular examination is largely a matter of attitude and habit. Those attitudes and habits are changing. In the past 10 years, the proportion of the adult population attending a dentist regularly has risen from 44 per cent. to about 50 per cent., despite the increases in charges.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that pensioners with no source of income other than their state pension, although they might have their own home or flat, will not have to pay dental or eyesight charges?

Mr. Clarke: I can certainly confirm that point and it is important that we do so. Concern is often expressed about pensioners in such debates, for reasons that we all understand, but the social pattern of the country has changed in recent years and it is no longer the case that everyone of pensionable age can be assumed to be in the poorest category. Some pensioners are pretty hard-up, but others have quite large disposable incomes.

We give the same protection to pensioners as we give to the rest of the population. That is based on the best possible foundation, that of their income and means. The people in the category described by my hon. Friend do not have to pay for dental tests and the poorest pensioners, certainly those relying solely on their retirement income, would qualify for income relief.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): In order to put the £3·15 charge every six months into perspective, in comparison with other costs for families, will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the family expenditure survey shows that the average family in this country spends £8 a week on alcohol and £3 a week on toiletries?

Mr. Clarke: The average family also spends £4·50 a week on tobacco. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend's point is perfectly valid. Given the expenditure pattern of any household in this country, an expenditure of £3·15 every six months is an infinitesimal part of the household budgets of all those people who do not fall into the exemption categories. We shall waste the resources available to the Health Service if we continue to provide this examination free to a large section of the population who would pay it without thinking seriously about it and thereby contribute a sum of £50 million each year to the resources of the Health Service.

That is my case. We are discussing a misplaced sense of priorities which suddenly seized their Lordships when they first considered the matter. Just as they exercised their undoubted right to send the measure back to us to reconsider it, I strongly believe that we should exercise our undoubted right to send it back to their Lordships for them to reconsider it when they see the consequences for National Health Service spending and treatment.

6.30 pm

The vast majority of the £50 million that we forgo—in my opinion all of it—is wasted. It will be a case of resources needlessly turned aside if the House votes against the Government. Those who occupy the Chamber do not constitute a typical cross-section of the population, but by definition all of us are not exempt from Health Service charges. If the House decides to agree with the amendment, everyone sitting in the Chamber will be able to continue having dental examinations scot free. I am sure that no hon. Member would argue that he would be put off by having to pay a charge of £3·15. I am sure that the majority of those whom we are talking about would similarly not be put off. The £50 million that we are forgoing is dead money that is not serving any useful purpose. It is a source of revenue of which the Health Service could make good use.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, I shall not give way. [HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] My hon. Friend and I are familiar with our mutual views. I am sure that I shall continue to exchange views with him on radio and television. He will have plenty of opportunities to express his views. As he feels so strongly about them, I am surprised that he has come in so late in the day. My hon. Friend is protecting those members of the population to whom I have referred against expenditure of £3·15 every now and again.

Labour Members have surprised me. I thought that they would be wedded to the principle that the better-off section of the population—we are talking about the comparatively better-off by definition—should contribute towards health services for the population as a whole. It seems astonishing that the Labour party should seek to protect higher-rate taxpayers from having to incur a penny piece of expenditure for their dental examinations. The Labour party is saying that the £50 million that might be spent each year on patient services should remain in the pockets of the non-exempt population. I trust that my right hon. and hon. Friends do not agree with that.

I am not prepared to agree with the argument that the National Health Service should cut its planned expansion to the extent of £50 million, or to any other extent, for the non-exempt categories. I believe that all those who are committed to the NHS and to the expansion of patient care, and who wish to see us continue to make further advances in increasing the quality and quantity of health care, will vote in support of the Government this evening, and in so doing disagree with the Lords in this ill-thought-out amendment.

Mr. Robin Cook: This is the first of two debates on a principle that has greatly exercised many hon. Members on both sides of the House. As it is the first of the two, it may be appropriate to begin by rehearsing the recent history of the Government's disturbing proposals. They have their roots in the Green Paper on primary care which the Government produced in April 1986. I am bound to observe that one needs to be the most keen and enthusiastic gardener to spot the roots in the Green Paper. There was not the slightest hint that the Government intended to introduce charges for dental examinations or eye tests. There was no suggestion of the most controversial proposal that the Government have brought forward on primary care.

The first question that I must ask the Secretary of State, especially after listening to his address to the House, is why, if the Government had it in mind to introduce the charges when they produced the Green Paper, they did not share the idea with the world at a time when the public and expert opinion could have commented on the proposal and perhaps saved the Secretary of State from the embarrassing and difficult position in which he now finds himself in defending what is a friendless proposal. No one put that in the Government's mind during the consultation period that followed the introduction of the Green Paper. In answer to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), the Government candidly stated that no one during the consultation period had suggested charging for dental examinations or eye tests.

The proposal surfaced, newly born but fully fledged, last year in a White Paper. Having produced proposals without consultation, the Government have refused to listen to what anyone has to say about them. I congratulate the Secretary of State and his predecessor on the unusual achievement of securing positive harmony, not merely a degree of unity, among the diverse Health Service lobby groups and professional organisations. They are united in condemning the proposals. Charges for dental examinations and eye tests have been condemned by the British Dental Association, the British Medical Association, the Royal College of Nursing, the Faculty of Community Medicine, the Royal Society of Health, the King's Fund Institute, the Society of Family Practitioner Committees—despite the fact that the Secretary of State has called for all future appointments to be submitted to him for political vetting—the Imperial Cancer Research Fund, the Patients Association, the National Consumer Association and the Association of Community Health Councils.

The Secretary of State told me that he regarded it as tedious to be asked to acquaint the House with the views of the chief medical officer. We all understood what he meant when he said that. I am prepared to give him the chief medical officer. I shall no longer press him to tell us what advice he gave. I merely invite him to name one reputable medical body that is supportive of the proposal to introduce charges for dental examinations and eye tests. By "reputable medical body", I do not mean those factories for ideological axe-grinding such as the Adam Smith Institute and the Institute for Economic Affairs, which are the only friends of the proposal left.

All medical opinion outside the Department and, as far as we can see, inside it has advised against the charges. We are told that the charge for a dental examination is to be only £3·15. Those who say "only £3·15" show a remarkable lack of understanding of what that sum means to somebody on £100 a week. There are those who talk about the price of a pint of bitter, and if any hon. Member pays £3·15 for one I shall be glad to invite him to my constituency, where he can be entertained much more cheaply.

We all know what happens to charges under the Government. As the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) has said, charges are increased or, as the Government would describe it, reviewed. Some of us remember when prescription charges were only 20p. Since then the cost of such a charge has multiplied 13 times. With that rate of inflation, we shall have a £40 dental examination charge within nine years. Such an increase would be rather faster than the rate of wage increases. It is ironic that the new charge is being imposed in the one area of health policy where the deterrent effect has been repeatedly proven.

The Secretary of State has denied that charges for dental treatment would result in any form of deterrence. I take issue with the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I shall give two examples that have arisen since the House debated the issue on Report in May. The first example is the result of the change in the age of exemption which was made in 1981. Until 1981, any youth under 21 years of age was exempt from charges for dental treatment. In 1981, the Government reduced the exemption level to 18. Until 1981, the number of courses of dental treatment for 17 and 18-year-olds was almost identical. There was only a marginal diference between the two age groups. In 1982, there were 710,000 courses of dental treatment for 17-year-olds and only 554,000 for 18-year-olds. It was not, as the Secretary of State would have us believe, a merely temporary effect to be wiped out by long-term trends. In 1986, the last year for which we have figures, there were 632,000 courses of treatment for 17-year-olds and only 495,000 for 18-year-olds. The figures are eloquent testimony to the fact that among this age group there was a marked deterrent effect following the introduction of dental charges.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): I have also seen the figures, but I place a completely different interpretation on them. They show the remarkable success of preventive dentistry and the fact that children's teeth over the years have become very much better.

Mr. Cook: I cannot express just how glad I am that I gave way to the hon. Gentleman. If he seriously believes that the success of the treatment of 17-year-olds explains the 30 per cent. drop in treatment among 18-year-olds, I have no doubt about which Lobby we will find him in when the Division bell rings.

I want to adduce another piece of evidence for our case which comes from the other end of the age spectrum where the effect of dental charges has been clearly established to have had a deterrent effect. My point relates to a study of dental treatment among pensioners published by Health Care UK in August. It showed that among pensioners liable to pay for their dental treatment, only half as many as were exempt were likely to opt for expensive treatment. There was a very clear and statistically clear difference. It is more worrying to note that the study showed that those pensioners liable to pay were four times as likely to require emergency treatment when they went for treatment. That shows that that group, because they knew that they had to pay, put off going to the dentist until the crisis occurred. How much more likely is that to occur if those pensioners now have to pay not simply for treatment, but for the check-up?

There is only one conclusion. As a result of the measure, we will see a serious reverse in the long, slow advance in preservation work by dentists. It is inevitable that there will be a tendency to an increase in extractions and loss of teeth as a result of people coming too late for successful intervention.

The Secretary of State made much of the fact that he was saving the Health Service money. He said that he would save £49 million which could be spent to improve primary care. There can be no better way of spending £49 million on primary care than to ensure that people are encouraged to go regularly for a dental check-up and have no disincentive to do that.

I do not want to embarrass the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill), but I strongly endorse his observation. Every argument of principle used by the Secretary of State to defend the charge could be applied to every other case of preventive medicine. As I listened to the Secretary of State's arguments, I thought that the same arguments would sound equally valid and nonsensical were the Secretary of State to come to the Dispatch Box and say that he was proposing to introduce a charge of £3·15 for a cervical cancer smear. We can see all the arguments that could be adduced: it is not much, it is the price of three or four gin and tonics; there is no evidence that it would stop people coming forward; women surely value their lives more than £3·15 and, indeed, encouraging them to pay £3·15 might make them value the smear all the more. Were the Secretary of State to do that, he would be drowned in a gale of derision because the whole point— [Interruption.] If my hon. Friends will allow me, the Secretary of State would be drowned in a gale of derision from the Opposition Benches.

I want to refer to Conservative Back Benchers. When the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) intervened in the Secretary of State's speech, I was fascinated to hear the right hon. and learned Gentleman say that the hon. Gentleman's arguments were "perfectly valid." The hon. Member for Pembroke played a distinguished part on Report when we debated this issue. Sixteen Conservative Members took part in the debate and the hon. Gentleman was one of only two who supported the proposals. I warn the Secretary of State that the hon. Member for Pembroke was engagingly frank about why he supported charges. He made it clear that he was in favour of charging for everything provided by primary care—visits to GPs and the rest. That is the argument which the Secretary of State found "perfectly valid."

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I did not actually say that. I said that I was in favour of a charge for going to the doctor for those who could afford it. That is different from saying that every piece of primary health care should be charged for. That is a perfectly reasonable case to put. It is not a case which so far has the acceptance of the Government, but that does not mean that Conservative Members cannot engage in a debate on where the Health Service is going.

6.45 pm

Mr. Cook: I do not want the hon. Gentleman to misunderstand me. I welcome his presence and candour. However, I rather doubt whether the Secretary of State does the same. The Secretary of State should note where this "perfectly valid" argument is taking him. It is taking him, as the hon. Member for Pembroke honestly and fairly made clear, towards charges for visits to doctors by those who can afford them.

The arguments are well understood and well known. They are well understood because we have been over this ground——

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cook: No. If the hon. Gentleman will allow me, I will continue, because many Conservative Members want to intervene in the debate and I am anxious to leave adequate time for them.

The arguments are well understood because we have been over this ground before. It is worth recording that on every occasion that we have done that, the Government have lost the argument. They lost it on Report and in another place and that is why we have returned to it today. Latterly in ministerial briefings, a new and rather unpleasant theme has surfaced. Journalists have told us that the Government are determined to get their business through. They will not back down. The Secretary of State may be wet, but he will prove that he is tough. I am referring to the same Ministers who have discovered that they are such sticklers for constitutional convention that they regard it as improper to tell us what the chief medical officer advised them.

A much greater constitutional convention is the function of Government to listen to Parliament. The will of Parliament on this matter is perfectly plain. It was shown on Report and in the vote in another place and it was shown in an early-day motion. The Secretary of State knows perfectly well that if there were a secret ballot on the proposal, he would go down. His only hope of surviving is if his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Waddington) and his hon. Friends stand at the right doors and the wrong doors and smile menacingly at hon. Members who go through the wrong one.

The Secretary of State does not demonstrate strength by refusing to admit that he is wrong and cannot convince anyone. He shows weakness. There can be no greater display of strength than for the Secretary of State to tell us that he has gathered the views of those working in dentistry and listened to his colleagues and he has changed his mind and will not proceed. There is still time for him to show that strength of mind at the end of this debate. However, if he persists in ignoring the views expressed in the Chamber, he must be defeated in the Division.

Sir George Young (Ealing, Acton): It is common ground between both sides of the House that the National Health Service needs the extra resources announced today, which I am sure we all welcome. It is also common ground that it is perfectly legitimate for the users of the NHS to make a contribution towards its costs. Under both Labour and Conservative Governments there have been charges for prescriptions and dental treatment.

The Conservative party has always made it clear that it is part of our philosophy to try to reduce direct taxation partly by cutting public expenditure and by increasing indirect taxes and introducing more realistic prices for parts of the public sector. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has already said, since we have been in office we have increased substantially prescription charges and charges for treatment without a lot of heart-searching and weekend activity by the Whips.

Those who subscribe to the deterrent argument against charging for dental treatment have to bear in mind the substantial increases that we have already introduced, which we have all defended, partly by saying that the money goes to improve the quality of service provided by the NHS, but also by arguing that those who benefit directly from parts of the NHS should make a modest contribution if their means permit it.

The debate this evening is about whether dental charges are simply an acceptable extension of a principle that has already been conceded or whether they raise a new issue that makes them unacceptable. Of course I am influenced by the fact that a large number of my hon. Friends with whom I usually instinctively align myself find themselves deeply unhappy about the charges.

However, anyone who visits his dentist for a check-up has already accepted that he may end up paying. There are about 37 million treatments a year and 8 million check-ups, so it follows that most people who go to the dentist know that at the end of the day they will have to pay something. Indeed, part of the point of going to the dentist for a check-up is to find out whether one needs treatment before a problem becomes painful. What the proposals are doing in practice is to substitute the inevitability of a charge with the probability of a charge. I do not find that unacceptable. I do not find any matter of high principle at stake, particularly if the charge is only £3·15.

My right hon. and learned Friend referred to the survey. I hope that he will use that survey not just to reinforce his case in the debate but to look at the three most important reasons why people do not go to the dentist and launch a campaign with the dental profession to bring down those barriers. Many of us would be reassured if, when he replies, there was some sign that that survey was being taken seriously and that there would be a campaign to promote more visits to the dentist.

However, there is another reason for querying the reservations of my hon. Friends. I do not accept the distinction between diagnosis, for which one must not charge, and treatment, for which one can charge. With the development of preventive medicine and health education, that distinction is being blurred. We should not encourage people to believe that they have been treated if they are given a prescription or have a tooth removed, but have not been treated if they are given some helpful advice or friendly warning about their lifestyle, diet or smoking. The diagnosis often embraces such health education and promotional activity which may be far more valuable and cost-effective than treatment. I do not understand the argument that it is legitimate to charge for curative medicine, but illegitimate to charge for preventive medicine.

[Sir George Young]

My hon. Friends underestimate the willingness of many people who visit the dentist, whose incomes have risen over the past nine years and whose taxes have been reduced, to make some contribution towards that service, especially if that contribution in turn goes back to funding its expansion. I do not feel in the least apologetic or defensive about this. I am happy to defend the measure in my constituency, and I shall vote against the Lords amendment tonight.

Mr. Fearn: I wish to speak against the Government's amendment and in favour of Lords amendment No. 20.

Each day that I appear in Parliament, each day that goes by, I find it more and more incredible that the Government get away with introducing legislation that flies in the face of all expert advice and public opinion. With the exception of a few members of the Government, I do not know anyone or anybody connected with the dental or medical profession who supports the introduction of charges for dental checks. Yet the Secretary of State seems hell bent on getting the clause on to the statute book, even though the measure contradicts the Government's professed objectives.

The thrust of the White Paper "Promoting Better Health", so the Government would have us believe, was, as the title suggests, the promotion of preventive medicine to improve the health of individuals. Indeed, one of the paper's stated aims was to achieve the wider availability of dental treatment. But when the Bill was presented to the House, we found that the Government had, by one fell stroke, reduced the availability of dental treatment to many of the population by introducing a charge for dental checks.

When the deterrent argument was put forward previously, the Government responded by saying that as the charge would be only £3·15 it would not act as a deterrent. My answer to such callousness is that whoever makes such statements has obviously never had to count the pennies on a Monday morning to see whether there is enough to cover the cost of sending the children to school on the bus or enough even to buy them a lunch when they get there. He has obviously never had to count his pension pittance to decide whether he should have meat for the day's meal or put an extra 50p in the meter.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): The hon. Gentleman refers to £3·15 as a deterrent. Is he aware that gross average earnings are £224 a week and £3·15 is less than 2 per cent. of that?

Mr. Fearn: I am aware of most incomes, but I do know about the incomes of the poorer people, which the hon. Gentleman may not know about.

It is no good someone saying to me that there is a safety net to cover such cases, because it is quite clear that many people do not take up state benefits. That is not surprising when one sees the length of the forms that have to be filled in and the number of questions to be answered. I think that 17 pages is the latest figure. Most important of all is the stigma attached to such benefits. Therefore, it is not surprising that people do not apply for them.

Another factor in the cost of dental charges is that if and when the measure is introduced the cost may be only small at first, but if we look at prescription charges over the past 10 years, we all know that if the Government have anything to do with it, it will not be long before the charges are increased to a rate way above inflation. Charges for dental checks, whatever they cost, are contrary to good preventive medicine.

The Government admit that there has been a great improvement in the dental health of the British people, including those in Scotland, who in the past had a poor dental health record. Much of that success is due to preventive measures. Regular check-ups play an important part in that process. Any action that reduces them can only be a step backwards.

It is well documented that dental checks play an important role in the early detection of life-threatening diseases such as oral cancer. Not so well known is the role that they play in the detection of other diseases, as the experience of one of my constituents highlights. A few years ago, after going from one specialist to another and undergoing tests for cancer, tuberculosis and many other conditions, and weighing only six stones, she visited her dentist for a check-up. He promptly sent her back to her doctor with a suggestion that she was suffering from an over-active thyroid. His diagnosis proved to be correct. We should look to the diagnoses of dentists to give patients the chance to live.

Are we really to run the risk of allowing the detection of many diseases to fall by the wayside and in doing so add to the costs of the NHS? It is clear that if the House does not support Lords amendment No. 20 today a significant number of people, not just the very poor, will be deterred from visiting their dentist until it is too late.

In the short term, it is possible that this clause will save the NHS a little money, but in the long term it will prove to be far more expensive, as dentists and doctors are required to treat conditions that, if detected earlier, would have been easier to treat and cure. The repercussions from the introduction of dental charges on the health of individuals and on the Health Service cannot and must not be underestimated.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): I shall be brief because I appreciate that it is in the Government's interest that this debate should go on as long as possible. I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State on proposing his amendment in what I may describe as his characteristically robust style. When he hitches up his trousers, we all know that he is going to sock it to us. However, I think that he has got it wrong. I believe that right hon. and hon. Members would find great support for their Lordships outside this Chamber. There is a danger that if we were to resist the Lords amendment and returned the clause to their Lordships, they might amend it once more, and we would embark upon the kind of parliamentary ping pong that could eventually lead to a constitutional crisis.

I wholeheartedly support the Bill, which follows the White Paper on primary health care, "Promoting Better Heath". Among the White Paper's four objectives that are to be enshrined in the Bill are the promotion of health, the prevention of illness, and the importance of getting value for money. I feel sure that Members on both sides of the House wholeheartedly agree with those objectives.

Those parts of the Government's strategy have my wholehearted support. The Government have already demonstrated their commitment to primary health care by spending £5 billion per annum for that purpose, in preventing disease. The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) commented that the White Paper makes no mention of charges, but I draw the attention of the House to the Conservative manifesto for the last general election, which was not all that long ago, which also made no mention of them.

I believe that the House is puzzled by two Government inconsistencies. First, the Government are inconsistent in introducing eye and dental inspection charges when so many other examinations remain free of charge. Two of my hon. Friends mentioned breast screening and cervical smear tests, which are free. Why is that so? If one is to be consistent, charges should be imposed for all tests. Secondly, the Government are inconsistent in demonstrating their belief in preventive medicine while at the same time proposing measures that will harm prevention and increase the number of people needing to be cured.

The Government have tried this before, in 1980, when my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan) was the Minister of Health, and when the Government attempted to introduce eye inspection charges. On that occasion, my hon. Friend accepted that my hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) and for Woodspring (Sir P. Dean) were strongly opposed to the Government's proposals. My hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East acknowledged that it was a very important matter. He said:

"In no way do we wish to create a deterrent for people seeking eye testing who need treatment."

He went on to say:

"It is characteristic of this Government"— and he was speaking then of a Conservative Government also—

"and of our democratic process, that when strong representations are made to us we are only too willing to consider them carefully . . . It is not our intention to proceed with charges for sight testing."—[Official Report, 15 May 1980; Vol. 984, c. 1781-82.]

If that was good enough then, it is good enough now. What has changed? There have been a few changes. One of the opponents then is now a Dame, and another has become Deputy Speaker. The Minister at the time is now a so-called rebel. Another fundamental change is that today's economy is much stronger than it was in 1980. However, if one accepts my right hon. and learned Friend's proposition that the Government are trying to save money for the National Health Service, which I do not, surely the argument for maintaining free tests is far stronger today than it was in 1980. Why did the Government accept the proposition that tests should be free in 1980 but are trying to impose charges now?

In this debate on dental charges—and the same is true in respect of eye testing—both sides base their arguments on presumption. The Government presume that charges will not deter, and that, in the case of dental inspections, about £50 million a year will be saved, whereas the so-called rebels presume that charges will act as a deterrent that will in the long run cost the Health Service much more in patient treatment than will be saved in the short term.

The Government have got it wrong. There is reasonable doubt on both sides. We are not debating something inanimate but are considering our constituents' health and the prevention of what can be serious diseases. It is a matter of life and death, and we do not dice with death. My right hon. and learned Friend should not do so either. In the face of any reasonable doubt, tests must remain free of charge. That proposition is supported not only by the specialist organisations concerned with both dental and eyesight but also by the BMA and the British Dental Association.

The BDA maintains that, if there is any doubt, tests should remain free of charge. It points to two vulnerable groups—the young and the elderly. Until 1981, no charges were made for NHS dental treatment to those aged under 21, with the exception of denture charges, which were rarely relevant but were imposed from the age of 16. After April 1981, charges applied from the age of 18, except for patients in full-time education, when they began at 19 years of age. That brought about a short, sharp drop in treatment provision in the age group concerned. So paying does deter.

As to the elderly, I may point out that about half of all oral cancers are found among those aged 65 and over. Additionally, the risk of death from oral cancer is even greater than it is from cervical cancer, for which tests are still free.

I cannot be described by any of my right hon. or hon. Friends as a Tory wet, and nor can many of my hon. Friends who signed early-day motion 1405 and who I hope will be joining me in the Lobby tonight to vote against this proposition. We oppose the imposition of charges because we want to save money for the Health Service.

Once I was unwise enough to suggest in this Chamber that a politician's mind is determined by the state of his seat. I was told to withdraw such an offensive generalisation, but it seemed to make sense to me that before going into the Lobby to vote against the Government I should find out what my constituents had to say.

About 10 days ago, there was a meeting of my constituency Conservative Association executive, which had a heated debate on this matter. There were about 50 people present, and at the end two of them decided that there should be charges for everything, and that there should be means testing. Everyone else who was present supported me. That was not done out of loyalty to me but because they felt it was sensible to maintain free dental and eye tests. Last Friday, I attended a social event at one of my branches, in a place called Braishfield, when about 150 people were present. I would describe them as fairly well heeled and the kind of people who would probably anyway pay for their dental and eye tests. They too were solidly with me.

If that were not enough, on leaving Conservative Central Office the other day, I was hailed by a senior lady official who shouted "Charges!" at me. Memories of the military assault course immediately flooded back. When I turned to her, she added, "Dental and eye tests." I asked her what she meant and she replied, "The Tory women are behind you." I can think of better places to put the Tory women—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] If they believe that dental and eye tests should remain free, we should thank them for their support. I only regret that they cannot be with us in the No Lobby tonight. I call on my hon. Friends and on Opposition Members who feel that getting better value for the National Health Service is important, and who agree with the contention that prevention is better than cure, to support me in the Lobby tonight and oppose the Government.

Dr. Moonie: I listened with some puzzlement to the Secretary of State, who is after all one of the more intelligent Ministers and is renowned for his oratorical skill and his intellect. If we think about his intellect for a moment, we can admire the skill with which he left the Department of Trade and Industry ahead of the Barlow Clowes affair.

Mr. Robin Cook: And the Royal Ordnance factories.

Dr. Moonie: And the Royal Ordnance factories, as my hon. Friend reminds me. But we might find it a little puzzling that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has managed to walk into this can of worms—if the House will forgive the mixed metaphor.

I feel that we should cut through some of the more flatulent rhetoric that we have heard and try to get to the nub of the problem. There must be few hon. Members in the Chamber who seriously believe that the future of the Health Service over the next year depends on whether we introduce charges for tooth and eye examinations. That is nonsense.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): That is not the argument.

Dr. Moonie: The hon. Gentleman may say that, but it is the argument that the Secretary of State used in a direct threat to his Back Benchers.

Mr. Neil Hamilton rose——

Dr. Moonie: No, I shall not give way. I do not intend to waste my time or that of the House. The hon. Gentleman can make his own speech if he wants to. That ought to clear the Chamber.

We saw the same spectacle last year. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's predecessor appeared before the House in October and told us that there was nothing wrong with the NHS and that no money would be forthcoming. What happened six weeks later? Back he came, tail beween his legs, and, lo and behold, the Treasury had found the extra money needed to keep the Health Service afloat for that year. It is absolute nonsense for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to suggest that, were the £49 million that will supposedly be saved by this measure to be lost to the NHS, it would not be replaced if it was needed. Of course it would be, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows that fine as well.

I shall confine my remarks to the role of prevention in our society's health. It is a subject on which I have touched before and, sadly, will have to touch frequently in the coming years. Last week in the Palace of Westminster we held an inaugural meeting for the Public Health Alliance. More than 100 people from all professions turned up, as well as lay people interested in public health—people who fear that we have lost our way in preventive medicine over the past few years, and who intend to try to do something about it. It might well be appropriate to mention the Secretary of State when we talk about people who have lost their way.

Mrs. Currie: Drinking and smoking.

Dr. Moonie: I think that remarks about smoking and drinking should be aimed at the Secretary of State rather than me. No doubt they frequently are.

We were worried about the development of public health in this country. What have the Government contributed? Last week we heard of the disgraceful freezing of child benefit yet again, and now these proposals are before us. While other people are trying to reawaken our concern for public health, the Government appear to be doing their best to destroy it.

It is easy for us to forget how much we owe to public health measures, as opposed to those that members of my profession tend to claim as their own. Most are outwith our knowledge and are gradual factors that appear over the years. For example, the development of adequate sewerage and water supplies in the 19th century laid the foundation for health in our cities, and abolished cholera in this country many decades before it was abolished in other similar western countries.

In the 20th century, we have seen the advances made in the provision of school meals, school medical services, immunisation for children and many other measures that have contributed to improvements in public health over the past 100 years. Better wages and conditions over 20 or 30 years reduced deaths from tuberculosis from over 100,000 a year to almost nil.

Sad to say, the Government remain to be convinced of the value of those methods. I shall not talk about cancer screening, as other hon. Members have referred to it. But if we are introducing an adequate screening service which we hope will reduce mortality from cervical cancer in particular, there is—as others have said—no logic in failing to charge for that as well, as the Government seem to think that charging has no effect.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Moonie: No, I will not. I am mindful that hon. Members have been asked to limit the length of their contributions, and I do not wish to waste the House's time. [Interruption.] I look forward with great interest to the deeply intellectual contribution of the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton). I cannot think of anything worthwhile that he has said in the past, but perhaps tonight he will break the trend of a lifetime. [Interruption.] That is something foreign to the hon. Gentleman, but the longer that Tory Members are in the House the more they live and learn.

Child benefit has been cut in real terms by the failure to uprate. As the Black report said in 1980, by increasing child benefit the Government could immediately make the most important contribution that any Government could make to improving the health of mothers and children. Unfortunately, it was ignored by the Minister of the time, and it has been ignored by Ministers today. Let us remember the effect of that failure. The child of an unskilled labourer is still more than eight times as likely to die before reaching adulthood as is the child of a professional person such as myself. That is what we mean when we talk about preventive medicine, and that is what the Government cannot escape.

No member of my profession, the dental profession or any other profession would say that the charges will not have a deterrent effect—none, at least, whose views are worth listening to. I have heard both from their associations and from them in person, and I have had scores of letters from my constituents and others. Not even the Department's chief medical officer supports the Secretary of State's contention, and I am certain that in his heart of hearts the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not support it either.

This is not just a matter of dental hygiene or of retaining our teeth. There is no doubt that the development of serious conditions, particularly oral cancer, can be prevented through early diagnosis. Oral cancer, for those who have not seen anyone suffering from it, is one of the most hideous ways of dying imaginable. It was described to me as such by a consultant over 20 years ago when I had my first lecture in ear, nose and throat medicine. I saw the patients in his ward, and I have seen the effects of the disease, which still kills the vast majority of those who get it—largely through the lack of adequate measures to arrest it before too late. This measure will enhance the risks.

The Secretary of State says that 38 per cent. of people will be exempt from charges. Many of those are people who will not take up family credit—the 70 per cent. who are missing out on benefit and who will likewise miss out on their exemption from charges, either because they are ignorant of it or, as in the vast majority of cases, because they are too proud to pay for the health that they ought to have as of right.

I, for one, have no objection to paying more in taxes to ensure that these services remain free for everyone regardless of their means, and I trust that enough Conservative Members will support us in the Division to defeat the Government.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): The logic of the argument of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) is that we should have no prescription charges —[Interruption.]—but of course a Labour Government introduced prescription charges in 1949. We all know that we need prescription charges to provide some revenue for the Health Service and to ensure that medicines are valued as medicines and not treated in a frivolous manner.

We owe thanks to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health and his team today. They have brought before the House the largest ever increase for the National Health Service. With that £2,000 million we can begin to make progress. My right hon. and learned Friend is right to ask whether an extra £49 million matters in a sum as large as £2,000 million. I suggest that it does matter. By any yardstick £49 million is a lot of money. There are about 200 district health authorities in the country, and that £49 million represents about £250,000 for my district.

If we consider dentistry in Northampton, that £250,000 which, roughly speaking, represents the revenue from the charges paid by the 50 per cent. of people who go to the dentist, would more than fund the orthodontic unit for which we have been waiting. If there were a poll in Northampton on whether people should spend £3·15 on a dental check-up and that money should be used to set up an orthodontic surgery unit in the Northampton general hospital, I am prepared to wager that the majority of people in my constituency would want the money to be invested in oral surgery.

It is helpful of the British Dental Association to arm us all with figures. Those figures clearly show that since the charges for courses of treatment have risen dramatically, there has been an increase in uptake among the elderly. In 1968, 27 per cent. of people were having courses of treatment. The latest figures from the British Dental Association show that the uptake has risen to 45 per cent. Despite increased costs, the elderly use the service.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) was quite right. Those who turn up at the dentist expect to pay for a course of treatment. They know that a course of treatment will cost more than £2 or £3. It will be a significant sum. The real challenge is not the £3 charge, but how to get the other 50 per cent. of the nation to have any sort of check-up. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will pick up the point raised by my hon. Friend.

I am quite sure that my right hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right to apply the charge. I want the money to be reinvested in an orthodontic unit in Northampton general hospital.

Mrs. Rosie Barnes (Greenwich): According to the Chancellor, the economy is thriving. Today, he has announced increased funding in a number of key areas.

The health and well-being of our citizens must be a priority for any Government. It makes sense economically, politically and morally. If the Government are committed to primary health care and preventive medicine, why are they taking the illogical and counter-productive step of introducing charges for basic examinations which have always been free in the past? The poorer members of society—those just above the level of eligibility for exemption—will not come forward and they will certainly suffer. Charges will be a disincentive and will reduce take-up.

A real commitment to preventive medicine and primary care would mean more rather than less free screening. We are eroding the principle of the National Health Service free at the point of use. We should be prepared to pay for the National Health Service, but we should pay for it through taxation. Those of us who are better off are prepared to pay more at that stage to maintain the principle of the National Health Service being free at the point of use.

Why have the Government singled out specific tests on eyes and teeth? Are opticians and dentists considered to be the fat cats of the medical profession? Is it thought that they can absorb such costs? It will not happen. The Royal National Institute for the Blind has carried out a survey which shows that it will cost £10 for eye tests and £3·15 for dental tests. Are we to assume that eyes and teeth are optional extras—a cosmetic area that does not involve life and death as much as other areas do? What about hearing tests, cervical smears, breast screening, routine tests in pregnancy, and blood tests? Will those all suffer the same fate? What is the principle that sets those two tests apart from the rest? I do not understand it.

It seems to be a miserly act. We are talking about 40 per cent. exemption, but we are contemplating a huge bureaucracy and administrative cost to ascertain who should pay charges and who should not. It seems very silly that, if the money is available to invest further in the Health Service, we should start charging for vital tests. Where will it end?

The principle of the National Health Service being free at the point of use is vital and must be defended tonight. Yes, we must pay, but we should pay through taxation and not when we need medical care.

Sir Gerard Vaughan (Reading, East): I very much regret having to disagree with my right hon. and learned Friend's arguments in this matter, especially on a day when he has raised such very large sums for the National Health Service, which we all know are much needed. We know that from our waiting lists and ward closures. I congratulate him on that. He put forward a very persuasive argument. That is not surprising when one considers that he is a distinguished barrister. His argument was entirely about money. He did not really refer to the other important issues.

If eye and dental tests were simply tests for spectacles or for holes in teeth, I would agree with him. I see no reason why people who can afford to pay should not contribute to the cost of the National Health Service through a charge. But, as we all know, there is another side to the argument which was touched on by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mrs. Barnes)—the case for preventive medicine.

I have to tell my right hon. and learned Friend that times have changed, and people are looking for more and more health screening and preventive care. They have got the message that the Government have been putting forward that people should have their health checked regularly. My right hon. and learned Friend is promoting that message and I wish him success. The more people go for health checks the sooner disease can be detected. So we come to the curious situation in which breast screening, cervical screening, blood pressure checks, blood cholesterol tests, diabetes tests and a whole range of other things are all free. When it comes to having one's eyes examined, which is not the same as being measured for spectacles, and having one's mouth examined, which is not necessarily the same as looking for holes in teeth, people will be charged. Such examinations are valuable for the early detection of disease. My right hon. and learned Friend never referred to that—that is why I disagree with him so strongly.

7.30 pm

If we are to maintain a National Health Service which is free at the point of need, we should include screening for health care. Others have spoken about oral cancer, but there are more than 200 illnesses or conditions which can be diagnosed by examining the mouth. Even more important conditions can be detected by examining somebody's eyes. We use our eyes to look out on the world, but they also provide a means of looking into the body. Although often referred to in another way, I am basically a neurologist and I have detected early brain tumours where there is papilloedema or pressure on the back of the eye, and early diabetes. A colleague in the House told me recently that his wife had been diagnosed as having a high cholesterol level when she went to have her spectacles checked.

We are opening up preventive medicine, so even if my right hon. and learned Friend wins the Division tonight, can he not come up to date and provide a comprehensive health screening service which can detect disease early on? It would save money in the long run, not cost extra. My right hon. and learned Friend looks as though he disagrees, but he is a barrister. I am a doctor. I resent being told that eye examinations and mouth examinations—I am not calling them dental checks—are not important in health care for our community. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will have the courage to say, "I have made a mistake and I shall let the Lords amendment stand."

Dame Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Can I ask my hon. Friend about some information that I received recently? I was told that dentists frequently discover oral cancer and are able to deal with it and that they know that it is more common than cervical cancer. If there is to be a charge for checking whether there is a cancer in the mouth, is there to be no charge for checking the presence of a cancer in another part of the body?

Sir Gerard Vaughan: My hon. Friend has drawn attention to one of the anomalies and inconsistencies in the Government's stance. It is absolutely ludicrous to charge for inspections at one end of the body but not at the other. It is ludicrous, for example, to have free urine tests for diabetes but to charge for eye examinations which may discover diabetes.

I am aware that many others wish to speak and I think that I have made my point. This is an illogical and out-of-date proposal and I hope that the Government will think again.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): I have followed the Bill throughout and served on the Standing Committee, but I am amazed that the Government have offered no defence for what they are pushing through. I am all the more amazed in view of the Chancellor's statement today, as he more or less claimed that the Exchequer has never had it so good. Nevertheless, he desperately needs what the Secretary of State called peanuts, which would be made available as a result of the proposed charges. The Prime Minister's statement today also astonished me. She said that people will be put out if they are not allowed to pay for check-ups.

The hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) said that people are upset because they cannot pay for their bypass operations, tonsilectomies, or hip replacements. I have not had sacks full of mail on that issue, but I have had a vast quantity of mail from people who deeply resent the Government's policies on this issue. The Prime Minister scraped the very bottom of her barrel when she spoke of people being offended by not being able to pay. That comment was greeted with derision, even on her own Back Benches.

I commend Conservative Members who are standing out against the Government on this issue. Their sincerity is not in doubt. It is important to highlight the fact that there is a significant difference between the stance of Tory rebels and that of the Labour Opposition. The Tory rebels see the Government's stance in terms of the damage that will be done to preventive health care just to generate relatively small revenue for the NHS. I listened in Committee to the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes), who spoke fluently and sincerely. I do not doubt the correctness of the stance that he took in Committee. The Tory rebels are right—the Government have failed to provide a scrap of evidence which has medical backing in support of what they are doing.

The Opposition agree with the Tory rebels, but we also see the change as part of a wider process of moving from state provision of a National Health Service to a system based on the purchase and sale of health care. That is crucial to an understanding of why the Government are refusing to bow to the reasonable arguments being advanced by Conservative Members. The issue must be seen in the context of much wider developments in the NHS.

The Government have encouraged the belief that we cannot afford a National Health Service. We are frequently told that there are too many old people, that people are living longer, that the NHS is a bottomless pit and that expectations are too high. Health Ministers have also tried to create an expectation of paying for health care. How else are we to explain prescription charges shooting through the roof in spite of the Government's arguments as presented in the Tory manifestos of 1979 and since? I am deeply offended when I see people in my surgeries who take it for granted that they have to bribe consultants to gain access to the basic health care to which they are entitled and for which they have paid for many years.

These proposals can be understood only in terms of the Government's ideological hatred of the central principles that underpin the NHS. They regard the NHS as the last bastion of collective provision which must be dismantled by the thrust of Thatcherism. They regard it as a barrier to total freedom from the state, and as a barrier to American-style health care as a business and an enterprise.

I believe that charges for dental and eyesight checks are a calculated step towards the establishment of a health care market. The Bill is yet another nail in the NHS's coffin. That being so, I strongly urge those who believe in the NHS to support the Lords amendment.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): There has been perhaps more emotion in the debates on this issue than on any other issue so far in this Parliament. The Government's case is more credible than has been portrayed in the media and in previous debates. It has been strongly argued that examination charges will seriously deter people from regular attendance, to the detriment of patients, and that those who are deterred will suffer adverse consequences. I am not convinced that that will happen. Such evidence as exists is inclined to support the opposite point of view.

As the House will recall from earlier debates, for more than 15 years——

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. That man is reading every word of his speech, which has obviously been written by some party or Government hack.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Canavan: Further to the point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. There is a rule of the House that one is not permitted to read a speech. That man is reading a speech.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) is referring to his notes copiously.

Mr. Greenway: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. Had the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) waited a moment longer, he would have heard me say that, for the past 15 or 16 years, I have run a business advising general dental practitioners on the management of their practices, so, without any question, all the words that I shall say will be words that I have written, including those in the many speeches that I have made to dental meetings throughout the country for the past 15 or 16 years.

I have observed many changes in the general dental service. There has been a dramatic improvement in dental health. Let us get one thing clear: the dedication and application of general dental practitioners have been major contributory factors in the improvement in the nation's dental health. Other factors are also evident. There has been a general increased awareness by the public of the need for self-care and oral hygiene. The use of fluoride, largely in toothpaste but also in water supplies, and more sensible diet, with a lower sugar intake, has reduced tooth decay. Despite that, 50 per cent. or more of the public do not regularly visit a dentist. In the latest issue of the British Dental Journal, one of the new regional advisers in general dental practice wrote:

"Let's call It 'Dental Consultation.'"

He said:

"dentists should be asking themselves why around 26 million people in the UK do not share the profession's perception of need for regular dental care."

Can it be that people do not attend a dentist more frequently because of the low priority they give dental treatment and regular dental attendance? Cost is cited by opponents of the new charge as a major deterrent. "People cannot afford it," they say. I do not accept that. We have already heard an announcement by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State about exemptions, so those who are poor and at the bottom end of the income scale will get help and will not have to pay. As my right hon. and learned Friend said, that number was increased only last week.

Those who argue costs as a deterrent really mean that there are many who would rather spend their money on something else. That is true, especially of the young. My right hon. and learned Friend will recall that I wrote to him about four weeks ago and suggested that, if there is to be any change in the Government's thinking, perhaps we should reconsider the position of young adults. It is clear already from this debate that some hon. Members are persuaded by that view. Whatever we decide tonight, that is a matter to which we may have to return.

Anyone who travels regularly on trains will see 19, 20, 21 and 22-year-olds consume at least £3·15 worth of beer apiece between King's Cross and York and, I dare say, other destinations as well.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Not in second class.

Mr. Greenway: It is mostly in second class.

The opponents of these modest charges seem to have concluded that the priorities of some, if not all, patients are so irresponsible that they will present themselves for dental examination only if it is free. Are we really saying that the public's appreciation of the need and value of a regular dental consultation is so pathetically low that we must not require a modest charge from those who can afford it? What an inverted sense of proportion among people—mostly on the Opposition Benches, but also, sad to say, some Conservative Members—who say one minute that a regular dental check is a potentially life-saving necessity, yet in the next breath say that it can be done only if we provide it free of charge. Nothing is more certain to undermine the real value of a service or benefit than free universal provision.

[Mr. Greenway]

It is an incontrovertible fact that, over the past 15 years, dental charges, which were started by the Labour party, have improved the efficiency and standard of the general dental service. Patients have more consumer awareness. The same is true of optical care. Extending charges to include dental examinations will present a major challenge to the profession and the Government to ensure that the public give dentistry the priority that it deserves.

Priority is what the debate should be about—increasing priority and awareness of the need for regular dental attendance, especially among the 26 million people who do not now attend. The majority would get free treatment as well as a free dental examination. It will be a shocking indictment of every one of us who is concerned with this matter—not just the patients but the profession, family practitioner committees, the Department, the Government Front Bench and us politicians—if these modest charges prove a barrier to dental attendance.

The White Paper promised that the Government would support a campaign for the promotion of general dental health. Let us get on with it soon. Although I do not accept the argument that charges should be a deterrent, that is not to say that helping patients to avoid high charges and to meet their obligations does not have merit. The first way to avoid high charges is to attend a dentist regularly. The examination charge, which we are debating, is part of an overall strategy of proportional charges under which regular attenders will pay no more than under the old system. That is a fact.

Dental insurance has a role to play. I am talking not about private dental insurance but about the member companies of the British Health Care Association, which provides schemes so that their members can insure, at a modest amount, to receive cash benefits when they have to pay a charge for dentistry or for optical work or if they are in hospital. Last year, British Health Care Association members paid about £7·5 million in cash benefits to members for dental treatment. That is only 2·5 per cent. of the amount raised from patient charges. Clearly, there is plenty of scope. Most members of these schemes are encouraged to join them by their employers. Employers can play a role in ensuring that they take a lead and that their employees have the benefit of such schemes.

The issue goes much further than the examination charge. I should like to refer to three other matters. First, there is the overwhelming need for a restructuring of the general dental service and the way in which dental practitioners are remunerated. As with so many other facets of our NHS, the present system was established 40 years ago. Then the profession had little time to do more than repair the effects of neglect. Indeed, GDPs did so well financially that fees were cut. Even 10 years ago, dentists were keen to absorb every new technique to improve output and meet demand. All that has largely changed. Now practitioners increasingly find that their regular patients require little, if any, dental treatment. One of my hon. Friends said some 8 million of the 37 million courses of treatment are examine and report only.

Since the debate about charges began a year ago, the fee paid to a dentist for an examination has increased from £3·90 to £4·20, the £3·15 that patients will be asked to pay being 75 per cent. of that. If the practitioner is required to screen for so many different illnesses, why is he so appallingly badly remunerated for doing so? It is because the present structure assumes that he will find that a great deal of treatment is required, but increasingly that is not the case. We must embark on urgent negotiations about that matter. I am disappointed that a year has passed since I made that request in the House and we seem to have got no further because we have been distracted by the argument about free examinations. We must have a continuing fair contract to reward the proper relationship between general dental practitioners and their patients and to reward good conservative treatment which lasts. Let us get on with that.

Secondly, there is the question of resources. If the charges were not accompanied by a major commitment of extra resources such as that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced today, there might be grounds for opposing the charges. Some dentists have suggested that the Government are abandoning the general dental service, but that is not true. Some hon. Members may be surprised to learn that in the past three years the net pay of general dental practitioners has been increased by almost a quarter and the fees paid on their item of service scale by one third—three times the rate of general inflation.

The Government's commitment does not end there. This year's fee scale already incorporates some of the measures outlined in the White Paper. My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) asked about this earlier. I can tell him that there are already pilot schemes to redistribute dentists more evenly throughout the country. There is one scheme in Walsall and three in the north-east. There are also changes in the prior approval rules to give practitioners more control over their clinical judgments and the treatment that they give. That, too, is incorporated in this year's fee scale. There is also more funding for postgraduate vocational training. The findings of the Windermere relativities inquiry have been incorporated straightaway. Some Opposition Members may not know what that means. Members of the profession decided how money should be redistributed across the fee scale to reflect the type of work being done in the National Health Service today, not that of 40 years ago.

I am sure that everyone in the House and throughout the country wants the Government to put more money into the Health Service to fund nurses' pay. That has been given proper priority. We now need to consider where the extra resources are going. Some district health authorities have achieved great efficiency in their operations, but they need more money. I want more money for Scarborough and for York. If voting for examination charges will help to achieve that, so much the better.

Thirdly, we should extend consumer choice to other parts of the NHS, perhaps to other areas of general practice as well as to the hospital service. Contrasting levels of efficiency between one district and another can no longer be tolerated in a society in which, despite record funding, resources must continually struggle to keep pace with technological change. If we want more resources, we must be willing to take unpopular decisions to achieve them without damaging the economy. It is understandable that Labour Members have the audacity to bite the hand that feeds them, but I urge Conservative colleagues in this House and in the other place not to interpret an unpopular decision as a wrong decision. With demands on the Health Service often seemingly infinite, it is essential that resources are put to the best use and reasonable opportunities for raising revenue are maximised. That is the moral case in favour of charges. It is not a popular message, but it is a right and responsible one.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): The Secretary of State made the point that this was a national health debate, and I was happy that he referred to Northern Ireland as well as to England, Scotland and Wales, because this national debate affects us all.

Much has been made of today's cash injection of £1·8 billion into the Health Service. The Select Committee said that £2 billion would be needed and was accused by the Department of plucking figures out of the air, so I welcome the fact that our assessment has been accepted. That assessment, however, was made earlier in the Session and did not cover further increases in wage settlements.

Coming to the nub of the debate, it was fascinating to hear the Minister suggest today that some of his Back-Bench colleagues had changed their minds since the House first voted on this. My profession is always happy when people change their minds, when they repent, come to their senses and go along the right road. I regret, however, that it seems that the Minister has backslidden as in an earlier incarnation he supported a free Health Service at the point of delivery and made much of that principle. I hope that those who realised that they were wrong a few months back will stick to their guns today and see us through this time. The comments of the hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) in relation to the point made by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) were not in support of charges for consultation but defended the concept that there might be a ground for paying for services. In my judgment, that would cover prescriptions rather than charges for seeing the doctor before being told what one requires. We must stick together on that and ensure that the National Health Service is maintained on that basis.

To refer specifically to Northern Ireland, it has been argued that the charges will not deter anyone from consulting a dentist, optician, optometrist or ophthalmic surgeon, but I query that. If the Government are already spending money on PR campaigns to encourage people to take up social service benefits, I suspect that it will take a great deal more PR work to encourage people to go to the dentist or the optician with the argument that the charge is only a minimum amount.

A short time ago a colleague asked me why the charge was to be £3·15. He said, "Isn't that three guineas?" The secret has slipped out. Guineas are still used regularly for legal fees. Those who suggest that three guineas is not much should bear in mind that, although it may not be much for those in the legal profession, it means a lot to the people about whom we are concerned. It may be that the Government have discovered this as a way of cutting down waiting lists. With the rationalisation of health care delivery in Northern Ireland, ophthalmic work has been centralised, particularly in the Royal Victoria hospital, Belfast, with a unit at Altnagelvin to cover the north-west. That was an attempt to provide modern health care in a rational and financially disciplined way. In fact, the waiting lists are increasing because, instead of finances being directed to help that service, they are being curbed time and again.

When considering this issue tonight we must deal with the question of the care of patients and the deliverance of that care. I share the experience of other hon. Members —and I cannot imagine that the Government have missed it—that modern care of patients can be enhanced by eye tests and dental checks. Therefore, although others may have changed their minds, my hon. Friends and I are even more confirmed in our opposition to the Government's proposals, which we shall oppose in the Lobby tonight.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): It must be especially galling for the Labour party to have this much-trailed debate on the very day on which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has announced additional funding for the NHS of £2 billion. At the time of the Budget, Opposition Members were saying that the 2p tax cut would have been far better spent on the Health Service. They now find that my right hon. Friend has succeeded in doing both, contrary to all their predictions. That must stick somewhat. I cannot help but think that, even if a Labour Secretary of State had had the option of another £40 million to spend, he would choose to spend it on removing the proposed charges. That £40 million, together with the £100 million for eye tests, can be used for so many other things. I cannot believe that even the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) would choose to spend that money on removing charges for tests.

The argument against charges for the tests is the argument against all charges in the NHS, which after the implementation of the new charges will raise about £800 million or £900 million a year. If the Opposition were to follow the purity of their argument, the first additional £1 billion that they chose to spend on the Health Service would not buy one additional operation. I simply cannot believe that that is what they want.

The only really important consideration is whether the charges will act as a material deterrent to people having eye or dental checks. Whenever charges are introduced or increased, the Opposition claim that people's attendance will go down. That was said when dental charges were raised and, again, very vociferously when charges were introduced for glasses. The Opposition said that people would not have glasses and would crash into each other on motorways or walk into lamp posts. That has not happened. Instead, the number of eye tests and the number of prescriptions for lenses has risen but, as the Government predicted, the charges for glasses have gone down.

Figures for dentistry have been bandied about tonight. Charges have been increased every year since 1976, yet the number of courses of dental treatment has also risen every year since 1976. It is unlikely that the charges will prove a deterrent. After all, the low income groups and all children are exempt, so we are really discussing only the 60 per cent. of the population who form the wealthier groups. For them, £3 for a dental check and £10 for an eye test once a year is not a material sum that will deter them. I cannot believe that the reason why some people will not have checks is that they will have to pay. Although the tests are currently free, they know that if anything is wrong they will have to pay for treatment. That does not put them off. People sometimes do not go to the dentist until there is obviously something wrong or they do not go to an optician until they think that they need glasses. A £3 or a £10 charge will not act as a deterrent.

[Mr. John Maples]

The weakness of the deterrent argument is given away in a lobbying circular that we have all received from the Federation of Ophthalmic and Dispensing Opticians. It states that "people will find the need to pay for a sight test a psychological, even if not a serious financial deterrent."

It demonstrates the weakness of the financial argument when the federation is thrown back on arguing a psychological deterrent.

The Opposition are, in effect, saying that the 60 per cent. in the wealthier groups are not sufficiently responsible to decide whether to go to the dentist or to have an eye test because they will have to pay £3 or £10. If that is the Opposition's opinion of the level of people's responsibility for their own affairs, it is amazing that they allow them to do anything on their own.

I believe that many sight tests will, in fact, still be free. When I drive to my constituency I go along the Walworth road and past the headquarters of the Labour party. Right on the border of the constituency of the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) is a large shop, which was not there a few years ago. Perhaps when the hon. Member for Livingston is bored at an NEC meeting the hon. Lady could take him there as it is only 200 or 300 yards from the Labour party headquarters. The shop takes up two huge shop fronts and is called Betterspecs. It has a big sign in the window saying, "Free eye tests". I suspect that that will happen throughout much of the country.

If I am wrong about the deterrent argument, what will be the consequences? On the whole, they will not be that serious. If people are walking around wearing the wrong glasses, or if they do not have a tooth filled until it begins to ache, those are not really serious consequences. They are certainly not life threatening. One or two examples of possible serious consequences have been mentioned, such as glaucoma and oral cancer. We must remember that, when people have free eye or dental checks, it is not because they want to find out whether they have glaucoma or oral cancer. Those are accidental, random discoveries in the process of doing something else. A dental check is not a screening process for oral cancer; it is simply one of the by-products. I understand that the average dentist comes across only two cases of oral cancer during the whole of his career. If we want a screening process for oral cancer, that must be the most expensive and inefficient way of providing it.

Mr. Michael Carttiss (Great Yarmouth): Does not my hon. Friend think that if two people discover that they have oral cancer that can be cured and that will save them a lifetime of disfigurement that is well worth the free checks? How can my hon. Friend calculate that in money terms?

Mr. Maples: Of course I understand that that is an awful disease, as is glaucoma. However, it is about time that my hon. Friend began to cost various elements of the NHS budget, because a cost can be put on all these matters. I repeat that if the only reason for a free dental check is to detect so few cases of oral cancer, it must be the most inefficient and expensive way of doing it that we could ever devise. I do not believe that charges would be a deterrent or that there would be dire consequencies. If, in the event, I am wrong and there is a huge increase in undetected glaucoma cases, that would be an argument for heavily promoting the need for people to have their eyes tested occasionally to ensure that they are not contracting that disease.

Ever since tax-cutting Budgets were introduced, the Opposition have said that the public would prefer the money to be spent on the NHS. They say that the public are willing to spend enormous amounts on the NHS rather than have tax cuts. For a man on average earnings, the 2p tax cut in the last Budget is worth about £170 a year—£3·40 a week. Are we to believe that that same person is not prepared to spend £3 and £10 on dental and eye tests? Is a person willing to forgo all his income tax cuts so that the money can be spent on the NHS not to be trusted voluntarily, of his own free will, to spend £3 or £10 on dental and eye checks? That is an extremely patronising attitude. The inescapable conclusion that we must reach is that the Opposition think that the only good provision in society is that provided by the state and that no one can be trusted to do anything on his own.

The arguments of opponents of the proposal go to the root of the whole idea of charging in the National Health Service. If it is wrong to charge for dental checks and eye tests, it must be wrong to charge for other things. Charges, which come only from the wealthier 60 per cent. of the population, raise about £800 million a year. It cannot be sensible to spend an additional £800 million to absorb those charges back into the public purse when that money could be spent on buying so many other things for the Health Service.

When one considers that 60 per cent. of the population, it is worth remembering what has happened to their finances over the past 10 years. We know that the take-home pay of men on average earnings has risen by 29 per cent. a year over the past 10 years. The pay of those on half average earnings has risen by 22 per cent. and the pay of those on three quarters of average earnings has risen by 26 per cent. Those are substantial sums. Over the past 10 years, the take-home pay of a man on average earnings has increased by £2,400. For someone on three quarters of average earnings—about the level at which family credit runs out and at which the person becomes liable for charges—income has increased by £1,800 a year. The income of a person on half average earnings—about £120 a week—has increased by £1,100 a year.

The idea that people with those increased personal resources and increased individual wealth are not prepared to take some responsibility for paying minor charges towards health care is incredible in every sense of the word. If the increases continue, over the next 10 years, a person on average earnings will have an income of £5,000 or £6,000 more. It is surely a sensible proposition that out of that amount some marginal contribution should be made towards the cost of individual health care.

That is also the case for pensioners. Pensioners' incomes did not rise very much under the previous Labour Government. Since the Conservative Government came to power, pensions have risen quite a lot. The average pension has risen from about £100 a week in 1980 to about £135 a week in 1990—an increase of about 35 per cent. In view of that increase, it is reasonable to suggest that pensioners should make some contribution to their own health care and that they are able and willing to do so.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I wonder why the hon. Member, like many of his hon. Friends, referred to average earnings. I come from the mining industry and the phrase

"average earnings" there told a false story, which the hon. Gentleman is doing tonight—with respect. Half the men at the pit were in the top income bracket, but the other half —the lower-paid workers—received 50 per cent. less than that. What about the lower-paid workers? They are the people for whom we are fighting, and the hon. Gentleman should be fighting for them as well.

Mr. Maples: People on family credit, which is about three quarters of average earnings, will not have to pay for tests. No children will have to pay for tests. A person on three quarters of average earnings is £1,800 a year better off in terms of take-home pay than 10 years ago. People on lower incomes than that will probably be on family credit and will receive the benefit of free tests, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has proposed. It is simply not true to say that I take no account of the lower paid. I did not need to bring them into the argument because they will be exempted from paying for dental or eye tests. It is only those who earn more than three quarters of average earnings who will be affected.

Most people are far richer than they were 10 years ago and are able and willing to pay modest charges towards items of health care. Charges will not be a deterrent to people seeking services. There must be better ways of spending £140 million than this one.

8.15 pm

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): Yesterday afternoon, I led a delegation of pensioners from my constituency to meet the Prime Minister at No. 10 Downing street. We took her a giant pair of spectacles which measured 2ft 6in across, and a giant tooth. The more uncharitable among us might suggest that they were the right size for the Prime Minister in view of the size of her head and mouth. Of course, I am not that uncharitable. The reason why we took the spectacles and the tooth there was to show the Prime Minister the great concern felt by people in Leicester and, particularly, by pensioners about the proposed charges.

I was accompanied on the visit by Les George, aged 66, from Maplin road, Nethershall in Leicester. He remembers that when he was a young boy, the Labour Government introduced the National Health Service and that the National Health Service was free at the point of need. Irene Howell, aged 65, also accompanied us and, as we walked up to No. 10, she reminded us that had she not had a test, she might have lost the sight of one eye. Also with us was Mary Draycott, a young mother with two children, who has been campaigning hard for the decentralisation of health and dental services in the outer estates of Leicester. The delegation represented many pensioners in places such as Nethershall, Northfields, Evington, Thurnby Lodge and Belgrave, who are deeply concerned about the proposed charges.

Before I came into the Chamber this evening, I spoke to a constituent who came down from Leicester in a coach to present me with a letter, which I should like to read to the House. She writes:

"I urge you to oppose and do all you can to oppose the proposals for the introduction of sight and dental charges. They will not improve the nation's eyesight or hearing. You may be able to eat with false teeth, walk with false legs but you cannot see with a false eye. Mrs. Thatcher is a wolf in sheep's clothing crying crocodile tears."

That letter came from a constituent who had never written to a Member of Parliament before, but who felt so outraged that she came all the way down from Leicester.

The charges are mean and vindictive. They are imposed by those who can afford to pay them.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: That includes the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Vaz: That is quite right. I have had three pay rises in the year and a half in which I have been a Member of Parliament, for which I did not have to bargain.

Many of my constituents and the constituents of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) are unable to afford the charges. The experts in Leicester are united. The secretary of the family practitioner committee said:

"During my career, three people have been operated on the day after I examined them and detected a blood clot or tumour.

General health will deteriorate because the chance to operate early will vanish and it could be too late by the time the patient notices the signs, then the treatment could be more complicated, dangerous and expensive.

More people will go blind as a result of less early detection which will cost more in the long run to care for them."

If the Minister tells me this evening that voting for health charges will mean that money can be invested in the health service in Leicester, let him come up with a number of assurances. The first assurance I seek is that the eight hospitals in Leicestershire that are about to be closed will not close. They include Ashby and district hospital, Catmose Vale hospital, Fielding Johnson hospital, Higham Grange, Roundhill maternity home, Regent hospital, Loughborough and Blaby hospital in the constituency of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If the Minister assures me and my hon. Friends that people in Leicestershire, like Mrs. Broughton who is 87 years old, will not have to wait two years to have hearing aids made for them, that the current hospital waiting list of 8,500 will be cleared, that 200 people who are waiting for operations on the orthopaedic waiting list will be cleared off the list and that the Towers hospital which is under threat of closure will not close, we shall be tempted to listen to his arguments. It will take 60 days of full surgery lists to clear the cases that I have mentioned.

The Government say that they want a first-class service. We want a first-class Health Service. We do not want the jumble sale Health Service that we have at the moment, which means that hon. Members are invited to hospital fêtes and charitable events to raise money for worthy causes such as the purchase of a kidney unit at Leicester general hospital.

Three weeks ago a number of my colleagues and I visited America. We visited an emergency room in a hospital. There, I witnessed a patient who had come in in great pain being asked, as the very first question, by the administrator: "Do you have insurance?" When he said that he did not, the patient, who was in great agony, was referred to the nearest public hospital, at which he no doubt had to wait because the public health service in America has been undermined to such a great extent. That is the kind of Health Service that the Government want, and the next Bill that comes before the House will provide for people to be charged when they visit their general practitioner. It already costs people in America £25 to see their GP.

[Mr. Vaz]

I commend the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham)—another Leicestershire Member, and one with whom I do not agree on any other issue—on the stand that he has taken. This morning he declared on Radio Leicester that he would be voting against the charges. I urge all other Conservative Members to join the hon. Gentleman in taking that principled stand and to vote against the charges.

Mr. Churchill: I wholeheartedly repudiate the offensive remarks made by the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) about my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. Such remarks do nothing to further the cause that he claims to support.

I warmly welcome the Chancellor's announcement that the Treasury coffers are awash with money and especially the news that an extra £2,000 million is to be made available for the Health Service in the coming year and a further £2,500 million in the year 1990-91. It is excellent news, and I applaud it.

I therefore find all the more regrettable and unnecessary the Government's determination to reverse the Lords amendment and for the first time to impose charges for eye and dental checks. I speak as one who is not known as a notorious wet.

The Government proclaim that they are in favour of preventive medicine. I welcome that commitment. Preventive medicine is not only right but it is the most cost-effective form of health care. Much more expensive treatments and hospitalisation further down the line may be required if preventive medicine does not exist or is inadequate.

There can be no doubt that over the years free eye and dental checks have made a significant contribution to preventive medicine. I firmly believe that to impose charges is as retrograde as it is unnecessary.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State makes the perfectly fair point that I—and others as fortunate as I am—should not have free eye and dental checks. There is no earthly reason why I should. However, as I have told my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State, neither I nor, I suspect, many others in my fortunate position have ever availed themselves of free eye and dental checks. It is a wholly bogus argument to say that, because the likes of Lord Hanson and Sir Ralph Halpern must be disbarred from going for free eye or dental checks, other people on earnings way below the average should be deprived of free tests.

I regret to have to say to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State—I am sorry that he cannot be in his place—that his belief that charges will not act as a deterrent is wholly unconvincing. If he is so sure that that is so, why in logic are not the Government moving to impose charges for breast cancer checks and cervical smears? There is no difference in logic between the two forms of screening.

I shall tell my right hon. and learned Friend why he is not moving in that direction. In his heart of hearts he knows that such charges would have a profoundly deterrent effect on those who need to be encouraged to go for regular checks. Regrettably, the present measure has nothing to do with encouraging preventive medicine and everything to do with pressure from the Treasury. I acknowledge that the list of exemptions is sizeable; 38 per cent.—no fewer than 20 million of our fellow citizens—will be exempted. The key argument advanced by the Secretary of State in favour of imposing charges is that everybody who does not qualify for an exemption can well afford £3·15 for a dental check or £10 for an eye test in this increasingly prosperous Britain.

Is that really so? Let me cite the case of a constituent of mine who came to my advice bureau in Manchester only last weekend. He is in his late 50s. He lives alone. He is self-employed and his business has not been prospering. Last year he earned only £2,880. That works out at £57 a week net of tax, or one quarter of average earnings. After he has paid £23 a week in rent for his council house, now that his housing benefit has been reduced to only £1·23, he has no more than £25 a week of disposable income on which to live. Because he is in full-time employment, because he works more than 20 hours a week and because he is not a single parent, he does not qualify for income support. Therefore, he would be required to pay eye and dental charges under the proposal. Is it reasonable or right to expect an individual at the bottom end of the economic scale to pay such charges? He has only £3·50 a day on which to live—less than the Secretary of State is paying for his evening meal in the House. Is it reasonable to charge such a man £10 for an eye test? Of course it is not, and my right hon. and learned Friend knows that it is not.

Let me make a proposition to my hon. and learned Friend who is to wind up the debate. If he can tell me that my constituent, with less than £25 a week on which to live, will be exempt from the charges, I shall abandon my intention to vote against the Government and I shall join my hon. and learned Friend in the Lobby in support of the measure. However, I must tell him that the advice that I have received from the Secretary of State's private office, as well as from my local DHSS office, is that my constituent would not qualify, because he does not qualify for income support. On that basis, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that I shall oppose these objectionable and damaging measures not only on behalf of my constituent, but on behalf of thousands like him in constituencies throughout the country. It is no use brandishing averages, because we know how many are so high above the average, and it behoves us to pay attention also to those who are so far below the average and who are not caught by any safety net.

It gives me no pleasure whatever to vote against the Government, but I must say to my right hon. Friends that the Government are wrong in this matter, and they have lost the argument. They deserve to be defeated.

8.30 pm

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): After nearly three hours of debate, many arguments have been ranged for and against the amendment and many points have been made many times. Very little new can be said either for or against the amendment. However, I believe that the Lords amendment should be rejected, because the Government's proposals are constructive and will eventually filter through to an improvement in the National Health Service generally.

The crux of the issue is whether it is morally right or wrong to pay for a check-up of any kind. The distinction between breast and cervical cancer tests and dental and optical check-ups is that the former are generally done at a hospital or by a general practitioner, but the optical and dental check-ups are done in semi-autonomous establishments on the fringe of the National Health Service. As we know, the optical testing side of the Health Service has been freed into a more competitive environment and that has filtered through to a more competitive product being provided. If the Lords amendment is rejected and the charges are allowed, we will see some competitiveness introduced into the market and eventually we will find that optical tests will cost very little and, perhaps, a good deal less than the £10 proposed.

Over the years the National Health Service has changed and people's perception of it has changed. When it was created in 1948, no one had any disposable income, and the National Health Service did not do a great deal more that repair broken bones and remove tonsils—[HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish."]—in the early 1950s. Of course, it did a great deal more than that, but it was nowhere near as sophisticated as it is today, and the demands for treatment become ever higher as new expertise and techniques are developed which are ever more costly. Because of that, we must consider new ways of providing funding for the Health Service.

Our people have more disposable income and they are entitled to choose how they spend it. I do not believe that, because the majority of the population will be charged £3·15 for a dental check-up, they will not take the time or trouble to have that check-up. On the contrary, we have had well-documented evidence that as a result of some of the dental costs that have been passed on to the consumer more people are having dental treatment. Whether the connection is that, because one is paying for something, a value can be placed upon it, is open to conjecture. I believe that if a value is put on something, people are more likely to value the service that they receive.

It is encouraging that 40 per cent. of the population will not have to pay anything for their dental check-ups and 37 per cent. will not pay for optical tests. However, there are people who will be on the borderline. There will be areas that we will need to look at closely so that people are not disadvantaged in the way that my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) mentioned.

Some people feel that the NHS should be free at the point of use. Of course, NHS treatment is not free at the point of use to the extent that we might like, as some charges were introduced in 1976, and prescription charges have been with us on and off for some time. The emotive issue of treatment being free at the point of delivery is misplaced. I suppose that it could be said indirectly that if one is a BUPA subscriber, one's service is free in that one pays insurance and BUPA pays for one's treatment after it has been received. However, we do not describe BUPA as free at the point of service. The National Health Service treatment is not free, because we pay into a national insurance scheme, and we have paid heavily for it over the years.

I do not believe that it is correct for the Labour party to lecture us on treatment charges when, of course, in 1976 it was involved in implementing many charges. The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) had the temerity to suggest that if we had a secret ballot everything would be greatly different. The Labour Government never had a secret ballot when they were in office in 1979 and decided to put up prescription rates. They never had a secret ballot when they decided to cut the hospital building programme. They certainly did not have a secret ballot when they decided whether to cut pensions and so forth.

Mr. Robin Cook: The reason why the 1974 to 1979 Government did not hold secret ballots was that those of us who disagreed with them did not require a secret ballot in order to express our view. We had the courage to do so and did so regularly.

Mr. King: The evidence tonight shows that neither do we. We do not need a secret ballot to express our view. To suggest that we should have a secret ballot on this one issue when the evidence is that when Labour was last in office it was making unpalatable decisions and did not have a secret ballot is unfair.

Our Health Service will obviously become more complex as years go by. I believe that it is right to establish as a principle—as we have already done—that some contribution by the user where he can afford it is the way that it should develop. Wage rates have gone up by 9 per cent. in the last 12 months. If we add to that the tax cuts that were passed on to the population, we see that real disposable income is a great deal more because of the Government's economic policies.

I believe that what we are asking for is not unreasonable or unrealistic. The financial resources that will be released because of the extra income that will come into the Service will be of benefit to the Service generally. Because of the new money that will go a long way to improving the Service, together with what was announced in the Autumn Statement, the Government's proposal has my support.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): First, we should establish that the National Health Service brought in by the first post-war Labour Government made a dramatic change in the health care of the nation. I believe that every intrusion that is made by the Government in introducing charges for this, that and the other erodes day by day the National Health Service that was created in the early post-war years. I know that there will be hot denials from those on the Government Front Bench if I suggest that behind those charges and the Government's geneal attitude towards the Health Service there is a blatant ideological attitude that intends in time to dismantle what we know as the Health Service of this country.

People outside will not allow the Government to take away the great benefits that have flowed from the National Health Service. Shortly after the war people were given the opportunity to have access to free health care for the first time. Many were elderly people without teeth and who needed spectacles which they did not have. The National Health Service changed the whole nature of health care in this country. The first generation of post-war babies proved the value of the Health Service beyond any doubt.

Many of the comments made tonight by Conservative Members make it absolutely clear that this is not simply a question of charging for dental or optical testing. It is part of the continuing attack on the Health Service by those Conservative Members who want to see the end of the Health Service and who want to see it in the hands of the market because of the profits that can be made. They want only those who can afford health care to have health care. That was exactly the position before the founding of the Health Service.

[Mr. Eddie Loyden]

Having grown up in a working-class area of Liverpool, I can tell the House of the many children who died in those cobbled streets because there was no Health Service. The child mortality rate in Liverpool was one of the highest in the country. Many of the afflictions suffered by working-class families were due to inadequate medical care, and, in some cases, to inadequate housing. Those afflictions led to the creation of the National Health Service.

It is a scandal that, having seen the benefits of the National Health Service, the Government make continuing attacks on it both in the House and outside. That is especially true of some of the Government's Back-Bench Members. Indeed, when listening to one Conservative Member, I wondered whether he was talking about Sainsburys or about the Health Service because he referred to "a better product". Where are we going when the Government's Back Benchers seek to bring the Health Service into the market? It is an absolute disgrace that hon. Members should talk about the Health Service in that way.

I happen to be one of those 250,000 people who have benefited from an eye test——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Does the hon. Gentleman see the difficulty of the Chair? The debate has tended to go wider and wider in scope until it is now in danger of becoming a general debate on the Health Service. This debate is about dental charges. A later amendment deals specifically with optical charges. I understand that the hon. Gentleman wishes to speak to that. Therefore, I hope that he will not encroach too much on the subject of that amendment.

Mr. Loyden: With all due respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, all aspects of testing have been spoken about tonight, including cervical cancer and oral testing.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Loyden.

Mr. Loyden: I hope to illustrate the importance of those tests which at least some Conservative Members recognise.

8.45 pm

I happen to be one of the 250,000 people who, through an eye test, have been detected as having glaucoma. As most people know, glaucoma can——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not want to prevent the hon. Gentleman from making his speech, but I question whether this is the appropriate time.

Mr. Loyden rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will save his remarks about optical problems and optical tests until we reach that specific amendment.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Loyden.

Mr. Loyden: I remind you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that every test has been mentioned tonight but no objections have been raised from either the Chair or anywhere else. It is important to illustrate the benefits of testing because that is what we are really talking about. Charges are a deterrent to testing and one of the great elements in preventive medicine is under threat. That, together with the threat to the Health Service, is the most important issue facing us tonight.

All hon. Members, whether speaking in favour of or against the Government's proposals, have pointed out that the Health Service has been moving far too slowly towards preventive medicine although it is moving in that direction. The screenings that take place are a sign of a healthier nation. Therefore, one of the greatest threats to the Health Service is the further erosion of testing that charges will cause. That applies not only to eyesight testing but to dental testing. There is an abundance of evidence to prove conclusively that oral testing can disclose illnesses that could result in either chronic illness or death that would otherwise not be detected.

It is a scandal that we should be debating such proposals in the House 40 years after the Health Service was created by a Labour Government. It is a scandal that we are debating further inroads into and erosions of a service that was once the envy of the world.

All those people who have the interests of the Health Service at heart, who want to see it move towards preventive rather than curative medicine and who want to move away from a drug-oriented Health Service that props up the companies that make billions of pounds of profits from supplying the drugs, believe that tonight's attacks on the Health Service eat into the Health Service and mean that we now have a Health Service inferior to that which we had in the past.

Mr. Key: The amendment is not just about specific health charges; it is not just about money or about the preservation of a particular legitimate vested interest; it is about something much wider and much more fundamental. It is about the best way of improving and maintaining the dental health of the nation.

Economists would tell us that we are into the hoary old chestnut of externalities—in other words, if I as an individual start using lead-free petrol, it does not make much difference to the state of the environment, but if everyone could be persuaded to use it, it would make a great deal of difference. That sort of argument can be applied to the problem facing us tonight.

The argument is about how we can persuade people to react to certain circumstances. Whichever way each of us votes tonight on this issue, I believe that we all want improved dental care for the whole nation. The question is, how do we achieve that? Do we best achieve it by mass state provision which is free at the point of consumption or by unbridled market forces? I shall seek to demonstrate that neither is the complete answer.

The little evidence that there is, as opposed to opinion or judgment—it is striking that, however strongly one feels on either side of the argument, there are only opinions and judgments and one cannot say that the argument is either black or white—shows clearly that the present system of free check-ups has been a failure. About 50 per cent. of people fail to take up the current free service. We are told that there are a number of reasons for that: for example, people may think that they do not need to go to a dentist until they are in trouble; some people have a blind fear of the dentist and some people have difficulty in finding a dentist who is conveniently close to their work. However, the cost of the treatment was ranked bottom among people's reasons for not going to the dentist.

The answer to all those failures must be better education. What have the Government done about that? Well, in 1981 the Government introduced a policy document entitled "Care in Action" in which they recognised the role of education and stated:

"Too many endanger their health through ignorance or social pressures. Public action can give people the information they need to make sensible decisions about personal health, and encourage in the community a reasonable attitude towards the main area for prevention".

When the Health Education Authority was set up, the then Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Fowler), stated:

"As a special health authority, the new authority will be an integral part of the National Health Service in England. As a result, it should be more responsive than an outside body can be to the needs of the Service, and in turn will have more influence in setting priorities for the Service and ensuring that the needs of health education and promotion are properly recognised."

That was a most important statement of intent. It is evident that, whatever the deterrent effects of charges, there is only unexpected evidence, as opposed to opinion. In 1976, the Labour Government raised dental charges by 36 per cent. and the number of procedures carried out by dentists rose. Even the evidence presented to hon. Members by the British Dental Association appeared to contradict that case.

The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) had some fun at my expense about this, but it is important to consider the document that we have all been sent by the BDA. I have read it carefully and looked at the tables of statistics. It is a profoundly unconvincing case. If ever there were a case of lies, damn lies and statistics, it must be in this document. It is the most selective use of statistics that I can imagine. That is fair enough because the BDA is a legitimate vested interest. I do not therefore decry the case that it seeks to make, but nothing in life is free and the goods and service which are free at the point of consumption are, in general, valued least in society, whether junk mail or tap water. If dental care is free at the point of consumption, people seem prepared to put up with broken appointments, long waits in dingy waiting rooms, out-of-date magazines and rude receptionists. In short, we are very British and do not complain about the poor service.

On the other hand, if we are allocating our own cash, we expect service and standards. That is also in the national interest. We all benefit from the better use of resources. The evidence that we want better standards is there and we are already paying for better standards. Let us consider first the increase in the number of dental hygienists in most of our dental practices. Of course, there are the usual exemptions, but we pay for the benefit of those paradentists, who are a very good thing.

Secondly, may I draw the attention of the House to the problem of AIDS and dentists. That problem will grow significantly. My dental practice—I checked up this morning—is spending well over £1,000 on disposable gloves as a direct result of the AIDS problem, £500 a year on disposable bibs instead of the usual rubber bibs and £500 a year extra on surface anaesthetics instead of needles. At present, dentists have to wait over a year for reimbursement from the state because the state is bad at allocating resources. Standards in practices would rise if dentists had an acceptable cash flow. That would be one of the effects of introducing those charges. I would happily pay up if I could see the standard of service go up. Both professional services and the quality of environment of dental surgeries would improve.

For five years, as a Member of this House, and for many years before that, I argued to the electorate that the purpose of cutting taxes and reducing Government involvement is not to give us an easy life, but to encourage us to take a more responsible attitude. That is a high moral argument and the care of ourselves, our families and our children should be a first charge on our income. If I can allocate those resources, rather than the inefficient state, it is not only in my interests, but in everyone else's interests too.

I cannot support the Lords amendment. I shall vote against it tonight. I have no intention of ratting on my Conservative principles which I have put to the electorate in election after election. I do not have a monopoly of virtue, nor do I believe that anybody else has in this important debate. However, we are harangued and preached at because of the success of the economy. We are told about record levels of personal debt, conspicuous consumption, imported electronic goods and about calls for deregulation of Sunday trading, the £8 a week per household spent on alchohol, the £4 per week per household spent on tobacco, booming sales of sweets and confectionery for children, but what price optical and dental health?

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): I did not intend to speak in this debate and I do not intend to detain the House long because other hon. Members wish to speak. However, I want to illustrate the difference in the speeches of the hon. Members for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples), for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) and for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King). The hon. Member for Davyhulme put the case against the Government, but his two hon. Friends spoke in favour of the Government. They and other hon. Members who support the Government are duty bound to put the case for supporting the Government on dental tests and eye tests, and for charging for other tests. They cannot simply say, "We think this is a good idea. People ought to pay for these tests. They should not be free" and then remain silent about all the other tests, for example, cervical smear tests and breast cancer screening. They cannot remain silent about those matters and put the case for the Government.

It is all very well for the hon. Member for Northfield to say, "We freed up the market with regard to dental and eye tests, but we haven't freed up other tests yet." The implication is that, when they have freed up the means of checking for breast and cervical cancer, they will charge for those tests, although the hon. Gentleman could not quite bring himself to say that.

Every Conservative Member of Parliament who is prepared to support charging for preventive tests, leaving aside the charges for treatment and all the other red herrings that have been mentioned tonight, must follow the logic of their argument. We know what is happening. The House and the country are being softened up. When those charges have been introduced, it will be that much easier for other Ministers to say, "It's unfair for all those other tests to be taking place. Now people have to pay for dental tests and eye tests."

Mr. Key: The hon. Gentleman is a fair-minded debater. I could argue the case that we would not have been allowed by the Chair to digress into the matters that he is raising. However, we should all be prepared to argue about the future funding of the National Health Service. One of the failures of the House and of this nation is that we have not been prepared to debate such difficult issues as the crisis facing the Health Service has become steadily worse.

Mr. Rooker: I am prepared to say, without stepping out of order, that I am not in favour of charging for preventive medicine. It does not matter whether it is eye tests, dental check-ups or any of the other tests associated with preventive medicine. If we go back a few years, I do not think that any hon. Member would have contemplated charging when the mass radiography units were going round the country. That is not so frequent today because there are other safer ways of checking on the problems of lung cancer.

Many millions of people are receiving preventive medicine free at the point of use, but against their will. That is because their water has fluoride in it. I have always supported fluoridation. I am prepared to accept that form of mass preventive medicine on its merits but not in principle. There are many, however, who do not want that mass medication, preventive though it might be.

The free marketeers on the Government Benches would argue that the public should pay for that treatment because it will prevent problems from occurring later. That is the logic of certain Conservative Members. I accept the honesty of the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), because it is clear that he would support charges for cervical smears and other tests.

These issues must be faced fair and square. Most of the major diseases that caused generations to suffer were almost eliminated before the medical profession discovered what they were and what the treatment should be. I remember attending a lecture at the community medicine department of Guy's hospital many years ago. Slides were projected that showed graphs illustrating the numbers of people who were not dying as a result of contracting various diseases. We were then told when a cure had been found. It was clear that the fall in the line on the graphs did not depend on treatment. Instead, there was a direct relationship to public health policy that embraced community medicine and good hygiene. That is a factor that must be taken on board.

With advances in science it may be that other tests will be invented for some of the diseases that are prevalent now and for others that we may not even know about. A test for AIDS is an example that I use in passing, for five years ago we might not have known anything about the disease. There will be tests invented to prevent people of whatever age falling foul of certain illnesses or diseases, and we know that those tests will save money.

There are those who contract certain illnesses or diseases because we have not developed tests that will tell us when they are in the early stages of contracting them. If the relevant tests were invented, they would definitely save money. They would be cost effective. Is it being argued that although new tests will save money we should introduce charges for them? Surely that would be contrary to public health policy and our attitude to it for the past 100 years or more.

The Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), is right to think that people are still ignorant about their own bodies. From time to time the hon. Lady tells the country the truth. Whenever she does so there is a reaction, but that is because of the way in which she puts her message across. The hon. Lady, in her own way, is attempting to educate. She is intent on educating the people en masse so that they can take better care of their bodies. She knows that most people are ignorant about their bodies in detail, especially when it comes to what they do to their bodies and the illness that will ensue 10 or 20 years later. The hon. Lady is engaging in a process of education.

An element of preventive medicine is to enable the public, without any barriers of mystique, to subject themselves to checks. If only small barriers are erected that does not matter. In effect, the money does not matter. Conservative Members talk about 60 per cent. exemptions, but if there were no problem about money we would not have arguments about two out of every three who are eligible for family credit not receiving it. There is ignorance of the system and ignorance of what is available. The same applies to charges for checks and to those who would be frightened of taking advantage of them. Unless Ministers are prepared to argue that they will consider later the cost effectiveness of other checks, their words are not worth the candle. I do not care what the costs are, because costs do not really matter. If the proposed costs are halved, some people will still be prevented from taking advantage of them.

We know that some people, either through illogicality or ignorance, will be prevented from going for checks. That is not good enough. That is contrary to everything that has happened in the development of public health policy over the past century. It would be a bad day for the Government and the House if we were to let that happen.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (Norfolk, South-West): I shall be very brief because most of the arguments that it is possible to deploy on this subject have been thoroughly rehearsed tonight, if not in earlier debates. However, I want to make two points, the first of which relates to the principle of charging for dental check-ups. No one can dispute the fact that the power to make appropriate charges for health services was built into the National Health Service Act 1946 from the very beginning. No one has tried to dispute the fact that Governments of all political persuasions have taken the chance to make charges when they wished during the 40-year history of the NHS.

My experience may be unique, but I have rarely had a free dental check-up. My dental check-ups always seem to be accompanied by an X-ray, cleaning or scaling for which I have to pay. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) who said that the boundaries between treatment and examination in that area of the Health Service are very blurred. Most people who attend a dental surgery expect to be charged either for something following from the check-up such as an X-ray or cleaning or for a course of prescribed treatment. I have no difficulty with the principle of charging for dental check-ups.

Not much has been made of my second point. Check-up charges are part of a total package for primary health care contained in the Bill. The package is designed to produce improvements worth £600 millon over the next three years for the primary health care network. As I represent a rural constituency in which primary health care is of the utmost importance, I welcome the improvements and I shall have no difficulty in supporting the Government in support of the charges as part of that package of overall improvements.

Mr. Carttiss: As has already been said, all the arguments have been advanced. When my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House was asked whether the Government would change their mind after the amendments were passed by the Lords, he said in April or June that he had heard no new arguments that would change the Government's view.

I have heard no new arguments to cause me to change my view that the Government have made a mistake. I recognise that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Government Front Bench and my colleagues on the Back Benches have put forward some very persuasive arguments, and I understand what they have said. That is a matter of judgment. I would be very surprised if someone was deterred from having a dental check-up if the charge was £3. We are not talking about eye tests or a higher charge of £10 which would be a different deterrent.

Conservative Members have concentrated their attention on wealthy people whom it is alleged do not need free check-ups. No matter how wide ranging are the Government's exemptions, there will still be people, as we all know, who are just above that level and for whom a charge will make a difference. Of that there can be no doubt. If it does not make any difference, why do the Government continue to subsidise the wealthy middle class who want to attend opera and the Royal Shakespeare Company performances? My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) is always on about that. Let us get the facts right.

Why is it such a dreadful thing to say to people who can afford to go somewhere else that they cannot have that one test free in the interests of preserving the principle of having an initial free check?

We have heard a lot about prescription charges. Every time anyone mentions the charges for the two tests we are told that we do not oppose charges for prescriptions. If I had been a Member when the Labour Government introduced prescription charges, I might have done so. What I do know is that once the principle—it may well have been right—was conceded, they were appropriate, indeed unavoidable, given the vast range of services that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) identified as showing that we have a much more comprehensive Health Service now than when it was formed. The arguments for that might be clear, but the fact remains that prescription charges keep going up and there is no doubt that these charges will go up. There is no way that in three years' time we will be talking about £10 for eye tests or £3 for dental check-ups.

I oppose the principle of charging for doctors' visits and all the rest, which has been debated thoroughly. Hon. Members have been nodding their heads. My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) went like this when the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) asked whether he would approve of charging for cervical smears. Many Conservative Members will put their hands up if they are told to do so by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Whip, who has just walked in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that hon. Members will remember that Hansard cannot interpret hand signs.

Mr. Carttiss: The case is being advanced that there is no deterrent in these charges. Indeed, we have heard some interesting and persuasive points of view. It has been said that if we charge for something everybody will want to have it. That may well be true; I do not know. But this is a fundamental principle.

I am not sure whether the Government know the costs involved in introducing these charges. They say little. For example, we are told that charges are no deterrent. We are told that after a time patients will come back.

In Great Yarmouth dentists who are capable of operating on impacted wisdom teeth are referring their patients to the local hospital to have the operation there, not on medical or clinical grounds, but on social grounds because their patients are just above the exemption limit; they would have to pay the dentist but can be treated free in hospital.

There are many more such cases. If one talks to people who visit hospitals regularly, as I do, they tell of people being redirected. That is what will happen. People will go to their general practitioner complaining of a headache. Once he would have sent them to the optician, but now he will send them to the eye clinic in the local hospital. Make no mistake about it. Of course, that will not apply to everybody.

I seriously question how much of the £50 million that it is alleged will be redirected will be saved when the time comes. I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State and his colleagues in the Department of Health, and, indeed, my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, on having agreed the significant increase of £1·25 billion for the Health Service. I was asked to listen to the Autumn Statement. Having done so, I am reinforced in my view that we should not be introducing these charges.

When my right hon. and learned Friend opened the debate he observed that the Autumn Statement had certain elements in it and he asked whether we all understood it. I have examined it, and I find that when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer stands at the Dispatch Box next March to present his Budget he will have a surplus of about £10 billion to £15 billion that he can use in various directions, including reduced taxation. He could also use it to continue providing what I happen to believe—although I recognise the alternative arguments—is a fundamental principle, a free service of dental and eye inspection.

9.15 pm

Opposition Members made the point that one can go to a GP and say, "I have something wrong with my foot, doctor," and that he will examine it without charging £3. One might say to him, "I have something wrong with my arm—have a look at it." He might reply, "There is nothing wrong with it. It is all in your head." Why should those services be free while others are subject to a charge? Right hon. and hon. Members have asked that question several times today. It was asked in the debate on Report, but still no answer has been given. We shall not be given an answer because many of my right hon. and hon. Friends consider, for sound reasons, that there ought to be more Health

[Mr. Carttiss]

Service charges. I respect their view, but I still oppose it, and tell them that I hope very much that this is the last we shall hear of their proposal.

Conscious as I am of the passage of time, I shall conclude by quoting Bruce Anderson writing in The Sunday Telegraph:

> "There is no justification for Tory Members whining and griping every time they have to explain an unpopular decision in their constituencies."

That is not what it is all about. I had to explain to my constituents why it was that on Monday, and again on Thursday, I voted to pour more money down the EC drain on their behalf—much more money than is in question here. I also had to explain with enthusiasm to my constituents why the British Government allowed the American Air Force to use air bases in East Anglia from which to launch their bombing attack on Libya. I had to explain that to 70 constituents who were in Libya, working for the oil industry there. Worse still, I had to explain it to their wives, who were worried about them—but I had no difficulty doing so.

Great Yarmouth is not just my constituency. It is my home. It is my parents' home and the home of my grandparents and of their parents. I have to face my constituents not to explain unpopular decisions but to explain in terms that I can support and believe why I vote in the way that I do in Divisions. I can explain to my constituents why the Government are introducing this measure. I can understand the argument that has been advanced that the £50 million involved can be more effectively directed elsewhere.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State commented on radio last night on whether those of his colleagues who oppose the Government wish to have on their consciences the loss of £50 million that could be spent in other areas. I do not want to have on my conscience the two people of whom my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) does not think too much because their dentist had discovered only two oral cancers. It is a case not of whingeing and whining but of being extremely proud of a Government who have done more for the Health Service than any other.

I strongly object to having to march into the Lobby with Opposition Members because on this occasion they happen to be right and the Government wrong. I trust that even at this late stage the Government will join me. I am not against the Government; I am voting for the Lords amendment and for the people who sent me here, and I hope that the Government will do so as well.

Mr. Peter Griffiths: The response by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State to my modest intervention during his opening speech was profoundly disappointing and disturbing. It was disappointing because it compounded what I thought at first was a modest error: when he listed the possible uses for the sum that could be saved by charging for dental checks, he did not mention any that had any relation to dentistry, and I now ask him to remedy that.

I found my right hon. and learned Friend's response offhand in the extreme. It was clearly intended to suggest that he agreed with my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King), who said earlier this evening that the optical and dental services were on the fringe of the NHS. That is certainly not true of dental charges. For many people the regular visit to the dentist is their most common meeting with the NHS. I visit my dentist every six months; I do not visit my doctor that often. Throughout human history until the last century, inadequate dental health was one of the greatest causes of physical misery, and I consider the dental service one of the most important parts of the Health Service. My right hon. and learned Friend missed a great opportunity in brushing aside the suggestion that funds raised by imposing charges on dental inspections should be used at least in part to improve dental services.

I am particularly concerned about this because it contradicts comments made during the Bill's Committee stage by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he was Minister for Health. He said then that more than £50 million would be spent on improved primary health care, and that, while not all of it would be spent on dental services, they would be a priority. The impression given today was that they would not.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) said that he could accept the imposition of charges for dental inspections if he then saw a new orthodontic hospital in Northampton. If we could see real developments in certain areas of dental provision, we might be able to argue that that was an improvement. Surely few people would argue that, if we were starting from scratch and had £50 million to spend on the dental part of the NHS, we should use it to provide free dental inspections for those who can afford to pay. But what worries me is that we have no indication that the Government intend to use the funds that they are raising —or at least a major part of them—to improve dental care.

My right hon. and learned Friend said that he felt that during the past few weeks the number of people expressing opposition to the measure had increased. I well understand why people may have begun to wonder when they find that the Government have apparently shifted their ground since the Committee stage. I am seeking a direct and specific assurance from the Minister that primary dental care will benefit from the change in the direction of funds brought about by the introduction of charges. I consider that that is the crux of the matter. That is what I wish to hear.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Hon. Members have spoken about the many well-worn arguments that we have had tonight. Those arguments did not start tonight; they go back to last December when the Standing Committee of which I was a member first started discussing these clauses. Since last December, the Government have made available £3 billion of extra public money to the National Health Service. Therefore, I find it just a little extraordinary that Opposition Members should be so concerned about these matters, yet fail abysmally to applaud the huge extra sums of money that have been made available during the past year.

I find it extremely difficult to understand how they can suggest that many problems will arise from the charges. I do not consider that there is any fundamental difference between charging for treatment and charging for the tests that we are discussing tonight. In that respect I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young).

Opposition Members have produced statistics that suggest that a £3·15 charge for a check up will deter people from going to the dentist. I do not believe that will be the case. It is not proven, and, judging from the arguments used tonight, it is most unlikely to occur.

It is much more likely that as a result of our debate tonight we shall well end up with a better dental service. It will not be the case that, simply because people have to pay £3·15 for a dental check-up, if they can afford it, that will affect whether they go to the dentist. However, the charge may affect the dental service that is provided. I am absolutely convinced that, although quite clearly not all the extra money will be spent on dental check-ups, some of it at least will help that cause. I strongly believe that we need to monitor exactly what occurs if the charges are introduced. We need to find out whether there is a decrease in the take-up rate of dental check-ups. I believe that the charges will make very little difference.

There is a more fundamental reason for rejecting the amendment. Ever since the foundation of the NHS, it has been short of funds for one reason or another—latterly much less so. The expanding need for health care in this country means that we have to make an increasing individual contribution to the Health Service. One of the main purposes of the charges is that they will allow people who can afford it to contribute to their own health. That must be a step in the right direction and must result in more resources being released for more important and more fundamental health care. Therefore, I shall support the Government tonight and I ask my hon. Friends to reject the amendment.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): I hesitate to take part in the debate because the only time that one of my speeches in the House was reported around the world was when, in mid-flow, the crown expertly fitted to my front tooth by the National Health Service fell on to the Bench beside me. I hope that I shall be more successful this evening. [HON. MEMBERS: "Keep your mouth shut then."] I owe it to my constituents to say a few words. I do not doubt the Opposition's sincerity, but they have not examined needs and priorities accurately—the same needs and priorities that every Government have had to tackle. Perhaps I may quote the Chancellor of the Exchequer who said:

> "It is clear that it is not possible in existing circumstances to permit any overall increase in the expenditure on the Health Services. Any expansion in one part of the service must in future be met by economies or, if necessary, by contraction in others. In exercising this essential control over total expenditure, regard will of course be had to priorities."—[Official Report, 18 April 1950; Vol. 474, c. 59.]

That was what a Labour Chancellor, Sir Stafford Cripps, said. He was trying to grapple with the difficult problem of balancing needs and resources. A Minister of Health said:

> "I am afraid it is necessary this afternoon—we need more money than my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer could see his way to provide. The measure we have taken to get that money has been described in some quarters as an attack on the Health Service or as the first step in dismantling the Service. I am tempted to voice the indignation I felt when I read those words, but I will refrain. Instead, I hope that my hon. Friends will reflect on what I have said this afternoon about the intentions and plans of myself and of my right hon. Friend to expand and develop the hospital and general practitioner service".—[Official Report, 24 April 1951; Vol. 486, c. 235.]

That was said by Mr. Marquand, a Labour Minister of Health, when imposing charges on 24 April 1951. Already in the history of the National Health Service, Governments have had to make choices. We recognise that if we are to protect people who can least afford to pay, we must ask those who can afford to pay a modest amount to make some contribution.

9.30 pm

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Leigh: No. I am trying to draw to a close.

The only alternative to asking people who can afford to pay to make a modest contribution is the philosophy of the queue. We all remember the words of the grandfather of my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill), who reminded us that the Socialist way is the way of the queue. Ours is the way of the ladder. When people fall out of the queue, Socialists will employ officials to put them back in the queue. We give people a ladder, and if people fall off the ladder we provide the best ambulance service in the world.

Even Socialist Governments have recognised that the queue eventually becomes intolerable. I have another interesting quotation which runs:

> "the ideal of a free service lasted in fact barely three years from its inception—charges of some kind have been in operation ever since 1951 . . . I have made my view known widely, over a long period, that ideally the National Health Service should be free to everyone at the time of need, and it is not at all difficult to find telling quotations from past speeches of mine over the years."—[Official Report, 30 May 1968; Vol. 765, c. 2255.]

That was said by Mr. Kenneth Robinson when imposing prescription charges on behalf of the Labour Government in 1968.

Even Labour Governments have had to impose charges to avoid the philosophy of the queue. I do not doubt the sincerity of Opposition Members but, like most sincere people, their sincerity is small part self-deception and large part humbug and hypocrisy. One has only to examine the record of Labour Governments to realise that.

The argument that charges should not be imposed is false. Successive Governments have realised that they must be imposed. We must therefore ask whether it is necessary to impose these charges.

We know that some 20 million people—those who are least able to pay—will be exempted from the charges. We have dealt with the deterrent argument and heard that between 1976 and 1986 the number of people who received dental treatment increased by 7 million. We have heard also that people on the borderline of income support might be deterred from taking dental treatment. If that argument is true, is it not an argument against more charges? [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes."] There is the voice of the part of the Labour party which opposes all charges. If those hon. Members are honest, and lay aside self-deception, hypocrisy and humbug, they will realise that a Labour Government would have to impose such charges. I shall vote against Lords amendment No. 20.

My final point might give some comfort to Opposition Members. The points made by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) were worth while. The time may come when the Government have to grasp the nettle of charges on other services. I do not say that such charges are desirable or necessary. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State gave the sincere and honest answer that in his view they were not yet necessary. The time may come when, if the NHS is not to absorb an increasing proportion of GNP and we are to continue to provide services to those in need, we have to consider charges on other services. I do not for a moment think that that necessarily proves that these charges are wrong. They are a necessary fact of life which we must accept. I am sure that, for that reason, Ministers will get a majority for their motion.

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): The House will welcome the extra £1·6 billion which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has announced today for the National Health Service in England and Wales. I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health on his considerable personal achievement in this respect, but we cannot continue indefinitely to find these extra massive resources for the NHS without a clear policy and direction for the future of health services. I hope that that will be the outcome of the review which my right hon. and learned Friend has inherited. It is therefore all the more regrettable that, on the same day that the Government have demonstrated, once again, that they are generating new resources for the NHS and much else, they find that they must also proceed to reinstate charges for dental treatments. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has reminded us, the Health and Medicines Bill is based on the 1986 Green Paper, "Primary Health Care", which contained a range of measures to promote good health and preventive care. Those measures will cost money to implement in the short term in order to save money in the long term through better health.

Two years ago, I consulted widely in my constituency with all the doctors, dentists and chemists about those proposals. The general reaction was positive—they welcomed them. Before us today is a new charge for dental examinations which was not proposed in the Green Paper, and therefore was not the subject of that consultation. It is obvious that, if it had been, the message would be what we are receiving now from the professions, that such a charge will serve to negate some aims that the Bill is designed to achieve and will be self-defeating, both financially and for the health of the patient.

I oppose the introduction of a dental examination charge for three reasons. First, it abandons the principle that the National Health Service should not charge patients for advice. Although I believe that we should be doing much more to encourage people to cover privately for their health needs, out of choice, the fundamental principle of a state-run service must be to enable people to seek medical advice regardless of means and without charge.

Secondly, once that principle has been broken, it becomes easier to introduce the charge elsewhere—for advice from the doctor, for screening and for smears. We have heard of a number of services where such a charge could be introduced. Once the principle has been broken, it also becomes easier to increase the charge. If the Bill is passed, this year we shall introduce a charge of £3·50 for a dental check. Next year, it will undoubtedly be at least £5, and it could escalate a the same rate as charges for dental treatment in recent years. That is not the right way to reform the financing of the NHS.

Thirdly, and contrary to what my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State said earlier today, I accept that there is much in what the dental profession is telling us, and has told my right hon. and learned Friend—that a dental examination charge, modest though that proposed is, will prove to be a disincentive to young adults, especially the 18 to 20-year-olds who will have to pay it. I accept that they are not as responsible as they should be and they will avoid going for a regular inspection. In the long run, that will prove more costly both to the National Health Service and to the patient. Treatment almost always follows the free examinations—treatment for which the patient pays. Examination charges for 18 to 20-year-olds will raise just £10 million and I do not believe that it is worth the candle.

I had expected my right hon. and learned Friend, by way of a concession, at least to exempt the elderly from the charges, but apart from those already specifically exempt he has not done so. In view of the early detection of oral cancers through routine dental examination, I believe that that is particularly harsh.

Had my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister said that the charges were a temporary measure to finance the preventive health care programme that he is about to launch—with, I hope, the wholesale introduction of fluoride in the drinking water—and that the charge would be lifted as soon as evidence showed that the programme was working and demand for treatment falling, I would have reconsidered my position. But my right hon. and learned Friend has not suggested that. The charge will be a permanent addition to the financing of the National Health Service and in my view will sabotage what this otherwise admirable Bill is designed to achieve. The abandonment of the principle of free examination under the National Health Service is not something that I can support today.

Mr. Meller: The essential background to this wide-ranging and well-informed debate is that in the past 10 years provision for our dental services has been greatly increased, leading to better dental health among the population as a whole. There has been a marked increase in take-up of dental treatment throughout the country against a background of markedly increased charges for the treatment provided. That is the essential factual background against which all who are still considering how to cast their vote should begin their consideration.

Provision has been dramatically increased in the past 10 years. In 1978-79 the cost of dental services was £279 million. In 1987-88 it was £820 million—an increase of 43 per cent. in real terms. Even allowing for the impact of the contribution paid by the public in charges, that still represents an increase direct from the Government of 26 per cent. in real terms. That has led to better dental health. In 1973, 29 per cent. of five-year-olds in England and Wales were free of dental decay. By 1983 the figure had risen by more than half to 52 per cent. In 1968, the percentage of adults with no natural teeth was 37 per cent. In 1985 it was 22 per cent.

The percentage of adults attending the dentist regularly has risen from 40 per cent. in 1968 to 50 per cent. in 1985. As my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) reminded us, however, even though 50 per cent. attendance is better than the 40 per cent. of 20 years ago, it still means that 50 per cent. do not go to the dentist regularly. That is an issue to which we should be devoting a great deal of attention.

There has also been increased take-up of the services that dentists have to offer. In 1979, the number of courses of treatment in the United Kingdom was around 31 million. By 1986-87, only seven years later, there were 37 million courses of treatment. My right hon. and learned Friend has already reminded the House that especially noteworthy among that increase in treatment was the number of pensioners having their teeth checked—in most cases in the clear knowledge that it would lead to a course of treatment for which 80 per cent. of them would have to pay. Indeed, the increase in the number of pensioners having dental treatment during that period was 92 per cent.

9.45 pm

Mr. Hayes: I am not in any way challenging my hon. and learned Friend, but something that he said a moment ago might have inadvertently misled one or two of my hon. Friends. Is it true that pensioners will not receive any exemption unless they are on income support?

Mr. Mellor: Yes, that is right. We estimate that of the 6·9 million people who will be exempted by virtue of receipt of income support, 2·5 million will be pensioners.

It is interesting that the take-up of treatment has risen sharply, notwithstanding the background of increased charges for treatment that have been significant during the past 10 years. It is also interesting to hear the Opposition's ritual denunciation of charges. However, we know that back in 1976 they put up charges for dental treatment by 35 per cent. and again in 1977 by 27 per cent.

In case the House is troubled by the Opposition's attitude, I must point out that they did not fuss about the odd three quid back in 1977 when they put up charges for plastic dentures from £12 to £20 and for metal dentures from £12 to £30. The minimum charge for treatment rose from £12 to £30 at a stroke, an increase of 150 per cent. We do not really need too many denunciations from the Opposition.

It is fair to say that in the increasingly prosperous society that has been created in Britain during the 1980s, the Government have also put up dental charges so that from a total of 20 per cent. of the cost of the dental service coming from patient contributions in 1980 the figure has risen steadily over the years to a current total of 32 per cent. That increase in patient contributions from 20 per cent. to 32 per cent. of the cost of an expanding service has happened while that service continued to expand and to treat increasing numbers of people—including an increasing number in the most vulnerable group, according to the definition applied by some of my hon. Friends. That is something that should be taken into account.

It is true that certain types of treatment have reduced in number, such as extractions and fillings, because they are not so necessary today. It is not because people are not taking up treatment, but because the general dental health of the population is improving. It is interesting to note that increased take-up has been more marked in some of the more expensive procedures—for example, crowns increased by 83 per cent. and bridges by 535 per cent. during the lifetime of the Government, yet those are among the most expensive treatments available up to the £150 maximum that we have already specified.

The provision that we are debating is a charge of £3·15 for a dental examination—75 per cent. of the actual payment made to the dentist. It fits in with the procedures introduced in April under which, instead of there being up to 100 per cent. charges—a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale—we fixed on 75 per cent. for all procedures up to a maximum of £150. That is not without significance because it means that even with these additional charges—if the House is minded to permit us to render them—more than 6 million of those who received 32 million courses of treatments last year would pay less than they did in April because of the adjustments. That is further evidence to convince anyone who needs persuading of the limited cost of the exercise to the patient.

Mr. Churchill: Can my hon. and learned Friend say whether the constituent whom I mentioned, who is single, self-employed and in his late 50s, without dependent children and in full-time employment, but earning only one quarter of average earnings, would qualify for free tests despite the fact that he is not on income support?

Mr. Mellor: If my hon. Friend's constituent is not on income support, I am afraid that he will not qualify unless he falls within the category of the nearly poor set out by my predecessor in the debate in April. With the greatest respect, hon. Members cannot expect Ministers to be able categorically to answer such questions at the Dispatch Box, although it is something that would be well worth checking.

One of the key questions that has arisen in the debate concerns what we are really trying to achieve in the dental service. It is quite clear what we are trying to achieve. We are trying to build on our unparalleled success—certainly since the 1970s—to ensure that when people visit dentists, they visit well-trained dentists capable of dealing with all their problems. Above all, we want more people to visit the dentist. We know that 50 per cent. do not. The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) drew entirely the wrong conclusions from the figures that he gave for teenagers who were not turning up for dental checks. It is interesting to note that people do not turn up for dental checks even though they are free. It shows that the problem is altogether more difficult than the question whether people will be deterred by the £3 charge. People put plenty of other reasons for not going to the dentist before cost. There are all the old fears about pain, and doubts about whether the dentist will be any good. One crunches one's way through all the unsuitable foods denounced so regularly by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State and one thinks that one's teeth are standing up to the strain all right and says to oneself, "Why bother to go to the dentist?"

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West) rose——

Mr. Mellor: Not for the moment.

That is why the focus of our attention is increasingly on prevention—on reaching out to people to find ways of persuading them to take better care of their teeth. That is why in this year alone we are spending £250,000 on an advertising campaign especially targeted on teenagers to try to persuade them to go for treatment.

Let me take up the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) about prevention campaigns. I wish I could have the attention of my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North, although I realise that it is difficult to hear against the background of the Opposition—[HON. MEMBERS: "Get on with it".] All the money—the £50 million that will no longer need to be paid out on dental examinations—will go back into the Health Service. I am not saying that every penny will go back into the dental service but there will be significantly expanded provision in dental services. My hon. Friend knows, from the figures that I have cited—an increase from under £300 million to over £800 million in eight years—I say that against the background of real achievement in the past—[Interruption.] One wonders where the Opposition get their facts when they ask about the expanded commitment. There are 22 per cent. more dentists in England and Wales than when the Labour Government left office 10 years ago. That is what we mean by expanded provision and a few jeers and caterwauls will not change that.

What do we seek to do to vindicate the commitment? We are looking to expand health education initiatives, to investigate means of improving the marketing of dental care and to increase the number of people who seek regular dental care. We shall be giving increased financial assistance towards the cost of establishing and equipping dental practices in those areas short of dentists. That should be of interest to Opposition Members who represent inner-city constituencies and who regularly say that they do not enjoy the level of provision available elsewhere in the country.

Mr. Battle rose——

Mr. Mellor: I shall just finish a point, and then I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman. We shall give more money to expand the number of places in the vocational training schemes designed to improve the skills of family dentists, and more money for postgraduate training courses and for a training allowance for attendance at approved courses, because these days not every dentist has to come from Australia.

Mr. Battle: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman explain to the House why not one of the professional bodies that deal with this matter agrees with the Government on this issue?

Mr. Mellor: It is called vested interest, and I thought that Opposition Members—[Interruption.]

Another point was very properly raised during the debate, which was the question of additional charges. I know that a number of hon. Members are concerned about this matter, and I say categorically that the Government have no plans to introduce further charges —[Laughter.] I should like to reiterate and quote from the words of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, when she was interviewed on the BBC nine o'clock news on 21 December 1987. She said:

> "We have in fact introduced one or two extra charges which we think people can well afford, but at the moment we are not talking about extra charges beyond those which we have introduced, and the Government have no plans to introduce further charges."

My hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) and one or two other hon. Members asked what the difference was between charging for dental inspections and charging for people to have their breasts checked for cancer or to have a cervical check. Of course, I have said that there are no plans—nor would there be—to charge for such examinations. There is a difference in kind between those checks, which are a systematic search for disease, and dental checks, which are basically a check to see whether dental treatment is required. [Hon. Members: "Rubbish."] Oh yes, it has the fortuitous additional benefit that if a case of wider mouth disorder becomes apparent, a dentist can spot it. However, I say to hon. Members, who base their case on the detection of oral cancer, that it is idle to pretend that dental checks were ever intended or devised as a means of screening for oral cancer. They were not. That is categorically so.

I shall turn to the question of oral cancer which appears to me to be a significant point. Oral cancers are tragic and serious, and everybody wants to see them detected and, where possible, cured. Happily, it is a relatively rare condition in the United Kingdom, where there are some 1,500 cases of cancer of the mouth each year.

Mr. Hayes: It is 2,609 per year.

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend gives a false figure and I shall correct him later. There are 1,500 cases of cancer of the mouth each year. That means, spread as an average across all the dentists in the United Kingdom, that the average dentist would see two or three cases of oral cancer in his entire working life. The off-chance of picking out an oral cancer cannot be the basis for 100 per cent. free dental examinations.—[Hon. Members: "Withdraw."]

Mr. Hayes rose——

Mr. Mellor rose——

Hon. Members: Give way.

Mr. Mellor: In a recent survey the figures show that 40 per cent. of oral cancers are detected by dentists. That means that one dentist will see only one case of oral cancer every 20 years. I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes).

10 pm

Mr. Hayes: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for giving way. According to all the professional bodies, which until this moment have been accepted by the Department of Health, last year alone, 2,604 oral cancers were discovered, approximately 41 per cent. of which were presented to dentists. I am sure that my hon. and learned Friend will accept that one difficulty is that doctors are not properly trained to diagnose diseases of the oral cavity, whereas dentists are.

Mr. Mellor: If I may say so, that is a tendentious assertion.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Lords Amendments to the Health and Medicines Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Fallon.]

Lords amendments again considered.

Question again proposed.

Mr. Mellor: When the bell intervened, Mr. Speaker, I was saying that my hon. Friend had quoted his article in the Evening Standard which, no doubt, has remunerated him well enough to enable him to pay for his next check-up —[Hon. Members: "Disgraceful."]

Mr. Hayes rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hayes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman may make his point if the Minister gives way.

Mr. Mellor: I am teasing my hon. Friend—[Interruption.]

Mr. Hayes rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Mellor: I purchased a copy of the Evening Standard to read my hon. Friend's article. The figure that my hon. Friend gives of 2,600 oral cancer cases includes cancer of the throat which is not detected by dentists. It is cancer of the mouth cavity that accounts for 1,500 cases—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I sense that we are coming to the end of this important debate.

Mr. Mellor: Later in his article, my hon. Friend states that "a mere £140 million" is what is at stake tonight. That does not——

Ms. Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) rose——

Mr. Mellor: No, I cannot give way now.

That does not seem a fair basis on which to decide how to cast one's vote in this debate because £140 million is a large amount of money in Health Service terms——

Mr. Hayes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend——

Mr. Hayes rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is it a point of order?

Mr. Hayes: With respect to my hon. and learned Friend, he suggested that I profited from the article—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order for me.

Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Mellor: Of course, if it will make my hon. Friend feel any better about it, I will withdraw any such suggestion. I should like to deal with what he actually said——

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Why do you not make the Minister withdraw that comment?

Mr. Speaker: Because I am not responsible for what is said, provided that it is in order. It may have been in bad taste, but it was in order.

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend wrote:

"The cost of retaining the free dental and sight check is a mere £140 million".

No hon. Member should vote tonight under any illusion, because £140 million is a great deal of money in NHS terms. I advise my hon. Friend that the total cost of all the medical services offered by the district health authority which contains his constituency amounted last year to £41·7 million. That buys an awful lot of treatment.

We shall be concerned later tonight with the treatment of eye disease. I attended the opening, by Her Majesty the Queen, of the brand new, rebuilt Moorfields eye hospital last week. That cost £15 million, only one tenth of the mere £140 million of which my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow spoke. We want to reduce the number of patients on the waiting lists. For £25 million last year, we did over 100,000 more in-patient operations—[Interruption.]—and we shall do more than that next time. I wish that Opposition Members would be quiet for just a few minutes—[Interruption.]—and I shall finish a great deal sooner. It comes down to a judgment whether, in this day and age, when the man on average wages is 30 per cent. better off than he was 10 years ago, we think that £3·15 once or twice a year will be a major disincentive to people to go to the dentist when over 20 million people will be exempted from these charges.

When my right hon. and learned Friend took over the Department, it was open to him to say that he thought that these charges were misconceived. He and I looked at the matter and concluded that what we want to do for the Health Service lies in far more vital areas than preserving an increasingly archaic rule in a world where 60 per cent. of the population is well able to make that payment.

I urge my hon. Friends to bear in mind when they go into the Lobby tonight that the only consequence of the Government failing to carry this measure would be our having to come back with proposals that they would find more unpalatable. It is hardly possible to think of any less damaging way of raising money to make our Health Service even better than to introduce these charges.

This is a great day for the National Health Service, when over £2 billion of extra resources have been won for the service. It will be an even better day for the service if the decision made in the House of Lords is reversed tonight and I therefore urge the House to reverse that decision.

Question put, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Clause 12

THE DENTAL ESTIMATES BOARD AND THE SCOTTISH DENTAL ESTIMATES BOARD—CHANGE OF NAME AND EXTENSION OF FUNCTIONS

Lords amendment: No. 21, in page 13, line 3, leave out from first "to" to end of line 6 and insert

"carry on any such additional activity relating to the provision of general dental services as may be prescribed and, without prejudice to the generality of this subsection, to conduct or commission surveys or other research relating to the provision of such services."

Mrs. Currie: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

This technical amendment was accepted in Committee in another place. It ensures that the wording of subsection (3)(b)(1C) is sufficiently wide to allow sensible research activity on the general dental services to be undertaken by dental estimates boards. The amendment clarifies the position and removes any unintended inflexibility.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 13

GENERAL OPHTHALMIC SERVICES AND OPTICAL APPLIANCES

Lords amendment: No. 22, in page 13, line 18, leave out subsection (1).

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I beg to move, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following:

Amendments (a) to (f) to Lords amendment No. 22.

Lords amendment No. 23.

Amendments (a) and (b) to Lords amendment No. 22.

Lords amendment No. 26.

Amendments (a) to (f) to Lords amendment No. 26.

I remind the House that privilege is involved in these amendments.

Mr. Clarke: Lords amendment No. 22 deals with the question of whether we should introduce charges for eye tests as a contribution towards the Health Service's rising expenditure.

We have just had a rather closer vote than those to which we are accustomed—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Right hon. and hon. Members who remain beyond the Bar must be quiet or should enter the Chamber.

Mr. Clarke: There is a certain degree of excitement in the House, and we have just had a very rousing winding-up speech from my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Department of Health. We have had some exchanges with our own right hon. and hon. Friends as well as with Opposition Members on exactly what the divisions are about this evening.

We are engaged in a very serious matter that has considerable consequences for the Health Service. I listened to a good part of the last debate. I heard, for example, my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan), a distinguished former Minister of Health and a personal friend of mine, speak extremely eloquently about the problems of oral cancer. He touched on the subject of eyesight and spoke also about glaucoma. I accept entirely the sincerity with which he spoke. I also know that he realises that both my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State and myself are equally concerned about the problems of oral cancer and glaucoma.—[Interruption.] Of course we are. The suggestion that we are oblivious to those matters has arisen. In the previous debate, there was a difference between us as to whether a £3·15 charge every six months will deter anybody from examinations that might in a few cases give rise to the discovery of oral cancer.

What also runs behind this debate are the finances of the National Health Service for next year. What happens as one progresses in a debate of this kind is that everyone rather warms to his theme. Certainly I find myself warming to my theme and becoming ever more convinced of my case. I suspect that some of my right hon. and hon. Friends and Opposition Members are growing ever more convinced of theirs.

The House has just given us a rather close run thing that might have cost the Health Service £50 million in the coming year. I find it ironic and perverse that on a day when we have provided over £2 billion more for the Health Service over and above last year's spending, and over and above last year's settlement, the Labour party is voting to take funds out of the Health Service and to try to knibble away at that increased expenditure. My hon. and learned Friend was quite correct in saying in the previous debate that hon. Members on both sides of the House spoke of £50 million as though it were a small sum, although at least one of my hon. Friends was talking about more than the complete budget of his district health authority. Both my hon. and learned Friend the Minister and I gave examples of the kind of treatment that can be provided out of such sums.

10.30 pm

I respect the sincerity of hon. Members of both sides, but they are not addressing themselves to the fact that by voting as they do they are denying patients throughout the country the prospect of treatment. In this debate, no doubt I shall be told that we are—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask hon. Members not to address remarks to me, or to anyone else, from a sedentary position.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Get to the business.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Member says, "Get to the business." I am getting to the business of the £70 million against which he is about to vote and which will deprive people in Workington and elsewhere of an expansion in services that might otherwise take place. That is highly relevant to the next debate, and he and others should bear it in mind.

I make no apologies for reminding the House of that background. It is against that background that I shall listen again to the arguments that will be adduced about the possibility of undetected glaucoma if we do not vote against the prospect of the most prosperous 60 per cent. of the population—those who do not fall into the exempt categories—facing a horrendous bill of up to £10 every two or three years. [Interruption.] Yes, I am angry, because we are facing—[Interruption.] The Labour party is again being irresponsible about health charges. If the House becomes irresponsible, we shall be £70 million light for the Health Service and treatment expansion next year.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State is not giving way.

Mr. Clarke: I may give way in a bit, but I will not be interrupted from a sitting position by the hon. Member for Workington and then give way to him two minutes later.

The issue in this debate will turn on whether people will be deterred from going to the optician and cases of glaucoma will not be detected if we introduce the charges that we are suggesting for the sight test. That is the nub of the debate. Before we launch into long descriptions of the consequence for eye disease, we must first ask how many people, if any, will be deterred from going to the optician by the prospect—and it is no more than a prospect—that many opticians will charge £10 or thereabouts.

I said when I spoke about dental charges that we had heard the argument about deterrence year in and year out for more than 10 years, every time we raised the charges. We have had exactly the same experience with the optical services. But, as many hon. Members will remember, we had a more serious debate about optical services about four years ago when we took the dispensing service out of the NHS and introduced the voucher scheme. We made significant changes in the way in which the NHS was financed.

At that time exactly the same arguments were adduced. We were told that there would be undetected disease and sight problems. I recall those debates quite well. I have seen briefing quoting some of the comments that I made in that debate. I have re-read the debate. The then spokesman for the Labour party, the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), said on 20 December 1983:

"The result for the public will be eye strain and headaches at best. At worst it will be the inability to see clearly so that they are at risk in their work, a hazard in the road or otherwise may injure themselves".—[Official Report, 20 December 1983; Vol. 51, c. 306.]

We heard all the stories of glaucoma, we heard about bus drivers driving into lamp posts and how the price of spectacles would soar as we privatised the service.

The evidence supports the arguments which I used before and which go to the root of the debate. We have heard this cry of wolf before. It did not happen. The changes that we made did not result in fewer visits to the optician. In fact, competition made spectacle prices more reasonable and the choice to the consumer was extended. According to the most recent survey that I have, the United Kingdom's retail sale of spectacles increased by about 10 per cent. in the first two years alone—from 1984 to 1986.

Therefore, all those arguments proved to be false. Greater use is being made of the optical services than was made before we made the changes which were opposed on precisely the same grounds as our proposals are being opposed today at a threatened cost to the National Health Service of £70 million.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): Does my right hon. and learned Friend realise that this House did away with free eye tests before? Before we had the National Health Service, opticians gave free eye tests. At the moment the taxpayer pays for eye tests. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that we are likely to get free eye tests again because of economic and commercial pressures?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. I shall turn to his point in a moment.

The people who campaign against us now campaigned against us four years ago. They are better off than they were then, although at the time they feared that they would be made poorer. The public are making more use of the optical services than they did then.

We are now discussing the idea that the six out of 10 of the population who are not exempt will be deterred by having to pay £10, typically about every two or three years. I shall not rehearse all the arguments I used about dental examinations as to why I think that that is contrary to common sense as well as the evidence.

I keep being challenged, "Who in the profession agrees with you?". I have never found that large numbers of turkeys rush forward before Christmas, but I have found some support from sensible journals. I propose to assist the House by reading from the column known as Nemo which, as hon. Members who follow optical matters will know, appears in Optician of 1 January 1988. It deals directly with the core of the debate—whether people will go to the optician with less frequency because of the charges. I shall read from Nemo because I have been challenged to produce support from people within optics —having found one, I shall read it—[Interruption.] As my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, South (Mr. Bruce) said, if the House agrees with their Lordships, opticians expect to continue to be paid by the taxpayer for a service which otherwise they would provide free. There is no doubt as to who the beneficiaries will be if we agree with their Lordships in the amendment.

Optician said:

"if it is to have any effect in the place where it matters, the case against the Government's proposals needs to be presented in well reasoned and dispassionate terms, avoiding as far as possible dire predictions and the sort of sweeping and unsubstantiated allegations normally resorted to on such occasions. What reason is there for supposing that to ask people to pay for something previously provided free will cause them to lose interest in the particular goods or services, particularly where their health is concerned? To incline to this view is surely to underestimate the intelligence and sense of responsibility of the man in the street."

The audience of this journalist are opticians.

"Is it really asking too much to require persons in work or who are otherwise able to pay, to fork out, say, £10 for a sight test every two years? Let us retain a sense of proportion; this represents no more than the cost of a couple of modest rounds of drinks, or a single restaurant meal.

Contrary to what the pundits would have us believe, one tends to learn more from the experience of history. Those who are old enough, for example, will recall how the imposition of the first NHS charges in the early 1950s was interpreted by the Cassandras as the death knell for opticians. The reality, of course, was that people still had need of spectacles—and have demonstrated their willingness to pay for them to an ever-increasing extent over the years.

The end of NHS dispensing in 1985"——

Mr. Canavan: Reading.

Mr. Clarke: Of course I am reading—I am quoting. The hon. Member last emerged in the Chamber to chant in a similar way at one of my hon. Friends. I trust that he will not continue to do that throughout the debate. I have already told one of his hon. Friends that a lot of money for the Health Service is at stake.

Mr. Churchill rose——

Dame Jill Knight rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us have all the points of order together then.

Dame Jill Knight: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is my right hon. and learned Friend not perfectly entitled to read a quotation if that is what he wants to do? I for one am anxious to hear what he says.

Mr. Speaker: The whole House is anxious to get on with this debate.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. She and I address ourselves seriously to this issue. I do not think that people outside will be very pleased to hear that we are talking about this sum of money for health care against a background of din from the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan), who has just joined us.

I have quoted Optician, setting out in reasonable terms, which I shall not attempt to repeat or embellish, the underlying case of people who follow the affairs of the optical world much more than most hon. Members and their fears on costs. We must ask whether opticians will impose a charge which will deter the six out of 10 of the population who are not exempt from charges.

How much will opticians charge? One proposition is that they will continue to charge what they at present charge the NHS, which is about £10. The Bill would end the provision of an NHS test for non-exempt people. Opticians will charge what they decide to charge. If the Government are successful in this Division, it will be for opticians to determine what, if anything, is charged to their customers or patients.

Much of the debate, in this and the other place, has been founded on the proposition that all opticians will continue to charge the equivalent of the NHS fee that they now get for the free sight test which they offer to everyone. Some of my hon. Friends who know just as much about the optical profession as I do disagree with me. This is a matter of opinion and judgment. I do not believe that all opticians will maintain a charge for a sight test which is equivalent to the present NHS fee that they receive, for the same reason that the cost of spectacles did not soar when we withdrew NHS glasses four years ago. Competition —a legitimate activity for professional people, as for others—will oblige opticians to offer a charge for optical tests—if they charge at all.

10.45 pm

I ask the House to consider the other argument against me. I know that I shall hear this point: "No, we have asked all the opticians and they all say that they will carry on charging what they get at the moment from the NHS. That will deter the clientele. We shall sit around and watch the eye disease develop which would otherwise have been detected." Does that mean that these commercial men—all professional men are business men as well as qualified people—will solemnly all set the same fee, at a level which deters customers from coming over the threshold of their shops? They will all sit around watching their incomes drop as fewer patients come in—[Interruption.]

Mr. Hayes rose——

Mr. Clarke: Before my hon. Friend again starts telling me that this is peanuts—about four and a half times the budget of his health authority—let me say that I have history on my side. I told the House four years ago that I did not believe those people then, and I was right. Frankly, I do not believe them now.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): My right hon. and learned Friend is spending a good deal of time in likening the proposed charges to past examples. Does he agree that there is a fundamental difference in one area to which he has not so far directed his attention? Those of us who are concerned about the Government's proposal are not just concentrating on the poor, as perhaps we did in the past. We are looking at people who, for no other reason than that they are over a certain age, begin to develop sight defects. If there is a deterrent to those people—a large number of whom will not fall within the category of poor—and they do not seek an eye test, the savings on which my right hon. and learned Friend concentrates will be swamped by the additional resources that will have to be devoted to diseases if and when they arise.

Mr. Clarke: I respect my hon. Friend's views. He is returning to the key of the argument. He asserts, contrary to what I have just said, that these charges will continue to be levied, despite the competitive pressures on opticians —

Mr. Denis Howell (Birmingham, Small Heath): Of course they will.

Mr. Clarke: I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman spoke when we last talked about opticians, four years ago.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) is entitled to disagree with me. He disagrees with my instinct, my opinion, that opticians will not maintain eye test charges for very long. If they do not maintain eye test charges, my hon. Friend's fears will be ill-founded, as he will concede. He says that, if opticians maintain some eye test charges, that will deter the elderly in particular. I am sure that he agrees that not all pensioners fall into the poor category, but I agree that the older one becomes, the more one is prone to glaucoma.

I concede that I may be wrong in my opinion that the charge for the eye test will steadily disappear, but that is my strong personal opinion. Let us imagine that some charges are maintained at anything up to about £10, which is what opticians get for the NHS test now. We can then examine what I first anticipated would happen. Every couple of years or so, people might face the prospect of having to go to the opticians. At the moment, people who go to opticians usually expect to pay for their spectacles, if they are not exempt. They are right to do so. The reason why people usually go to the opticians is that they are not seeing as well as they used to, or need to have their prescriptions updated. Three out of four people who go for a sight test wind up acquiring spectacles. And they pay for them. The charges they pay for the glasses are considerably higher than any possible deterrent arising from these charges.

We have found since privatisation that people are not deterred, as I have already said, by the prospect of going through the voucher scheme or paying for themselves. NHS voucher customers who qualify for help have in practice been willing to pay more than their vouchers for the spectacles of their preference. Even though such people are, by definition, of modest means, it is not surprising that they are willing to top up their NHS vouchers to pay for what is not a huge or recurrent item of expenditure. Most pay now; most will in future.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the competitive pressure on opticians will depend entirely on where they are—that is, on whether they are in major town centres or small towns?

Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that this is not a matter of creating a further disincentive to those who already use eye tests? Every Government Minister accepts and preaches that there is not enough take-up of screening of all kinds, and that we should encourage more take-up.

In the context of the remarks made earlier this evening by my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, what is the real difference between screening for cancer and screening for eye ailments and other diseases?

Mr. Clarke: I shall deal first with the argument that competition may not occur everywhere. My hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Mr. Davis) pointed out in conversation with me that competitive pressures may not exist in rural areas. But, even in rural areas, I cannot believe that opticians will be too far away from other opticians for such pressures not to exist. Although they may have a slightly protected market, they will not sustain their position if it is clear to their rural customers that in nearby towns such as Leeds or Hull there are no charges for a test. [Interruption.] Already one can see those little signs in the windows of opticians' premises saying, "Free NHS tests here". I do not criticise opticians for that: it is a way of getting customers across the threshold to sell them spectacles, if it turns out on examination that they need a prescription.

Secondly, my hon. Friend mentioned screening tests. My hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State was right to challenge the direct comparison with full-blooded screening. We are not talking about cervical cancer or breast cancer screening. Both those tests are expressly designed to show whether the first signs of a particular condition are present. We are discussing average patients going for eye tests to see whether they need spectacles, or going to the dentist to see whether they need treatment —[Interruption.] What I have said is correct. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. Members will have an opportunity to participate later in the debate, but not by intervening in this way.

Mr. Clarke: What happens—and neither I nor my hon. and learned Friend denies this—is that it gives an opportunity to someone who is examining for a particular purpose to detect the first signs of other diseases. However, it is not a specific screening test. The idea that eye tests were invented for the purpose of detecting glaucoma is nonsense. This Government introduced and financed breast cancer screening to detect avoidable disease and breast cancer in women. The eye tests merely offer an opportunity for people to detect glaucoma.

Of course, we must not take risks. Most of my hon. Friends and Opposition Members have listened patiently while I have explained why I do not agree that patients will be deterred, nor even convinced, that the charges will be maintained. My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) and others ask, "Why take the risk?" My hon. Friend is obviously worried about the risk of glaucoma going undetected if my judgment, based on experience of optical charges, turns out to be wrong. This measure has been through this House several times and I and my hon. Friends have gone to great lengths to cover that risk. I have already said that it is my opinion that no great risk exists and that people will not be deterred from having eye tests.

I began my speech by saying that I am no more anxious to have avoidable disease in this country than is my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East or any other hon. Member. At earlier stages we have made concessions that provide a free NHS eye test for those groups most at risk. Glaucoma is estimated to affect about 1 to 2 per cent. of those over the age of 40, a proportion of whom do not wear glasses. There is a much higher risk among particular people as there is a hereditary element in the condition of glaucoma. People of 40 or over who are the siblings and children of the glaucoma patient are at 10 times greater risk of developing the condition than those who are not so related. That is why my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, then the Minister for Health, proposed to retain the free NHS eye test for that group, which is most at risk.

We have already proposed to retain the free test for those suffering from diabetes. Contrary to what I believe to be necessary, there have been concessions, in case we are proved to be wrong, to cover that section of the population most at risk. Yet, having gone to such lengths, hon. Members now say, "No, there must be a free eye test for everyone in this Chamber and everyone in the high income groups, including those in the higher tax bands, in case the opticians continue to charge."

I believe that the practical effect of these proposals is that the opticians will continue to have an income from the NHS that they would not otherwise get. Most important, the NHS—on the night of the day when my right hon. Friend has given a great deal more money to it—will have to take £70 million out of its planned expenditure if this amendment is not carried.

Mr. Hayes: I am sort of grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend. He said that he was taking a risk—it is more like backing a whippet with a wooden leg. Some 70 per cent. of optometrists' income comes from the sight test. What will happen to the other 30 per cent.? It will be loaded on to the price of spectacles and contact lenses.

Mr. Clarke: I invite my hon. Friend to raise the subject of optometrists' incomes in his speech, and I shall deal with it when I reply to the debate. That is what I think to be at risk if their Lordships' decision is overturned by this House. I think that the most competitive optometrists, the best opticians, those who continue to build on the success of the past four years when there has been a growth in spectacle sales, will do very well.

Mr. Hayes: No.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend obviously knows some less competitive optometrists who rather like the idea that the NHS should continue to pay them £10 a time for everybody who comes through the door to whom they give a sight test. If he wishes to pursue that argument further —which he did not set out in his Evening Standard argument—my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State will be only too anxious to give him as good as he gets in the course of the exchange.

Sir Giles Shaw (Pudsey) rose——

11 pm

Mr. Clarke: This must be the last intervention because I wish to conclude my remarks.

Sir Giles Shaw: Will my right hon. and learned Friend clarify the position of a glaucoma test in the NHS testing procedure? Is there no requirement for such a test to be conducted when a person goes for a normal NHS sight test? Is there any way in which it can be enforced so that when we have—if my right hon. Friend's argument is persuasive—a £10 charge for it, at least the public will know that the test for that disease will be a part of the NHS eye test?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend raises a serious point. I believe that the bulk of responsible optometrists and opticians give a full sight test—[Interruption.]—and we have the powers to specify the extent to which the patients and customers are tested. We shall look at the necessity to use them if we find that people are giving quick sight tests and not screening for glaucoma. [Interruption.] Labour Members are disappointed by that, it seems. They have come to life again, their Scottish hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) having gone back to where he came from prior to joining us for our discussion. What I said is important and is relevant to the detection and treatment of glaucoma.

Most of the arguments that we are about to hear in this debate, I anticipate—though I shall listen, as ever, with an open mind—will not touch on the detection and treatment of glaucoma. If some passion is to enter the debate, let us ensure that in making a judgment in the next hour or two we do not put at risk £70 million which I and my hon. Friends want to put to use in the NHS, including in the optical services.

Rebellion requires more courage and conviction than routine opposition. Tonight Labour Members are indulging in routine opposition. When my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State teased them about whether they would like to see the end of all health charges, a big cheer came from them. Apparently they are saying that they would abolish all health charges. That would mean huge expenditure for no benefit to the patients. It also means that they are committing themselves to a policy which, as we know perfectly well, they would never implement if they ever got to power.

If we succeed in overturning this Lords amendment, I do not believe that any future Labour Government will ever withdraw this charge for the optical examination or will bring it back—because I do not think there will be a charge —for the sake of paying the opticians a fee, which by then will have disappeared or be very cheap indeed by the forces of competition.

Labour Members are being opportunistic. They are taking advantage of an occasion when my hon. Friends are concerned about eye disease. There are serious issues at stake, such as the future of the Health Service, its expanded services next year and keeping the full benefit of the £2·2 billion that we have put in. I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote to ensure that we keep the full benefit of all that extra money.

Mr. Robin Cook: It would be churlish of me to begin without congratulating the Secretary of State on having found one medical view in support of his proposal, albeit one who felt compelled to write anonymously.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that he believed that he was absolutely right—those were his words—in the views he expressed in the House on 20 December 1983, when we last debated this matter. Let me remind the Secretary of State of what he said in the speech in which his remarks were "absolutely right". He said:

"We are keeping in the NHS what should be kept there—free sight tests for everyone, regardless of need."—[Official Report, 20 December 1983; Vol. 51, c. 362.]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has got round to the House of Commons brief; I trust that he has also looked at the copy of Hansard from which that quotation is taken. Before he comes to the quotations from my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Social Services, I would point out that when the quotations are taken in context it is clear that we were describing the then measure and the then measure kept the eye test in the National Health Service. The charge for it was not at issue in the explanation of the deregulation. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman has not read Hansard. [Interruption.] I am merely asking hon. Members to stop quoting selectively. If the hon. Gentleman reads the debates in March 1983 he will find that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) helpfully intervened to underline the point that I made in Committee. I described the arrangements as being in place for the time being, and my remarks are on record. There is no inconsistency in what we are saying today.

Mr. Cook: It was as well that we let the Secretary of State intervene, and continue for as long as he did. I listened with great care to his concluding remarks. He said that he had made it clear—of course, he is quite right—that his commitment to free sight tests was "for the time being". Those are precisely the words that he used earlier when he said that this Government had no plans to introduce charges for cervical cancer smears, breast cancer examinations or visits to the doctor. That, too, was "for the time being." We now have a clear definition of what "for the time being" means: it is a period of four to five years at the outside.

The Secretary of State is perfectly entitled to change his mind. It is open to any hon. Member to do so. However, I put it to him that some people who heard what he said in the debate in 1983 have not changed their minds and believe that free sight testing ought to remain in the NHS. If I may say so—as one colleague to another—the Secretary of State is not entitled to get angry with those who have not changed their mind with the same facility as he has. There are serious and deeply held views on sight tests on both sides of the House and those views will not be changed by a display of ill temper.

All the arguments of principle in the previous debate can be carried forward into this second debate. The House will be relieved to hear that I do not propose to repeat those arguments. However, I firmly believe that the case against charges applies with even greater force to the eye test.

There are two reasons for that. The first is the nature of the examination. In preparation for the debate, I went for an eye examination. Some hon. Members may know that, having observed photographs which perhaps do not show me at my best. Any hon. Member who has been through the test must know that it is misleading to describe it as a sight test. It is a full examination of the eye. The eye is the one part of the body behind which one can look without cutting it open. It is a window through which one can see not just the ocular system but the circulatory system and the immediately adjacent part of the brain. That has been admitted by the Secretary of State and the Government, who have tabled an amendment seeking to exempt those suspected of suffering from glaucoma and diabetes. That is a very clear indication of the fact that the eye examination is an effective way of screening for those very serious diseases.

Other diseases may also be detected. Twice as many cases of hypertension as cases of diabetes are detected through the eye examination. Since the debate began a year ago, when the Government first floated their proposals, my hon. Friends the Members for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran), for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish) and for Wigan (Mr. Stott) have all been visited by constituents who have made it plain that their lives had been saved by a routine eye examination in which a serious tumour requiring urgent operation had been detected. It is not an isolated and rare occurrence; one in 12 eye examinations results in a medical referral. That is 1 million cases a year. To put it another way, three out of four cases of glaucoma are first detected during eye examinations. Those matters are not in dispute. The Green Paper said that sight tests can identify health problems as well as a need for spectacles. Therefore, it is important that skilled sight testing should remain readily available. That is important.

As I understand the Government's case, they do not deny the importance and the significance of the eye examination. What the Secretary of State has argued is that, yes, eye examinations are important, but nobody will be deterred if we take away the fee that we pay to optometrists and they in turn introduce a charge. I find it curious that a Government as committed as this Government are to market forces—in all other areas holding that the price signal is effective—should in the solitary case of health charges suspend the law of market economics and say that the price signal does not deter. It is nonsense on stilts for them to sustain that no one would be deterred by "a tenner a test".

I listened with interest to the Secretary of State when he talked about how much the test would cost. I believe that he would agree that one could fairly sum up his comments by saying that, after this measure has been passed, we shall have no control over what the charge might be. We are abandoning the charge to the optometrists. In a sense, this debate is even worse than the previous one, because at least then we knew how much the charge would be. On this occasion, the Secretary of State maintains that the charge could be less than £10. Equally, it could be more than £10. I am bound to say that every optometrist I have met during the past year has made the obvious and simple observation that he is likely to have fewer people coming forward and, if he is to sustain the same amount of income, he will have to charge more than £10 a test.

We now have evidence—which was not available on Report—of what happens when the fee is withdrawn and it is left to the market to decide. It is sufficiently dramatic to justify a retrial. That evidence comes from the state of Alberta. In August 1987 the state eliminated free eye tests by withdrawing them from state insurance. The result was so disastrous that it brought back free eye tests within 11 months. Lord Skelmersdale was unfortunately caught adrift when the other place debated this measure, and he was unwise enough to say that the report of things going wrong in Alberta was merely anecdotal. He was unaware that in the same month in which he referred to those difficulties as being anecdotal the government of Alberta had been so convinced by the reality of its experience that it was bringing back free sight tests. The abolition of free sight tests in Alberta did not reduce examination charges, but resulted in charging by optometrists. It is claimed that abolition produced a drop of 30 per cent. in the number of people presenting themselves for eye examination. Another consequence was that there was a sharp increase in the number of people being referred to eye hospitals for a more expensive eye examination.

That brings me to the second reason why on this issue the case against charges is stronger. The Secretary of State repeatedly told us that he was doing this for the money and, to be fair to him, he made no bones about that. In that spirit of candour, I will respond by saying that he will get more money by charging for dental examination, but, in so doing, he will cause great damage to the teeth of the people of this nation—damage which is not worth £49 million. I accept that he will get the money from dental examination fees. I do not believe for one moment that he will find himself in pocket as a result of abolishing free eye tests. He will not get any money from this perverse measure and I will give two reasons why that is so.

11.15 pm

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): The House is listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman's arguments. I am certainly trying to do so. Is it not wrong to talk about "free" eye tests? Surely what we are arguing about—this is a perfectly reasonable argument—are eye tests that are provided by the generality of taxpayers—they are certainly not free—and eye tests provided by a free and competitive market. Is it not our experience in most aspects of life that the operation of a free market where there has never been one before, which is what there will be if this measure is agreed, will serve the public better?

Mr. Cook: I have some sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's point. Ultimately the eye test is not free. Ultimately it has to be paid for by somebody. At present, it is paid for by the taxpayer. What I find curious about the Secretary of State's argument is that he seemed to have invented the free sight test for which the taxpayer would not pay and nor would anybody else. Plainly, that does not stand to reason. The Secretary of State cannot save £90 million unless somebody else pays for it.

I predict, with confidence, that the Secretary of State will not save that sum, for two reasons. The first is a short-term reason. Our eye hospitals will be swamped by references from general practitioners who will no longer be able to refer their patients to optometrists for free examinations. They will be able to secure free tests for their patients only by referring them to an eye hospital. That is what many general practitioners will do. The Secretary of State has come up with a proposal which gives everybody an incentive to go for their eye examination to the one place where it costs the right hon. and learned Gentleman the most to pay for it and to avoid the optometrist round the corner, where it would cost him least to pay for it.

The long-term reason why I do not believe that there will be any savings from this proposal is even more disturbing. As a result of the removal of the free sight test there will be a growing burden on the Health Service from people with serious medical conditions which will not now be detected until they are at an advanced stage.

It is possible to extrapolate from the experience of Alberta what that could mean for primary care in Britain. There are 12 million eye examinations in Britain every year; 70 per cent. will now be liable for a charge—that is 8·5 million. If 30 per cent. of those cases in Britain are deterred by a charge—as happened in Alberta—2·5 million people will not go for an eye examination. If the instances of glaucoma among that 2·5 million is the same as that for the population as a whole, we will miss 10,000 cases of glaucoma annually. We may miss another 10,000 cases of diabetic retinopathy. Glaucoma cannot be reversed. It can be arrested, but when it has proceeded to too advanced a stage, it cannot be reversed. When it is found too late, the sufferers are going blind.

That is not just a personal tragedy for the people concerned. If I may put it in terms to which the Treasury can relate, it will also be expensive for the NHS. Every blind person costs the state £3,500 per year in added services. The annual cost for 10,000 cases of glaucoma which are not detected in time would wipe out half the savings that the Secretary of State hopes to achieve by abolishing the free sight test. He is not making a saving. He is taking on an expensive commitment to future care. The truth is that the free eye test is not a burden; it is a bargain. Only those who can see only the bottom line on costs or those who overlook the importance of the sound principle that preventive screening should be free can overlook the excellent cost benefit that the free eye test represents.

I come now to the heart of the matter. In the past few days, we have seen high drama on whether the Secretary of State will succeed in facing down his hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) and for Harlow (Mr. Hayes). Twice in one night the Secretary of State has taken on not only the Opposition but a large wing of his Back Benches. It is inconceivable that any man so urbane and well-rounded as the Secretary of State would go to all this trouble for the modest sum that he hopes to save. It is impossible that a man of his intelligence even believes that he will save any money from this proposal.

No Minister goes to all that trouble over such a doubtful prospect, but he may go to it for the sake of principle. I fear that the reason why the Secretary of State is taking on all-comers over this issue is the principle that, if the House swallows this proposal, it will swallow the principle of charges for any form of primary care treatment. All that is left is to decide what comes next—charges for a visit to the doctor, for cervical smears and for breast screening.

I end by coming to the point where Opposition Members differ from the dissenters on the Conservative Back Benches. We agree with them in opposing the proposal because it will be deeply damaging to the nation's health, but we also oppose it on grounds of principle, because we are committed to a Health Service open to all and free at the time people need it. It is in defence of that principle that we shall vote against the Government.

Mr. John Marshall: Much of what we have heard today has been predictable. Whenever the Labour party is in opposition and Health Service charges are mentioned, Labour Members have a knee-jerk reaction. In 1964, the Labour party promised to abolish prescription charges. By 1970, prescription charges had not been abolished, but were higher than they were in 1964. In 1974, the Labour party campaigned on a promise of abolishing prescription charges. By 1979, they still existed. I am willing to wager that, whatever they have said tonight, Labour Members will campaign in election after election promising to abolish these charges and then doing nothing about it, if they ever, by some mischance, find themselves in government. They have led the country down that path before, making promises and then not keeping them, and that is what they would do about these charges.

Much of the discussion about these charges is pure synthetic indignation. A charge of £10 to be met every second year is equivalent to giving up two cigarettes a week; how much better it would be for people's health if they gave up the whole lot rather than just two a week. Can people really say that no one can afford a charge of £10 every second year when the average industrial wage is £224? When I asked the Liberal party spokesman, the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn), about this, he said that there were people below the average industrial wage. Of course there are, but those who are poor and those with low incomes will not be paying prescription charges.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Marshall: No, I shall not give way. I promised to be brief and I shall be.

We are discussing a charge that will raise £70 million at a time when this country spends £2,458 million a year on betting and gaming. Are we saying that a society that can afford to spend that amount of money on betting and gaming cannot afford to spend £70 million on eye tests?

We are told that the charge will definitely be £10. We even had the absurd suggestion from the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) that, because some people might not have a test, the opticians' reaction would be to put up the price, but he confessed to some doubts about market economics. I can assure him that there is no market place in the world where the supplier of a service reacts to a reduced demand by putting up the price. If he were to take a first-year course in elementary economics, he would be told that a reduction in demand leads to a reduction in price. Wherever one goes in our towns and cities, one sees competition among opticians in the main high streets. I am willing to wager that, when these charges are introduced, we shall find an optician in every town offering a free National Health eye test. As soon as one optician takes that step, the optician down the road will take it. Competition will ensure that the £10 charge will not increase, as Labour Members suggest, but decrease.

We must consider the proposed charges as part of a package that will lead to better primary health care and a better Health Service. We must ask ourselves whether it is right that those who can afford to pay a modest charge should receive a free service.

Mr. Fry: My hon. Friend is saying that those who can afford to pay should pay. I have much sympathy for that view, but has he considered the position of pensioners who do not pay income tax and receive no benefit from the state apart from their basic state pension? They will not be able to afford a charge of £10. What will be their position?

Mr. Marshall: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State made it clear this afternoon that someone who is in receipt of the basic pension will be in a better position than my hon. Friend imagines. Those who take a Rip Van Winkle view of life, suggesting that every pensioner has merely a basic pension and that there should be free eye tests for all those of pensionable age, are suggesting that Sir Robin Day, for example, should be given the right to enjoy a free eye test. What would people do to try to get on "Any Questions" on a Thursday night? It is surely not a correct sense of social priority to seek to provide free eye tests for Sir Robin Day at the expense of the general body of taxpayers, many of whom earn much less than he does. It is much better to target those who can afford to pay so that the Health Service can be improved. Do we want a better Health Service? Of course we do. That is why I shall support the Government and vote for the charges.

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): For the past three hours I have been worried by the patronising, almost self-congratulatory and arrogant way in which the Secretary of State, the Minister of State and their supporters have dealt with the key principle of preventive medicine. The argument on principle is not confined to the proposed charges, and I welcome the fact that there is common agreement on both sides of the House that these charges foreshadow what the Government have set out in a secret manifesto that they will seek to implement during their present term of office or during the next one if, God help us, they win the next general election.

I shall deal with the issue in a way that is different from the one that has been followed by those who have preceded me. We have heard politicians arguing eloquently along the lines that are set out in prepared briefs. I shall advance an argument from the other side of the wall. I have had personal experience of the results that stem from the inability to receive preventive medicine in time to prevent blindness.

During the 1970s, when I visited the House to see my father, who was then the hon. Member for Dumbarton, Central, I took ill. I was sent to Moorfields eye hospital, where it was found that I was suffering from Eels disease. For the following two years I was entirely blind in my left eye. I could see nothing apart from the light and colour that was visible through my right eye. Eels disease is especially nasty when it is contracted by men and women in middle age and pensionable age.

I was struck down with Eels disease in my mid-20s. Over two years I underwent 19 operations at Moorfields, some of which were of an extensive and complicated nature, using the latest laser techniques and other surgical procedures. I owe my sight to the "qualities" of the professors at that hospital and to the dedicated skill of those engaged in the prevention of eye disease and the restoration of the ability to see for those in my position —the magic of seeing again.

I received my sight back at some personal cost as a result of the social effects of my illness. There were also costs to the state and to my family. I had 19 complicated operations, the last three of which were of a type that Professor Hill had not tried before. Yet he carried them out in an attempt to restore my sight. Thousands of pounds were invested in that programme of operations by Professor Hill and the Moorfields eye hospital. I was not unique at the hospital. It was full of people suffering from permanent blindness, going blind or seeking treatment to restore sight as a result of the lack of preventive medicine in the community.

11.30 pm

I suffered social effects as a result of my illness. For two years I was unemployable. For six months I was unable to hold my three-year-old son because even the smallest shake could cause a haemorrhage in the eye. Such haemorrhages are part and parcel of Eels disease. Eels disease and invitreous haemorrhages are caused by infestation of the eye which causes substantial and serious blood clots, many of which are inoperable. For the middle aged and pensioners who are afflicted that usually means the end of sight and the removal of the eye or, in some cases where both eyes are affected, it could mean total blindness.

The effects of such illnesses are not restricted to loss of employment and the cost to the state and the family that that involves. Those illnesses also cause social problems in the family. They bring pressure on a family as it must come to terms with the fact that one central, important member of the family must accept the possibility of total blindness. The family must accept that the person concerned may be unable to work and have a career. The family might suffer a loss of income. Those factors have social consequences for the family. My family was no different from many families which suffer from blindness. I live with those consequences today in terms of my former marriage as the family could not stick together because of the nature of the illness and the pressures that it brought on the family.

When the Minister talks about vested interests, it is important to know what we are talking about. My vested interest and that of hon. Members on both sides of the House lies in the belief in the prevention of disease and illness because of their social and financial costs to the state. The doctors and professors whom the Minister attacked so glibly a moment ago left at their own expense within hours of the Bhopal disaster to go to India to try to prevent mass blindness among the people of that stricken town. The professionals have a vested interest in their own position and in the well-being of their patients and the community in which the patients reside.

One of the major arguments in the debate is about communities and preventive medicine. I am a child of the National Health Service. I was born in a steel and coal community in 1951. I have early recollections of the workings of the service. I was among the first generation to be born under the NHS. I saw the effects of inoculation, eye tests and screening as part of eye tests. I remember as a child that 50, 60 or 70 of us at a time lined up to take the tests in a working-class community. Preventive medicine is important to the community as an attempt to prevent disease and to ensure that the community is properly served in terms of facilities for all people.

The Government talk about cost-effectiveness and in my short contribution so far I have talked about how my illness affected me and my family. The Government argue that cost-effectiveness is irrelevant. My illness has resulted in a net loss to the community, both in terms of the cost to Health Service in trying to put right the damage to my eyes and the cost to the Exchequer of social security and sickness payments. It makes no sense to impose such a small charge and put at risk so many individuals in the community.

If the Government are really looking for a trade-off for this small amount of money, why not trade off some of the tax cuts that so many hon. Members voted for only a few short months ago? What about a trade-off with the assisted places scheme for educational attainment, the money that has been pumped into city technology colleges at the expense of the rest of the education service, or even half the money from the wholesale sale of the royal ordnance factories at a third of their market value? If the Minister is really interested in a trade-off, trade off those items, not the health and sight of many thousands of potential victims in Britain.

I know that many hon. Members wish to speak and, like me, have waited a number of hours to participate. I hope that when the Minister replies in his histrionic way he will not return to the blackmail of today's Autumn Statement. The House should be supreme in the decision-making of this country and it should not be subservient to anybody, whether it be the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Prime Minister. If the House decides not to impose these charges, the Government have a duty to come back here and put into the nation's budget the resources to provide that service.

Unless that is the case we are well on the way to having an elective dictatorship. That is another fundamental argument. Tonight the Government have been arrogant enough to name hospitals in the constituencies of those hon. Members who have argued persuasively against the Government. No stone has been left unturned by the Secretary of State in trying to denigrate the profession, or individual hon. Members who have argued against the Government's principles.

That leads me to suggest that it is not simply one or two additional charges that are at stake but the concept of who pays for preventive medicine in Britain. Therefore, in voting against this we are voting not just against the charge but against the whole concept of the market philosophy of this stinking Secretary of State—[HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."]—who is prepared to put at risk the sight of so many people for a few pounds. Hon. Members might shout. They have never understood the blackness of blindness and what it does to the individual or his family. I would never wish it on anyone. I can only say that I can stand here because I have been lucky. The opportunities given me by Moorfields eye hospital and the skill of its professors, nurses and doctors have enabled me to have my sight back. The tragedy is that for thousands that will not be the case. The Government's proposals mean that for many more blindness will be a reality.

Dame Jill Knight: I can assure the House and my right hon. and hon. Friends that there are infinitely better and calmer arguments in favour of retaining the Lords amendment than we have heard in the last few moments. I had thought that the financial advantages to the Government and the NHS of regular health checks were obvious. One reason why some of us are so concerned is that we do not believe that the Government have their sums right on this matter. The earlier that disease can be diagnosed, the cheaper and easier it is to treat and the greater the likelihood that the treatment will cure.

Preventive medicine means having a health check which discovers a disease at an early stage and then having something done about it. Some of us find it strange that the Government say that they will not do this, but will instead spend the money on preventive medicine. We truly believe that eye tests come under the heading of preventive medicine. This is the fence at the top of the cliff rather than the ambulance at the bottom of it. Everyone knows that that is more sensible and infinitely cheaper.

Since the Health Service began there have been many necessary changes, and I am not bothered which party introduced them. The fact remains that charges have been imposed for prescriptions and for various appliances as time has gone by. I entirely agree with that. It seems right and sensible that an individual, having been given a free test and discovering that a requirement exists—whether it be for spectacles, bridge work or whatever—should pay something towards the cost if he can afford to do so.

This debate is a fight to keep tests free and thus encourage people to take them regularly. That principle has never wavered in 40 years of the National Health Service. Other aspects have changed but never that. Tests have always been free, and as a result of that rule thousands of people have had their sight and even their lives saved.

The early signs of many serious diseases reveal themselves in eye tests. I shall not rehearse them all because right hon. and hon. Members are well aware of what those diseases are. Almost 1 million people per year are referred for hospital treatment by optometrists who have discovered something wrong during testing. I understand that that number was the subject of some ridicule by one of my right hon. Friends, who said that not all of the 1 million people referred annually by optometrists ultimately needed treatment. Nevertheless, every single one of them was referred because it was thought that they should have a blood test or be checked for heart disease. The accuracy of an optician's referral is substantially higher than that of the general practitioner.

Earlier today, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State commented on radio or television—and as I did not hear the broadcast myself, I ask him to correct me if I am wrong—that opticians do not test for glaucoma, or that the eye test does not include a test for that condition. I do not know whether that is correct, but I assure my right hon. and learned Friend and all other right hon. and hon. Members that any person seen by a trained optometrist who is judged to be in an at-risk category will be checked. A child being given an eye test will not be checked, but that is no reason to say that the contribution made by opticians is not important.

I turn to one of the Department's own publications, "Health Trends", which points out that 72·5 per cent. of all glaucoma referrals to hospitals are made by opticians, while 23·7 per cent. are by general practitioners. That surely illustrates the value of the opticians' contribution, and the fact that they have saved the sight of many of their patients.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I refer my hon. Friend to a letter that appeared in The Times yesterday from two consultant surgeons at Moorfields Eye hospital, who in referring to glaucoma commented:

"There is no evidence that early diagnosis necessarily halts the progress of the disease, which in any case only leads to visual disability in a small minority of cases."

Dame Jill Knight: My hon. Friend would have been wiser to read The Times today as well, because his point was answered in a letter to it. The two gentlemen who wrote the letter are, I understand, retired and no longer work in that hospital. It is possible to produce this quote and that quote; all that I can say is that the quote that I gave is from the DHSS itself. The figure is accurate and, I should have thought, one that the whole House could accept.

I hope that the House agrees that regular health checks are a good thing and should be encouraged. The Government's case is that charges will not discourage. We heard earlier this evening that checks by dentists showed a drop when extra charges were brought in. Charges have never been made for eye tests, so how can we judge at this stage whether demand will go up or down? What is interesting, however, is that some ophthalmic opticians in the United Kingdom still have figures showing a dramatic increase in eye examinations when they became free in 1947. I know that that is not a complete answer, but if many more people took advantage of the free eye test when it came in, surely it is reasonable to suppose that the reverse may well happen.

Charges for eye tests in Alberta, Canada—as the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) mentioned—were brought in very recently. Incidentally, they were levelled only at those between the ages of 19 and 63: people of pensionable age were not charged. But the drop in demand of 30 or 40 per cent. was so worrying for the Government that they took only 11 months to reverse their decision. My hon. Friends and I ask the Government to listen to what we are saying, because they too may have to reverse their decision if the vote goes the wrong way this evening.

There is no doubt in my mind that there will be a drop in demand, and my view is shared by all the professional organisations—including the British Medical Association, which cannot be said to have a financial or fiscal interest. My right hon. and learned Friend says that most people can afford to pay something for a test, and that those who cannot afford it will not have to pay. It is true that under my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, Britain is more prosperous than ever before, and many more people have money in their pockets. But the House must not fall into the trap of imagining that everyone outside this building finds it as easy as we inside it do to put his hands on £12 or £15—for I warn hon. Members that the price of an eye test will be somewhere between those sums.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Dame Jill Knight: This is the last time.

Mr. Bennett: Surely if people are deterred by the £10 or £12 that my hon. Friend says will be charged they will be equally deterred from buying spectacles if they need them; but she is not advocating free spectacles.

Dame Jill Knight: I do not think that point worth answering. I am saying that the cost of a test for people outside the House will be difficult to meet. Besides, no one has yet pointed out tonight that spectacles will be much more expensive because the Government have been forced to put VAT on them for the first time. Not only will people have to pay for their eye tests, but they will have to pay much more for their glasses.

I am extremely concerned at everything that I have heard this evening about pensioners. It is simply not good enough to say that as a country we spend so much on beer, so much on tobacco and so much on gambling. Not everybody spends money on beer, gambling or tobacco. Many people write to me and come to see me in my surgery about some of the more recent changes, such as those to housing benefit, saying, "I do not gamble, I do not smoke and I do not drink, yet I am finding it a hard job to manage."

I am very troubled about pensioners. Of course my right hon. and learned Friend is quite right to say that not all pensioners are poor. But we should not disregard those who are poor because they are more at risk than anyone else. After pensionable age, eyes are more likely to become diseased, so pensioners are in real need of regular care. Undoubtedly some early diagnoses will be missed, and it will be more expensive. Furthermore, members of the public are well aware that they are entitled to free eye tests in hospitals and many will go there. Like the dentist mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Carttiss), many doctors know when their patients are hard up and some will refer them to hospitals. The silly thing is that it costs the Government nearly three times as much to have an eye test done in the ophthalmic department of an eye hospital than they currently pay to an optometrist in the high street. It costs about £28 outside London and £30 in London, whereas they are paying the opticians £10. Where is the economic sense in that?

My right hon. and learned Friend and some other hon. Members think that optometrists will provide tests free. That is absolutely ludicrous. Why should they do that? Those men and women are professionals who have studied and trained for four or five years. It is like telling a doctor, "You can give your professional services free. Nobody will pay you for your professional services and you can make your money from bandages." That is ridiculous. Why should professional men and women who have studied and worked in their profession be expected to provide their services free?

Furthermore, the Government have already taken steps to ensure that when a patient has had the refraction, he must be given a prescription so that he or she can buy glasses elsewhere. The patient is free to go to the boutique down the road. An optometrist will not be able to say to a patient, "I have tested your eyes. You will buy your glasses here, won't you?" I have a letter from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State saying:

> "Opticians will be prohibited from offering sight tests on condition that any spectacles required are purchased from their business."

The Minister has already knocked one leg off the optician by saying that he can do a refraction and the patient can walk out, so he has done the test free. How can the optician keep his doors open? Furthermore, 25 per cent. to 30 per cent. of people who have an eye test are found not to need glasses. So there are two groups of people who walk out of the opticians, and the optician is paid not a penny. How will he pay his rent, his rates and his receptionist? It is an extraordinary argument.

Finally, is it fair that people who need glasses should subsidise those who do not need glasses? That is what will happen. If the optician is expected to provide free eye tests, he will have to put more money on the glasses that he is able to supply. That does not seem to be fair.

I know that the Government did not wish to put VAT on spectacles but it will greatly increase the cost. Why cannot the money brought in from VAT be used to keep the test free? Tonight we are talking about the breach of a principle that we have held to since the very beginning of the National Health Service. For the first time we are breaching a rule that was introduced for a very good reason.

It appears that the Government have already agreed that ready made spectacles should be available without a prescription. If ever I heard of a way in which to ensure that people do not get their eyes tested, that is it. People will have to pay quite a lot for the eyesight test and more for their glasses, so they may decide to get a ready made pair from Woolworth's.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. The hon. Lady is coming to a conclusion, but it is extremely rude of hon. Members to have loud conversations during her speech.

Dame Jill Knight: I am indeed finishing. I am worried by that final deterrent to getting a test. The free test is important to the Health Service, important to the economy and important to health. I shall go into the Lobby in support of that principle.

Mr. Loyden: The House may have had some sympathy for the Secretary of State at the beginning of the debate as he had to argue an indefensible case, but he did not tell us what merit the Government's proposals have. He has dealt with the issue in a cavalier fashion. When hon. Members have illustrated the dangers of doing away with an important facet of preventive medicine, he has used an argument based on the financing of the NHS.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), I have an interest in glaucoma although, unlike him, I did not know that I had an eye disease. I went for an eye test and was referred by the optometrist to the local eye hospital where glaucoma was diagnosed. I did not know what it was. The same probably goes for about 80 per cent. of the population. I had to go home and read the dictionary. It was rather old and said that glaucoma is a disease of the eye which can result in bursting and total blindness.

Thanks to advances in that segment of the Health Service, that is no longer the case, but early detection is essential if the disease is to be arrested. I sometimes think that the Secretary of State does not understand what it all means. If he does, he is acting in the worst tradition of a Secretary of State responsible for the Health Service. Having listened to the debate, any Secretary of State could not but be persuaded to change his mind.

The argument in favour of the free test has been won tonight. Conservative Members who have listened cannot fail to oppose the Government's proposal. The Secretary of State ought also to bear in mind the fact that people who cannot find the £10 or so that is to be charged are likely to go to eye hospitals such as the one I attend fairly regularly. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman goes to those hospitals, he will realise that cuts in the NHS have meant that people in St. Paul's eye hospital in Liverpool spend between three and five hours in waiting rooms waiting for attention, diagnosis and treatment. If people are deprived of eye tests by opticians, those waiting times will increase as general practitioners refer their patients to hospitals if disease is suspected. This will add to, rather than reduce, the costs of the NHS.

12 midnight

The Secretary of State presented a facile argument to the House. He is doing a disservice to the Health Service by denying people the right to access to a part of preventive medicine. I said earlier that I was dissatisfied with the rate at which the Health Service was moving towards prevention. The Under-Secretary, who allegedly supports preventive medicine, should vote against these measures.

All the aspects which are considered to be an advantage of the Health Service and a part of preventive medicine contribute greatly to people's well-being and health. No Secretary of State has the right to increase the risk of undetected glaucoma and other diseases as this Secretary of State is doing. He is increasing the possibility that a person will end up in hospital for a major operation when his condition could have been detected early and that he will be required to attend the hospital once every six or nine months for treatment.

This is damning evidence of the way in which the Government have treated the National Health Service and further evidence of their aim to change or dismantle it. Every charge that is made is a further erosion of the NHS. Every charge for screening, which is part of preventive medicine, erodes the nature and value of the Health Service and the benefits that have accrued from it. The whole House should reject the flimsy arguments put for the proposals. The Secretary of State has not made out a case on medical grounds. He has referred constantly to market forces. He talks about people going for eye tests merely because they require spectacles. Surely that is the whole point. Of course, they go for spectacles, and then they find out that something is wrong. They are referred to a hospital and treatment takes place. By his decision, the Secretary of State will deprive people of access to a part of preventive medicine. We should condemn him outright for that.

A further chance is being given to Conservative Members. The Opposition cannot defeat the Government and carry the amendments, but Conservative Members should go into the Division Lobby and do exactly that.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): I support the Government on the issue of introducing charges for those who can afford to pay. My reasoning is similar to that which led the Conservative Opposition to support the Labour Government in 1951, when Labour first imposed charges on spectacles and dentures. Labour's Health Minister gave four criteria for introducing charges. The first criterion was that more money should be made available to the NHS. That is exactly the argument which we put forward —there should be more money for use within the Health Service. In 1951, the Labour Government were worried about whether the elderly were getting proper treatment under the Health Service. The Labour Government were concerned about hospital services and waiting lists and whether the hospitals were getting enough money. That is precisely what this proposal is about. It was as true then as it is now.

The Labour Minister went on to say that the charges were useful because they could be imposed in such a way that they would have virtually no effect on seriously ill people. That is also true today. The charges were not costly to collect—then or now. The Labour Minister also said that the charges were useful for deterring abuse, not that there was much abuse of the tests. The same applies today.

I have one reason for saying that the charges are sensible that did not occur to the Minister in 1951: fairness. About 21 million people will be exempt from these charges, which could not be said of the Labour proposals in 1951, or of any subsequent Labour proposals.

The proposals are reasonable because only those who can afford to pay will have to. It is interesting to read in Hansard what Labour Members said in 1951. Nye Bevan described the charges as a mutilation of the NHS. Many other Labour Members suggested that the charges were the end of the Health Service. The Labour Health Minister suggested that the debate was getting out of proportion. It has not changed much since then. Meanwhile, the NHS has gone from strength to strength, the forebodings of Nye Bevan and the warnings of many other Labour Members notwithstanding. It has done so especially under Conservative Governments such as this one.

It is worth noting that almost all the Labour Members who spoke against the charges in the House in 1951 voted for them in the Lobby afterwards.

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): They are all dead now.

Mr. Shaw: I see the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) behind the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton). He is not dead, and I trust that he will vote with the Government tonight, as he did in 1951 when they imposed charges.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): What charges for testing for the identification of the early stages of diseases have any Labour Government brought in?

Mr. Shaw: The principle of charging is exactly the same now as in 1951, when the Labour Government introduced charges. Hugh Gaitskell introduced them on the four criteria I outlined earlier, and on the basis that they represented better use of NHS money. That is the key. The eyesight test does not, in itself, improve people's sight. Taking action, having treatment and wearing glasses do that. Government action to increase the use of spectacles has done far more for improving people's eyesight than anything else.

In 1984 the Labour party fought like mad against the introduction of privatisation and competition in providing spectacles and eyesight testing. Now, more spectacles are sold than before, more people go for tests, and the public are more aware of the efficiency of the private sector. That is why I believe, with my right hon. and learned Friend, that the private sector would absorb the charges over time. It will want to expand to its business. It is in its interests to attract more people for testing.

This measure, given the concessions made by the Government for glaucoma and diabetes sufferers, is fair and correct. The Labour party is dishonest about imposing charges. Many of the founder supporters of the NHS supported the Government who brought in charges in 1951. We now have a better service, whose costs people appreciate better. Many of the fears expressed in 1951 and 1984 have proved unfounded. I have no hesitation in supporting the Government; the Lords amendment should be rejected.

Mr. Fearn: Much of what I said in the earlier debate applies to the introduction of charges for eye tests. I repeat what I said last December: the proposed charges for eye tests make a mockery of the Government's announced intention to improve preventive health care.

The original 1986 Green Paper, page 32 item 4, states:

> "Free NHS sight tests and prescriptions are maintained for everyone who needs them. The sight-test can identify health problems as well as a need for spectacles, so it is important that skilled sight-testing should remain readily available."

I want to know what the Government consider to be "readily available". A charge of £10 will make it virtually impossible for many parents, young people in their first jobs and those in part-time or low-paid employment, many of them elderly, to avail themselves of any sight test. Once again, the Government appear to be acting against the recommendations of all the professional groups and voluntary organisations with experience in this area, all of which claim that the introduction of a charge for the eye test would negate the aim of the promotion of better health. Patients will be deterred, and eye diseases and other conditions will go undetected.

The financial savings that the Government expect to make have also been challenged. It is expected that more patients will visit their general practitioners who, in turn, will have to refer them to eye hospitals. There is the added cost of the treatment of disease and conditions which, if detected, could be remedied at less expense.

We are not simply discussing finance. It is a question of people's lives and the quality of those lives. Are hon. Members willing to introduce proposals that may lead to unnecessary discomfort, poor vision and, in some cases, loss of sight? Are we content that people who may already be hampered by the disabilities that come with age—and that will eventually affect us all—will be put under further stress because they cannot afford £10 or more for a sight test? Are we willing to introduce a measure that may prevent people with diabetes, blood pressure and other conditions from obtaining an early diagnosis and treatment? If this House is interested in prevention as part of the health care of the nation, it will support the Lords amendment and encourage opticians to give more extensive eye examinations and the population to have more regular checks. That could be as effective as other screening programmes.

There have been suggestions that competition in the sight test market will reduce the cost or even eliminate it. I very much doubt that, as most consumers know that nothing comes free these days. Any freebies such as free estimates are always absorbed into the cost of the product, making it more expensive.

On 20 October the Prime Minister, as reported in the "Parliamentary Health Monitor" of 31 October, said that she thought it reasonable for people to pay a modest charge for something fundamental to their health. I am pleased that she recognises that such tests are important to an individual's health, but I question her assessment of a modest charge. It may be modest to someone like the right hon. Lady who enjoys certain comforts, but £10 is not a modest amount to the many people who have far lower incomes.

I remind the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State that the British people already pay charges for their health care through the system of general taxation—not just income tax, but VAT and other taxes. That means that virtually everybody contributes to his or her health care and, as opinion polls show, would be willing to contribute more through that method.

I hope that many Conservative Members will recognise that the introduction of charges will be harmful to prevention and promotion in health care and to the long-term effectiveness of the system. I hope that they will vote with Opposition Members in support of the Lords amendment. In doing so, they will also be sending a message to thousands of their supporters saying that they really care. That, I doubt.

12.15 am

Mr. Hayes: I wish at the outset to deal with the rather unpleasant rumour that an altercation occurred earlier between my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State and myself. What my hon. and learned Friend said was said in the heat of debate and, I understand—because I have known him as a friend for the last five years—was said in fun. I did not take it personally, nor did he, and I hope the matter can rest there. I sincerely hope that there is no wicked press circulation of any rumour about bad blood between us because I assure the House that there is none.

I shall be brief because many of my hon. Friends wish to speak. A peculiarity of tonight's discussion is that we have been dealing with the subject of preventive medicine. While the Bill may be concerned with preventive medicine, the provisions that we have been debating tonight have nothing to do with that. They have everything to do with money.

A year or so ago my right hon. and learned Friend's predecessor was rolled over by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury who, as we know, is an able and talented Minister with a wonderful way of dealing with ferocious Cabinet Ministers. He invites them into his office and for some reason they roll on the floor and let him tickle their tummies while he takes their wallets. The trouble is that those Cabinet Ministers then expect us to bail them out, and we cannot do that.

The Secretary of State has not been a soft touch. He came to the House today with a very good health package indeed, and all credit to him. But to talk of £140 million as a major sum is utterly ridiculous. It is probably equal to the Foreign Office lunch bill. And as for the £27 million which would exempt the 6·5 million pensioners in question, that is probably equal to the Deputy Leader of the Opposition's lunch bill.

I remind hon. Members that it is easy to score party political points. While we have been talking about those who can afford to pay, according to the Royal National Institute for the Blind, 78 per cent. of the population between 78 and 85 years of age have major eye disease, yet 50 per cent. of pensioners still live on or just above the poverty level. The top 20 per cent. of retired households with more than twice as much income as the 80 per cent. below them pull up the national average, and for far too many pensioners who do not qualify for a sight test any charge will act as a significant deterrent.

My right hon. and learned Friend is saying, in effect, "I will take a risk. I do not know how much it will cost ordinary people and pensioners. It could be £10, £15 or absolutely nothing. We will leave it to market forces." But 70 per cent. of optometrists' incomes come from sight tests. From where will the other 30 per cent. come? Clearly, it will be loaded on to the price of spectacles and contact lenses.

About 6·5 million pensioners are particularly at risk. It is absolute nonsense to pooh-pooh the idea that going to the optician is not total screening, and that has disturbed me in relation to some ministerial statements made this evening. Optometrists can diagnose diabetes, glaucoma and cataracts—diseases that are particularly prevalent among those over the age of 60. People over the age of 60 need to have their eyesight tested regularly. In future the poor devils will not know that they have diabetes or glaucoma or cataracts until it is too late.

We should be trying to encourage people to visit their optometrist, optician and dentist. If a charge of £10 or £15 is slapped on to the sight test, as I believe will happen, those pensioners just above income support—whom Ministers tell us will not get any support from the state—will have to make a choice between paying their gas or electricity bills—[HON. MEMBERS: "Don't be silly."] Sadly, some of my hon. Friends are telling me not to be silly. It will be interesting to see how many letters they get from their constituents when it gets colder—perhaps from the same constituents who have been clobbered by the housing benefit changes over the past few months. Some pensioners will have to choose between paying their fuel bills and going to the optometrist to have diagnosed any diseases from which they may be suffering.

This evening we could prevent much pain and suffering, and a great deal of money could be saved for the National Health Service in the long term.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I have listened carefully to the debate since 5.30 this afternoon. It has become clear that this is a debate about priorities and about deterrence. My hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) is wrong to describe the sum of £140 million as trivial. It would pay the total costs of my local health authority six times over, and it would buy two completely new district general hospitals. We must ask ourselves whether we are right to regard expenditure on eye tests for those who can afford them as a priority or whether it would be better to divert that money to other aspects of the Health Service.

The problem goes right back to the beginning of the Health Service in 1948. The other day, I was looking at the minutes of the Labour Cabinet of 13 December 1948. Aneurin Bevan, after only five months—[Interruption.] Hon. Members may not be interested in priorities, but Aneurin Bevan said that Socialism was about the language of priorities. The Labour Cabinet found that in only five months of running the NHS the total cost had risen 30 per cent. above the estimates of July of that year. We have to make difficult decisions about where money should be spent in the Health Service, and I do not believe that it is unreasonable to ask those who can afford it to make a modest contribution towards the cost of their health.

If there is no competition between opticians and if the cost is not subsumed in other charges and through opticians maximising their custom, the charge will still be no more than the equivalent of the cost of five or six pints of beer in the more expensive public houses. It will be equivalent to twice the average weekly spending on tobacco in this country, half the price of a tank of petrol and about three Chinese take-away meals. That is to put the charge in the context of those who can afford it.

We are told that 62 per cent. of people are to pay the charge and 38 per cent. are to be exempt. Sixty-two per cent. is exactly the percentage of the population who own their own homes and it is smaller than the percentage of people who own telephones or cars. Are we really saying that people can afford to own their own homes, cars and telephones, yet that they cannot afford to pay a £10 charge for an eye test? I do not believe that that is a reasonable view to take of how people spend their money.

The argument about deterrence is an arrogant one because it says that working people are so stupid that they are not prepared to spend a small amount of money on looking after their health. I do not believe that that is true. There is no evidence that the increase in prescription charges during the past 10 years has deterred people from taking care of their health. It is a small and useful measure to send money to where it is needed and to ensure that people have a right to make a small contribution towards their health. I support the Government.

Mr. David Blunkett (Sheffield, Brightside): I did not intend to address the House on this issue until the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) had the audacity to talk about three Chinese take-away meals in the same breath as talking about preventing people losing their sight by having an adequate eye test. I believe that that is deplorable. There are many arguments about whether people would pay to have a test to ensure that they were certain that they would receive adequate medical attention for a problem that they had experienced. We shall not further debate in the House by lowering it to the question whether people will buy consumer goods as opposed to having their eyes tested.

Many people who are worried about a problem—whether it is something that has occurred in old age or something that has come over them while they are young—face the trauma of deciding whether to consult their GP or to have their eyes tested because they are uncertain whether it is a serious matter or a passing phase. As many people have said over the past few weeks, if money can be saved by ensuring that a problem is picked up during its early stages by giving people the opportunity of having their eyes tested easily and cheaply and either being reassured or having action taken at a stage when long term problems can be prevented, no one in the House or in this country should deny that person the right to a free eye test. It does matter what happens to other people around us. We have obligations and responsibilities to help each other—not just those who are deserving and responsible because they do not spend their money on three Chinese meals. What happens to the person living next door and to the person sitting next to us tonight is the responsibility of all of us. If by spending a small amount of money we can prevent the deterioration of a person's sight and money being spent on putting right long-term problems, every hon. Member, whatever his politics or ideology, has an obligation to vote to defeat these charges.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: We can sum up the debate by asking two questions. Do we wish to encourage people to have their eyes tested or to discourage them? I think that the question answers itself: we want to encourage them. The evidence for that has not been challenged. Secondly, do we want to lengthen the waiting list for out-patient clinics at ophthalmic hospitals or at the ophthalmic departments of general hospitals, or do we not? The answer to that is clearly and obviously no. On both those bases, therefore, we should vote to sustain their Lordships' amendment.

12.30 am

Mr. Thurnham: I speak in support of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State because we know for a fact that this measure will raise £80 million for the National Health Service and we have to weigh that in the balance with the theory that the charge will be a deterrent. I do not believe that it will be a deterrent, but there is no way that we can prove that. I do not believe that there is such a thing as a "free" test because the tests have to be paid for and the cost recovered in one way or another.

Those who argue that charges are a deterrent in one sense must also accept that they are deterrents in another sense because if the money is not raised from the people who benefit from the test, it will have to be raised from the taxpayer. There is then a deterrent for those who have to earn the income with which to pay the taxes. We know what happens when the Labour party is in power—we have taxes——

Mr. Christopher Hawkins (High Peak): If my hon. Friend really believes his argument, should we not charge people to go to a general practitioner, or charge for cervical smear tests and for breast screening on the ground that that would raise money for the Health Service?

Mr. Thurnham: My point is that if we have taxes at the level that the Labour party had when it was in power, we know exactly what happens to the economy. The Labour party was the party that had to cut hospital building. The Conservative party is the party that raises the funds to build the hospitals. In 1977 the International Monetary Fund had to bail the country out. That was when hospitals faced cuts.

It is for those reasons that I support this measure, which will raise more money to enable the hospitals that we need to be built. I have weighed that in the balance with the theory that charges might be a deterrent. I believe that those people who feel that they want a test will go to have that test and they will pay for it because they are benefiting from it. They will pay for it either directly or through charges for their spectacles, if they need them. If anybody is deterred from seeking a test, I imagine that it will be the 25 per cent. who currently go only to find that they do not need spectacles. It is for that reason that I support my right hon. and learned Friend in raising funds by this measure which can do nothing but improve the National Health Service for the public.

Mr. John Hunt (Ravensbourne): I have found tonight's debate a profoundly depressing parliamentary occasion. I am bound to say that I regard the proposal to charge for sight testing, at whatever level that charge is eventually set, as mean and misguided. In spite of the confidence and conviction of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State that charges will not be a deterrent, I believe that they will serve as a deterrent to those most at risk.

I am sure that it will not have escaped the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend that the opposition to these proposals from this side of the House spans the spectrum of our party. Wets and drys are for once united in a common cause and are speaking with one voice in defence of preventive medicine. That is a point of considerable significance. I am surprised and sorry that, faced with this expression of deep and genuine concern among a wide range of the members of our party, Ministers have shown such a reluctance to respond to those genuine concerns.

I advise my right hon. Friends on the Front Bench that charging for eye tests is destined to do maximum political and social damage with minimum benefit, either to the coffers of the Treasury or to the reputation of our Ministers and our Government.

I know that some of my hon. Friends are especially concerned with the impact of the charges on the lower paid. I would certainly not dismiss that concern, but my special and specific concern tonight is with pensioners and with the impact of the charges upon them. We know—we have been told—that to exempt that category will cost £27 million per year. However, I have already told my right hon. and learned Friend that in terms of the Treasury's book-keeping, that is petty cash.

Of course, we all welcome the additional funds for the National Health Service announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor this afternoon, but surely that begs the question. If we can find an extra £2 billion for the National Health Service and if we can make massive debt repayments, surely we can find the £27 million that is necessary to exempt the pensioners from this charge? That is the answer to the argument by my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) about priorities.

However, it appears that, for the sake of a minimal saving in public expenditure, we are prepared to put at risk the sight of the elderly. This is not crying wolf. Let us make no mistake about it. The elderly are particularly vulnerable and are likely to suffer from the diseases about which we have heard—glaucoma, cataracts and hypertension, all of which can be detected at an early stage by regular sight tests. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) has reminded us that almost one million people a year are referred for further medical investigation following an eye test. I understand that more than half of those are over 60. That shows the potential danger of introducing this charge.

We are told that a charge of £10 or £15 will not deter and that the Government object in principle to across-the-board benefits. I can say in answer only that, from my experience, the more wealthy pensioners seek private treatment anyway, but anyone who has regular contact with the elderly knows that, even if they are well off, they fear for the future. They watch every penny and avoid spending money whenever they can. My worry is that, faced with a charge of £10 or more for an eye test, they will keep putting it off. They will make do with their glasses and, in the process, often serious and irreparable damage will be done to their sight.

That is why, even at this late stage, I beg Ministers to think again about this policy. Unless they do, there is no way that I can go into the Lobby with them tonight.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): Earlier this evening, the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) told us of his experience when, in his twenties, he lost his sight. Like every other hon. Member, I listened carefully to what he said, but if I believed that, because of these proposals, the care that he received at Moorfields eye hospital would be withdrawn and the condition that he brought to our attention would not have been brought to anyone's notice, I would not vote for the proposal. However, I do not believe that that is the case. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that, although what he said to the House was harrowing, personal and important, it is not relevant to tonight's debate.

Mr. Flannery: The hon. Gentleman, with the best of motives, has completely misjudged the issue. My hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) was talking about a different matter. We are discussing those people who go to an optician, perhaps for spectacles, and discover that they have glaucoma. My hon. Friend was talking about something peculiar to himself and he obtained the necessary treatment.

Mr. Hughes: I shall make clear later my views about that matter. The hon. Gentleman makes an important point and I shall not duck the issue. If he is not satisfied, he can deal with the matter in his speech.

I want to refer to the Health and Social Security Act 1984. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has quoted what Opposition spokesmen said at that time. There can be no doubt that the arguments advanced by the Labour party were fundamentally flawed. Opposition Members said that, as a result of the measure, people would go blind and the price of glasses would increase. [Interruption.] If Opposition Members do not believe me, they should read the relevant debates. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said that, as a result of the measure, many people's eyesight would suffer and that the Government's proposals would reduce choice, abandon consumer protection and put up the price of glasses. Nothing could be further from the truth. We know that prices have been reduced in the high streets while consumer choice has increased.

The Labour party was not alone in getting it wrong in 1984. The arguments that were advanced by opticians and the ophthalmic trade at that time and those that they are advancing now are almost identical. They were wrong in 1984, and in my judgment they are wrong now. In 1983, Mr. John Thorpe, on behalf of the Society of Opticians, said:

> "Spectacles may be cheaper, except for those who cannot see."

That argument was wrong then and I submit that it is wrong now.

Only two years after the 1984 legislation was enacted, glasses sales increased by 10 per cent. During the same period the number of eye tests increased by over 1 million. The nub of the argument—I take up the point which the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) made in his intervention—is whether people will be able to pay the proposed charge, but it is my judgment that the charge will not be levied. The 1984 Act, which revolutionised the industry, has done much to bring greater consumer choice and reduced prices. It has led to many major companies slogging it out in the market place to make sure that they get their share of the market. Those who benefit from their struggle are those who need spectacles. Companies will not want to relinquish their market share and I believe that they will offer free eye tests.

We are talking of a profession that guards its standards carefully, which means that it will offer proper eyesight tests. Anyone who suggests otherwise is insulting the opticians' profession. I believe that the Lords amendment will be rejected and that the proposals of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State will lead to wider availability of eyesight tests. The Bill will act as an incentive for the public to get their eyes tested, not as a disincentive. [Laughter.] The predictable laughter of Opposition Members is the same ill-informed laughter, with the same ill-informed comments, that we heard from them during our consideration of the 1984 measure. They did not understand the market then. They did not understand what consumers wanted or what was happening. It is clear that they still do not understand the market. If Labour Members want to speak, let them make their own contributions to the debate.

I support my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State. When we reflect on this measure, we shall understand that he was right. His judgment is good and it will lead to opticians providing a better service.

Mr. Michael Irvine (Ipswich): The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), as he sometimes does, let his guard drop for a moment when he dismissively referred to the £70 million that the proposed charges will save as a "modest sum". That is the kind of cavalier attitude to public expenditure savings which in the long term does real damage to the National Health Service.

Over the years the NHS has suffered considerable capital investment damage through financial indiscipline and a cavalier attitude to public expenditure savings. The fact that the charges will save £70 million is not to be scoffed at. That money will be ploughed back into primary health care and will provide £70 million of extra resources for the NHS.

The hon. Member for Livingston should be aware that the merit of the charges does not stop there. If we provide services for free, be they medical or optical, there will be waste of public resources which could be better used elsewhere.

At that point the debate links up to the very serious matter of whether people who need eye tests will be deterred from taking them because of lack of means. The 36 per cent. who will be exempted are all right, but it is wrong to look at the remaining 64 per cent. simply as a group of affluent people. That is not the case. Certainly many of them are affluent and can well afford to meet the fees. They should certainly meet the fees. However, I acknowledge that there is a not insignificant number of people who are just above the exemption limit for whom there is a risk that the charges will prove a deterrent.

The competitive effect of the charges will come into force here. They will have such an effect because they will introduce market forces into an area where those forces are needed. To date the optical profession has had things too easy. It has had a captive amount of money from the Government for some time. It will now have to compete in the market place. As sure as night follows day it will drop its prices. Some within the profession will offer free optical tests. I confidently forecast that the Government will save £70 million and there will also be the widespread availability of free optical tests. Market forces will come to bear and the charges will have a beneficial effect.

I ask my hon. Friends who are teetering on the brink of rebellion and are not quite sure whether to go over the edge to consider those factors carefully. My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), who is in that position, wants to make things clearer.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Does my hon. Friend think that some of the opticians will give free washing machines—[Interruption.]

Mr. Irvine: I would not extrapolate the argument quite that far, but my hon. Friend has got the general thrust. On that happy note, I conclude my remarks.

Mr. Mellor: I trust that the mood of euphoria that my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Irvine) has so successfully created may be continued for the remaining minutes of the debate.

[Mr. Mellor]

I begin by thanking my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) for the friendly comments that he incorporated in his speech. I entirely reciprocate them and for my part I am sorry if the badinage between us appeared a little more serious than it habitually is in the conversations that we have had together over the years.

The House should focus on a further example of increased provision within the Health Service when considering the background to the issue; one in which a considerable amount of progress has been made in treating fundamental and difficult eye disorders that arise within our society. Take, for instance, the distressing problem of cataracts. In 1976 there were 40,000 cataract operations. I am not making a party point. I am talking about the development of the service. By 1985 there were 59,000 cataract operations. Our target is to take that up to 70,000 by 1990 and I am confident that that will be achieved.

It is not just a question of ensuring that the treatment is available to deal with these difficult conditions. It is also important that we increase people's awareness of the significance of their eyes and the importance of not taking their eyes for granted, even when it appears that there is no reason to consider that they are in difficulties.

That is why, once again, the resources that the Government are making available, above and beyond what was made available by any of their predecessors, are aimed at trying to encourage eye awareness by proper promotional campaigns and to ensure that there is a proper supply of professional people at all levels of the service able and willing to deal with the rectification of these problems.

That is the way forward, the way in which we can ensure that the maximum number of avoidable eye conditions are detected early. That is the way we shall ensure that the community genuinely sees the necessity of having regular checks. Once again we are in exactly the same situation that we were in with dental charges. While a lot of people do go, even more do not, and it is overall eye awareness that needs to be raised.

Essentially, the argument comes down to this. The Government believe that against a background of over 20 million exemptions and the fact that most people will require an eye test only every two years—the recommended period—while many people leave it perfectly safely for three years, a £10 charge is not a burden in an increasingly prosperous society.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): My hon. and learned Friend referred to deterrence and the debate hangs to a considerable extent on whether people will be deterred from having eyesight tests. Will his Department have access to information about the number of eye tests being carried out, and, if it is discovered after a reasonable period that people are being deterred by any action taken by the House tonight, will the matter be looked at again?

Mr. Mellor: I appreciate that a number of people, like my hon. Friend, are worried about the matter. Yes, statistics will continue to be kept of NHS eye tests—those that continue for the exempt 20 million. We shall, by samples and other scientific ways, find out whether the number of eye tests in the rest of the community is growing on the same basis that it has been growing in recent years.

Of course, all this turns on the assessment that sensible people make of the evidence. Plainly, in such issues it is perfectly reasonable for one group of people to arrive at one conclusion and for others to arrive at another. I shall later say why I believe that what we have decided is based on a proper inference drawn from previous occasions when, for instance, we deregulated the optical industry.

Clearly, we shall want to monitor the consequences of the change. Of course we recognise the need to reconsider any aspects of these arrangements should the evidence require it. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) and other right hon. and hon. Members who are concerned about this aspect will accept that that is said in good faith and that it will be carried through by the Government.

The opportunities offered to the profession will give opticians the prospect of building on the skill and experience of optometrists in offering the kind of service that the community needs, so encouraging people to make more use of their services. I quote from an article by Marvyn Slater, a Fellow of the British College of Optometrists, published in The Daily Telegraph on 18 October:

> "With the prospect of a revitalised private service on the horizon optometrists can stop relying upon spectacle sales and offer their unique skills—the management of healthy eye disorders, visual ergonomics, visual and neurologically related educational disorders, industrial consultancy, low vision aids and assessment—to the 50 per cent. of the population who will be ineligible for NHS sight tests."

I feel sure that he is pointing the way to an altogether more satisfactory future for optometrists than having them remain imprisoned within the framework that the present NHS imposes upon them. It will give them a chance to break out and to make their presence felt.

Why are the Government so confident that this measure can proceed, liberate resources to go elsewhere in the Health Service, and not cause difficulties in a prosperous society? It is because we have been here before. We have been through the battle in respect of the deregulation of opticians and the various dire predictions that were made then. I shall not quote them now, but suffice it to say that concern was expressed not only from the Opposition Benches but by my right hon. and hon. Friends as well.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston will recall the speeches that she made on the subject, when she expressed great fear about the consequences of that development. I say to my hon. Friend that I hope that she and others will take comfort from what has happened. It has shown that the predictions were not accurate and that the Government have been able to create an altogether better market and an altogether more satisfactory service than before. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] I detect a degree of scepticism among one or two of my hon. Friends and so I shall give them the facts upon which I rely for that observation.

First, although three quarters of the people who go for tests already wear spectacles and so know that they will have to pay, the number of tests is up by 1 million over that period. Secondly, sales of spectacles have increased by 10 per cent. which is a sign of the market's increased buoyancy. Thirdly, there have been considerable benefits from price reductions of a most marked kind, which have been in the consumer's interest, and wider choice.

The figures are very striking. The average cost of private spectacles in 1981 was £59·26. In 1986, five years on, it was £57·88. In other words, there was a reduction in the average price of spectacles over those five years. Put another way, the average cost for NHS and private spectacles taken together fell from £44 in 1981 to £31 in 1985; a 28 per cent. drop in real terms. It is on that basis that we make the predictions we do about the consequences of this latest change.

Testing for glaucoma clearly concerns many people. My hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston said that, whenever a person of the appropriate age was eye tested, a glaucoma test is also made. I do not want to take issue with that. I believe that there is concern about whether a test under the new system—a "deregulated" or "privatised" test—will include the test for glaucoma. We have powers under the Bill to make requirements about what the tests should comprise. I take very seriously the points made about glaucoma, and we shall want to discuss them with the professions and other interested parties to ensure the right result.

I am

The debate is about how far in a mature and prosperous society people are prepared to pay modest charges for a service that most recognise will involve extra costs as soon as they embark on it. The difficulty in which my right hon. and learned Friend and his Ministers find themselves is that, even against a background of the most generous settlements that there have been for increased funding of the NHS, a range of competing priorities and demands must still be met: expensive high-technology medicine, the increasing requirements of an aging population and the need for enhanced psychogeriatric care.

I assure the House that, although my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has generously made the money available, it took a great deal of persuasion, as my right hon. and learned Friend said earlier. The case had to be made that the money would be properly targeted on improved patient services and not swallowed up in inefficiency and bureaucracy, or used for purposes that no longer required a heavy public subsidy. If we are unable to make these savings, surely some other choice will have to be made, and it is difficult to know how easy the decision will be. I ask my colleagues who oppose us at present to think very carefully about that aspect.

I also appreciate how difficult the issue is seen to be by many of my hon. Friends on the Back Benches. The appointment of my right hon. and learned Friend to the Department of Health was greeted very warmly by my colleagues. With his Ministers he has had the opportunity to look carefully at policy proposals for the future, and to consider what we shall have to pay to make the NHS work efficiently and to try to clear up the many problems such as excessively long waiting lists and inconsistencies in key performances between one district and another.

I hope very much that before casting their vote against my right hon. and learned Friend my hon. Friends will give thought to his categorical judgment that we can safely make the decision we are making, and that any alternative will cause grave difficulties to the NHS. As the second successive Secretary of State who has made this proposal, my right hon. and learned Friend should perhaps be entitled to the benefit of the doubt from the sceptics. I hope that in a spirit of common decency towards those who have been entrusted with such a difficult job they will think long and hard before making his job more difficult, and will allow his judgment to win the day.

On that basis, and in confidence that the evidence points in this direction, I ask the House to join us in rejecting the Lords decision and restoring the position that existed when the Bill left the Commons six months ago.

Question put, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Clause 13

General ophthalmic services and optical appliances

Lords amendment: No. 29, in page 17, line 45, at end insert—

(3) The following subsections shall be inserted after subsection (1) of section 21 of the Opticians Act 1958 (restriction on sale and supply of optical appliances)—

"(1A) Subsection (1) above does not apply to an excluded sale.

(1B) In subsection (1A) above "excluded sale" means a sale for a person not under the age of 16 of spectacles which have two single vision lenses of the same positive spherical power not exceeding 4 dioptnes, where the sale is wholly for the purpose of correcting, remedying or relieving the condition known as presbyopia; and for the purposes of this subsection lenses are to be taen to have the same positive spherical power if the difference between them is within the tolerances relating to the power of such lenses specified from time to time in the British Standard Specification."

(4) In subsection (2) of that section for the words "the foregoing subsection" there shall be substituted the words "Subsection (1) of this section."

Mrs. Currie: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendment No. 41.

Mrs. Currie: Amendment No. 29, and Nos. 41 and 43 which apply to Northern Ireland, will allow the sale of reading glasses to adults without a prescription. In the other place that principle was agreed in Committee following a free vote on the Government side. However, as the amendment tabled by the noble Lord Winstanley had certain defects and did not provide a safeguard for children under 16, the Government brought forward a tidying-up amendment to give effect to the wishes of another place.

The arguments about the sale of reading glasses without a prescription have raged for many years, with each side putting its case forcefully. It is generally accepted, however, that wearing self-selected glasses will not harm adults' eyes, even if they are the wrong strength. I remind the House that the original motion was tabled in another place by Lord Winstanley, who is a qualified doctor, and that he has been supported publicly by such people as Professor Barrie Jay of the Moorfields eye hospital, who says that there is no evidence from other countries such as the United States, where off-the-shelf spectacles have long been available, that people are harmed if they choose glasses that do not give them perfect sight correction.

Indeed, many other countries including New Zealand, Holland, Italy, Sweden, Canada and almost all states of the USA allow the sale of reading glasses, seemingly without adverse consequences for the populations' eyes. If there were any evidence of significant problems in, for example, the United States, where there is derestriction, I would have thought that the movement would have been very much in the other direction.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does the Minister accept that if the amendment stands, people can go into a shop, buy spectacles without a prescription and so bypass what many believe to be an essential eye check during which major medical problems may be diagnosed?

Mrs. Currie: Yes, that is exactly what is being suggested. The concern underlying the hon. Gentleman's quesion is probably taken care of by some of the research in the United States. For example, in a study of 15,000 eye-glass wearers in states where reading glasses are now sold over the counter, 79 per cent. of those questioned said that they still had professional eye examinations. We believe that more competition, lower prices and more convenience will far outweigh some of the difficulties that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. That is also why the Government brought forward an amendment to ensure that there is particular protection for, for example, children under 16.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: How will the 16-year-old cut-off point be policed? We must bear in mind the absurd difficulty of preventing people under 18 buying alcohol from off-licences, which is the best example of lack of policing.

Mrs. Currie: It would be illegal to sell such spectacles to children under 16, in the same way as it is illegal to sell them a number of other things. I have not the least doubt that opticians, especially as led by the General Optical Council, will keep an eye on these matters.

I repeat that we have no evidence that purchasing the wrong spectacles can cause harm to the eyes. The people whom we hope to help by accepting the amendment are those in my age group, the 40s, when eyesight begins to deteriorate very slightly but where evidence of eye disease is extremely rare.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Does the hon. Lady accept that people drive wearing glasses? Does she further accept that there can be a difference between one eye and the other and that that cannot be catered for when buying glasses over the counter?

Mrs. Currie: I am not sure of the relevance of the hon. Gentleman's first point. I certainly hope that anyone with defective eyesight drives wearing glasses. The hon. Gentleman is right about eyes being different. I understand that the proposal would allow only spectacles with both lenses of the same strength. That is a safeguard as anyone who found such an eye difference when they tried to purchase the spectacles would be well advised to have an eye test.

As I have said, in the United States where people have to pay for their eye tests, the overwhelming majority of those who purchase spectacles go to their advisers and have the appropriate tests. There is no reason why that should not be the case in this country. I merely offer the House a comment made in the leader in the New York Times on 16 May.

"Q: What's the difference between $60 reading glasses prescribed by an optometrist in New York and a $12 pair from Woolworth's in New Jersey?

A: $48."

In our view, the Lords have been wise in their approach to this subject, and we commend their amendment to the House.

1.30 am

Mr. Galbraith: The Minister is being somewhat disingenuous in trying to pretend that the argument against the amendment is based on whether the spectacles one gets may or may not affect one's sight simply because those spectacles may or may not make the right correction. The true argument against it is based in part on our earlier discussion about whether people will obtain glasses without prescription and therefore without having had their eyes tested.

We have already rehearsed the arguments about the value of eye tests and I will not repeat them. Without wishing to quote any scare stories over this issue, I must emphasise that it is essential that people having trouble with their eyesight should have their eyes examined by a properly qualified person before obtaining spectacles.

The amendment will undoubtedly result in many people not having their eyes properly tested, so leading to a deterioration in sight, due not to the refractive index within the spectacles but because some people will have ocular disease which will not be diagnosed.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone): Because of the courteous and helpful replies that I have received from Ministers, I no longer speak with the acute anxiety that I felt when I first became aware of the amendment. But I still retain more than lingering traces of deep unease, and they require further assurances if they are to be eradicated completely.

I remain wholly in favour of the charges which we have voted to introduce and I still do not believe that they will act as a serious deterrent. But in this case the Government appear to be saying that people should have a prescription and a proper eye test because that is good preventive medicine, while at the same time saying that it is not necessary to have an eye test.

The Government's endorsement of the lack of necessity for an eye test will be a greater deterrent to people to have eye tests than any charge, however high. I say that because if people need new spectacles, or need glasses for the first time and they have no choice but to get a prescription, they will have their eyes tested whatever the charge.

An exaggerated picture may have been painted of the incidence of eye disease as opposed to eye defects which can be discovered during an optician's test, but it is common ground that a significant percentage of eye disease is diagnosed in such tests.

Under the amendment, a person aged 40 to 50 who has had consistently good sight but finds difficulty with reading, or some other minor difficulty, will probably say, "I do not need a prescription. I will simply buy a pair of glasses that will magnify." Even if the difficulty that that person has been experiencing is indicative of something more serious, he or she will not find out.

It has been pointed out that no person's two eyes are alike. Buying ready-made spectacles across the counter will mean that people will buy glasses with two lenses exactly alike.

It would be foolish to disregard the medical opinion which suddenly says that it is not so important to have a prescription, and that the wrong spectacles will not do much damage. Nevertheless, I am uneasy. If it is true that no damage is done to adult sight by wearing the wrong type of spectacles—given that they are simple magnifying spectacles—why were we so insistent when the sale of frames was deregulated that the lenses for them had to continue to be prescribed? Has medical opinion changed so radically that the argument has suddenly been stood on its head? If we are so convinced that there is no problem with adult sight, why did not the Government propose the amendment, rather than leaving it to the other place to do so? I issue a simple challenge to the practitioners who say that adult sight will not be damaged. Would they be prepared to put the wrong spectacles on their nose and wear them consistently for any length of time, and if they did, would they be confident that they would do themselves no long-term damage?

I fear the danger that if we get into the habit of thinking that we can buy spectacles without prescription and that it will do no harm, a market for second-hand glasses will develop. At that point we shall lose control. It will no longer be a case of telling people that they can buy only magnifying glasses. We shall lose control over the type of glasses sold. Many people will be deceived into thinking that they need simple magnification—nothing more than could be achieved with an ordinary hand-held magnifying glass—when in fact they need something more sophisticated. They will go without the spectacles that they need and when they find after two years that their sight has deteriorated they may think that all that they need is a stronger pair of magnifying spectacles. Once again they will buy them without prescription.

I do not wholly disregard the medical opinion that the problem may not be as serious as all that, but I seek some assurances. First, will the money which is rightly being rechannelled into preventive medicine include money for an immense education campaign about the value of the eye test? Will people be told that prescribed glasses are preferable to those that one can buy over the counter? Secondly, can we have a guarantee that the arrangements will be properly policed to ensure that only simple magnifying glasses and nothing more sophisticated are sold over the counter? Will any provision be made to discourage those who are returning for their second pair of non-prescribed spectacles—perhaps a statutory Government health warning that non-prescribed spectacles may, in the end, damage their sight? Will something be done to encourage people to choose properly prescribed lenses as a first step?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I propose to intervene briefly. I had intended to speak at length but I do not think that that would be helpful given that it is 1.40 am. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

In our earlier debate, the Secretary of State said that on the previous occasion on which these matters had come before the House he had been right. He maintained that when deregulation was being discussed by the House in 1983 he countered a number of predictions made from the Labour Front Bench and that he was right. Perhaps he was right, but there is a distinction between that debate and this. On that occasion, all the right hon. and learned Gentleman's hon. Friends supported him. He may be surprised to learn that a number of Opposition Members —including me—also supported his position on deregulation in 1983. We argued the matter on the Labour Benches, but our view did not prevail. On this occasion, however, Conservative Members are divided and the Opposition are united. I do not think that the Secretary of State has understood the importance of that difference.

The Minister referred to the market in non-prescribed spectacles in the United States of America. I was in America a couple of months ago and I bought two pairs of spectacles in a Washington store. I paid $7 for one pair and $15 for another—the equivalent of about £5 and £9. It struck me when I bought those glasses how cheap they were, so when I returned to the United Kingdom I invited a gentleman from, I think, the College of Ophthalmists to the Commons to tell me how one could justify spectacles being so much cheaper in the United States of America. He said that his organisation was not, in principle, opposed to the sale of cheap spectacles.

Although I shall be voting in the same way as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight), I am not here to argue against the supply of free spectacles. If people want cheap spectacles, let them have them. The question is whether they should be allowed to have cheap spectacles without being given a prescription or some form of sight test. Should we allow a select group of people through this important net during which a medical condition might be diagnosed with not only long term implications for them, but for the Exchequer, in that the National Health Service may have to treat them. We are not arguing against the need for an over-the-counter market to develop in cheap spectacles. I accept that and if opticians believe in real competition, they, too, would support that principle. What they are saying is that people should have a prescription to buy them.

Perhaps a prescription can be modified so that it refers to magnification in terms of two, two and a half, three or whatever. It might be simplified to the extent that the person for whom spectacles are being prescribed can go to the opticians or to Underwoods, Boots or Woolworth's and buy a pair of spectacles over the counter. The point is that we must retain the net through which people must go before they are allowed to buy spectacles freely in the market, because the net is so precious in identifying disease.

I am sorry that so many hon. Members have left the House, and we will have difficulty, clearly, commanding a majority in the Lobby. Even at this late stage, I believe that the Minister should be aware of the concerns that have been expressed. When she replies to the debate, will she comment on the statistics that she gave us earlier? She said that an opinion poll had been carried out in the United States which showed that 79 per cent. of those who were buying spectacles on the over-the-counter market and in stores had had sight tests. That begs two questions. What about the 21 per cent. who had not? That means that millions of people have by-passed sight tests in America. Does the Minister accept that there may be millions of people who have slipped through the net?

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): I wish to disclose an interest, because I was recently consulted by the Federation of Ophthalmic and Dispensing Opticians on this matter. I want to probe the reason given by the Minister for supporting the Lords amendment. It seems to me that she rested her case for this substantial change in the Government's policy on the research carried out in the United States. Can she tell the House when that research was carried out, what the research showed and why it was sufficiently powerful to change long-established Government procedure on this matter? As the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) said, as long ago as 1983 the then Secretary of State for Social Services, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Fowler), made it clear that the determination of the Government was not to bow to pressure from those who advocated the lifting of all restrictions on the dispensing of spectacles to adults.

[Mr. Michael Shersby]

The Office of Fair Trading also considered the matter and reported that if Ministers felt that the potential health risks outweighed competition benefits, it would consider the alternative of derestricting dispensing provided that spectacles could only be sold against a prescription issued in, say, the previous two or three years. That view was expressed in 1983.

Earlier this year, in fact in Committee, my right hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton) stated:

"we are clear that the law does not, nor is it our intention that it should, allow people to walk off the street into any shop that cares to display spectacles and to buy spectacles that have no relation to some measurement of what their eyes need."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 11 February 1988; c. 660.]

1.45 am

Those are two clear statements of Government policy, by the former Secretary of State and by the former Minister for Health, made only a few months ago.

I should like to make it clear to the House that, as I understand it, the Federation of Ophthalmic and Dispensing Opticians does not claim that ready-made spectacles are harmful to the eyes. It is concerned about missed eye examinations. Its serious objection to ready-made spectacles for adults over 40 is that almost inevitably such a person would be likely to miss an opportunity for a proper eye examination, yet the very people likely to buy ready-made spectacles are presbyopes over the age of 40 for whom a health screening check is most important.

Even at such a late hour, these are important points and I shall be extremely grateful if my hon. Friend will explain to the House a little more clearly why there has been such a substantial reversal of long-standing Government policy and why, on the basis of unspecified American research, it is proposed to agree with the Lords amendment.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): It is significant that all the Back-Bench speeches in the debate have been hostile to the Government's view. It is interesting that the two speeches from the Conservative Back Benches have been from hitherto noted Government loyalists. That tells me, the House and the country that there is considerable all-party disquiet about the Government's refusal to accept the amendment. That disquiet arises from the fact that an amendment previously supported by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) might well have enabled us to avoid this debate as it would have accepted that free eye tests mean that people are not reluctant to go to their optician to get a professional view and a professional prescription, which they can then take to a supermarket-type facility.

I am particularly critical of the price of spectacles in this country. It is interesting that all the Government's moves to reduce the price of spectacles have in my view and in that of my constituents had little impact on high street shops.

The experience of America appears to be unreliable. I believe that the Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), gave the game away when she talked about the quality of the people passing judgment in the United States. She did not talk about optometrists or about qualified opticians. Her words were "eye advisers". What qualifications do those "eye advisers" have to dispense spectacles? I suggest that such people do not have any qualifications——

Mrs. Currie: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman heard me. I called in evidence Professor Jay, ex-president of the Faculty of Ophthalmologists and a consultant at Moorfields eye hospital, who has said that there is no evidence that choosing such spectacles causes any medical problems.

Mr. Griffiths: The Minister's comments are irrelevant. She has not sought to refute the fact that, as the record will show, she referred to eye advisers, not qualified opticians or optometrists. That betokens a phrase to denote people who are not qualified and are selling cameras or films over the counter one day and are calling themselves eye advisers and selling glasses the next, as if they were operating a fast food franchise. We might have some faith in eye advisers if they were qualified and could ensure that prescriptions were made up to suit people's eyes, but the Government deliberately voted tonight to ensure that that does not happen free of charge. That explains the opposition to the measure and why no Conservative Back Benchers have spoken in favour of it.

The Minister has not taken into account the difference in traditions between this country and the United States. In the United States, people are accustomed to paying for glasses and eye tests. The United States has never boasted a free health service when people need it, paid for by taxes. People in the United States must look out for themselves and look to their own resources. That tradition may serve people in the immediate future, but the incidence of glaucoma and other eye diseases may be higher in the United States than it is here because people are not screened so early. I choose my words advisedly and say "may". If the Minister is prepared to present evidence to the House—I give her the opportunity to do so—I will withdraw the word "may". However, as she is not rising to intervene, I am minded to change the word "may" and say, "The likely fact is that the incidence is greater."

Since the war, we have had a tradition of free eye tests which has been supported by all political parties, until now, the profession and the country. The Government will save peanuts as a result of the measure that they forced through earlier by so narrow a majority. People in this country are accustomed to free eye tests. Conservative Members are right to say that nothing is free because those tests are paid for through taxes.

People are entitled to one professional consultation a year to have their eyes tested. Without that, the sales of glasses over the counter will not be a boon to the country, but will deceive many people into thinking that they are receiving medical treatment when they are being conned by unqualified over-the-counter salesmen. That will result in increased eye disease and increased cost to the National Health Service, as diseases will be detected much later than at present, and the people who will have to pick up the bills will be the taxpayers.

Dame Jill Knight: My name appears against amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 29, and I have waited patiently to speak to it. I do not want to detain the House for long, but I wish to make one or two points that have not yet been drawn to the attention of the House. I remember vividly—this happened when I first became a Member of this place—a Bill that was moved and piloted through the House by the late Sir Ronald Russell, who represented Wembley. The arguments advanced against the then common practice of having ready-made spectacles available in Woolworth stores, for example, were extremely powerful. Sir Ronald had no difficulty in securing a place for his Bill on the statute book.

It is extremely unfortunate that we are going back on Sir Ronald's arguments and his Bill. In those days we thought that it was wrong for ready-made spectacles to be available for purchase in ordinary retail outlets, and it is sad that that principle is now being overthrown. Ministers made firm promises during the early stages of the Bill's passage through Parliament that this very thing would not happen. Clause 14(1) has been amended by the Government to require the Secretary of State to regulate all the duties that are to be performed in a sight test. What is the point of that if there is not to be a sight test in many instances?

Practically everyone on earth has two eyes that are different. Another fact, and a continuing one, is that every two lenses in every pair of ready-made glasses are the same. It is not possible for someone to pick up a pair of ready-made glasses that meet his or her needs exactly. I have far too much respect for my eyes to risk damaging them by wearing ready-made glasses. Is it certain that the provision of ready mades will deter the public from bothering to arrange eye tests and obtaining proper glasses.

When the Bill is enacted and implemented, the cost of an eye test will increase, and the public will be able to pick up a pair of glasses in a Woolworth store, for example, or from a barrow in the local market. What sort of arrangement is that?

Clause 13, as amended, excludes the sale of ready-made glasses to under 16-year-olds. That is ridiculous. How will that provision be policed? Will inspectors wander around ready to pounce on 15-year-olds who are seen hovering near the ready-made glasses counter in a Woolworth store? The licensees of pubs cannot identify young people who are under 16, and perhaps the difficulties of licensees are not so great as those that will be faced by inspectors. After all, some young people sit in pubs for comparatively long periods with drinks in their hands, and for much longer than it would take a 15-year-old to buy a pair of ready-mades. It is lunacy to pretend——

Mrs. Audrey Wise (Preston): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Dame Jill Knight: No, I shall not give way. I am trying to be brief.

If it is lunacy to pretend that there can be effective policing, why are 16-year-olds excluded from the sale of ready-made glasses?

I apologise to the House for introducing two highly technical issues. Theoretically, it is impossible for there to be presbyopia of more than three dioptrics, but ready-mades are said to be for persons suffering from presbyopia. The provision permits reading glasses to be sold up to plus four dioptres in power, but they could not possibly be sold wholly for the purpose that the Bill stipulates. That is ridiculous nonsense.

I concede that ready-made glasses may not harm people's eyes, but it can be said with certainty that those who wear such glasses will not be able to see properly. The glasses will not be optically correct. Double vision could easily be caused if the optical centres of the lenses did not coincide with the exact distance between the person's eyes. If someone had double vision, he will be extremely dangerous when behind the wheel of a car. Unfortunately, drivers will buy ready-made glasses, put them on their noses, drive their cars and hit something. They will not be able to see properly. There is no doubt about that. There are many examples of that happening in America. If drivers have a tendency to experience double vision because they wear optically incorrect glasses, they will be especially dangerous when driving at night. Alternatively, someone wearing optically incorrect glasses could enter a factory and operate a lathe without being able to see properly.

We have already taken one step towards eliminating eye tests, and this is a second and extremely serious step. If my hon. Friend the Minister and her ministerial colleagues are sincere in wanting the public to have eye tests, this is the wrong way to proceed. I ask them to accept the amendment.

2 am

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): I support the Government. Every hon. Member who has spoken so far has treated the general public like imbeciles. If a member of the public selects a pair of ready-made glasses, he wants them for reading. If the glasses are comfortable for both eyes and he can read well, those glasses will do very nicely thank you and will do no harm to the eyes.

If a member of the general public needs distance glasses with different lenses, he will have to get a prescription. If he is not well or has eye trouble, he will go to his general practitioner. One of the first things that the general practitioner will do is get a torch and look into his eyes. That is a diagnostic approach used by doctors.

I believe that members of the public are very sensible. If they are not well and have eye trouble, they will go to a doctor or a proper optician. Most people believe that their eyesight is their most precious possession. Whatever priorities they may have or whatever else they may have to cut back on, it is certain that they will still go for an eye test.

The Minister referred to the American figures. I suspect that the people who did not enter that category were excluded because they did not have great defects. Therefore, the glasses that they acquired off the shelf in a shop were adequate for their correction and suited them nicely. Some hon. Members have implied that people will crash into others in cars, knock into people and all that stupid nonsense. If that happens when someone puts on glasses, he will get the right glasses or a prescription. We must begin to treat people as intelligent human beings and not as imbeciles.

I was a member of the Standing Committee on the Health and Social Security Bill which became the Health and Social Security Act 1985. That deregulation Bill was shepherded through the House by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State when he was Minister for Health. That legislation has worked well. If we want inexpensive glasses we can acquire them, but if we want to pay a little extra for fashion we can do that. The vast majority of people will go to proper opticians. All the scaremongering is absolutely stupid. The Government are on the right lines. Opposition Members said that no Conservative Members would speak in favour of the proposal. I speak in favour and I think that I have spoken more commonsense than the rest of the speakers put together.

Mrs. Currie: I am sure that all hon. Members would join me in saying that we would never treat my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) like an imbecile because he clearly is not one and never has been.

My hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) asked about having an immense education programme. We have already set aside £250,000 this year and we are considering whether we should set aside a similar sum next year. We look for sensible proposals from the profession which would answer many of the concerns expressed tonight.

My hon. Friend asked whether they would be simple glasses. I suggest that she looks at the detailed wording of the amendment. We adopted four dioptres because the professional advice was that that was a sensible cut-off point. As for a Government health warning, I shall consider what she has said, but, in all honesty, since the spectacles cause no harm we do not feel that that is necessary. I see that my hon. Friend is about to rise again. I hope that she will allow me to answer the other points and it may be that I will cover those that she has made.

I listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) with great care. I have the greatest possible respect for her. When I was a new councillor in Birmingham she was the local Member of Parliament and she treated me at all times with consideration and courtesy. However, I do not agree with a word that she has said.

In all honesty, this was not Government policy originally. It was not in the Bill. It was drafted by one of the nation's distinguished doctors, the noble Lord Winstanley. After some discussion, and after taking medical and optical advice, we decided that the best thing to do was to offer Conservatives a free vote. They had a full discussion and the other place decided to proceed, having taken into account many of the arguments that were put. It is now argued that the House should concur with the Lords in the amendment and take into account the advice that was given by a large number of medically qualified people.

My hon. Friend said that people would not be able to see properly. My hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth put it very well. He said that if they cannot see properly they had better get themselves some proper spectacles and that is what they would do. In all honesty, having given the matter considerable thought, the Government consider it highly unlikely that we shall end up with drivers with double vision at night toddling around wearing spectacles that are no use for them simply because the amendment comes into operation. We consider that it is a splendid small change that will widen the market. It will make it simple, easy and convenient for people with mild vision defects to purchase spectacles should they so want. It will do no harm and it may do some good.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Before the hon. Lady sits down——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Lady has sat down.

Question put, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Motor Vehicles (Air Pollution)

2.21 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 4637/88 and the Supplementary Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Department of Transport on 8th July on air pollution by the gases from the engines of motor vehicles; and supports the agreement reached at the 28th and 29th June Environment Council in Luxembourg.

We are considering a proposal from the Commission that deals with future standards for gaseous emissions from cars with engines of less than 1·4 litres.

When the "Luxembourg package", which later became directive 88/76, was negotiated in 1985, the Community put off one of its toughest decisions. It set only interim first stage standards for small cars, which form about half the European car market. The proposal now before us seeks to set definitive stage II standards for these vehicles. The word "definitive" is used imprecisely. The 88/76 directive is the fifth amending directive to the original one that set emission limits back in 1970. This latest draft directive now has an additional article committing the European Council to consider in 1991 another tightening of standards for all sizes of car.

It is proposed that the stage II small cars type approval limit value for carbon monoxide should be 30 g per test and the combined total of hydrocarbons and oxides of nitrogen 8 g per test. The limits are the same as those to be applied for medium-sized cars, between 1·4 and 2 litres, and nearly as strict as the United States equivalent limits set for cars over 2 litres.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. As he is probably aware, many thousands of motorists in Great Britain drive classic or vintage motor vehicles which are incapable of being modified to meet the requirements. I have read the documents and I am satisfied that those vehicles would not be placed at risk. Will he confirm and place on record that the matters to which he is referring relate only to new motor vehicles?

Mr. Bottomley: Yes. My hon. Friend previously asked a question which I was delighted to answer, because there is some confusion in the minds of some people involved in vintage, veteran and old cars generally. The rule is that the new standards will apply to cars which are manufactured after the set date. Therefore, I confirm what my hon. Friend has just said. He has done the House and the country a service by raising that point. I hope that people will no longer write to my hon. Friend in his role as secretary of the House of Commons Motoring Club, or to me as Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport, asking us to reconfirm what we have already confirmed in the House.

The dates of application—1 October 1992 for new type approvals and 1 October 1993 for all new registrations—are two years later than those set for the application of the small car stage I standards imposed by directive 88/76. That reiterates and remakes the point my hon. Friend has already made.

The proposal is for a permissive directive under article 100A of the Single European Act. It has two purposes. It prevents any member state from setting unique national standards. At the same time, substantial progress is made towards greater protection for the environment. The permissive nature of the proposal gives each member state the opportunity to set less stringent standards, or to delay the dates of implementation if it so desires. The United Kingdom Government intend to apply the new standards in full on the proposed dates and have negotiated on that assumption.

Surprisingly quick progress has been made in negotiations in Council and political agreement by qualified majority has been achieved, subject to several reserves, including a parliamentary one from the United Kingdom and an ad referendum one from France.

Earlier this year, we did not think that such quick progress was possible. That was made plain by the explanatory memorandum and the Scrutiny Committee report. Initial reactions to the Commission's proposal were mixed, to say the least. The United Kingdom shared a view held by all the major Community car producers except Germany, that the proposal was too strict. Others did not think that it went far enough. A minority voiced support for the proposal. The key figure is the combined limit for hydrocarbons and oxides of nitrogen. In directive 83/351/EEC, which sets the limits we currently apply, the standard is 19 g per test for small cars. The standard in directive 88/76/EEC, for small cars, stage I is 15 g per test. Some member states hoped to see a stage II limit of 12 g per test, while others preferred 5 g per test. The Commission's proposal, as it often does, almost splits the difference at 8 g per test.

These different limits would lead to different technical solutions. I think this is perhaps the most important part of the debate. At 12 g per test, most small cars could avoid the use of catalytic converters. Lean burn engine technology on its own would still be an attractive option. Several manufacturers have already developed models that can nearly meet this standard. It is not achieved easily. Although small cars could continue to use carburettors, they almost certainly would need sophisticated electronic ignition systems to achieve an acceptable balance between emissions, fuel economy and driveability.

Such systems are not cheap. I believe that it would be right to assume that their fitment would become commonplace in the 1990s. The reliability and long-term stability they offer would still be strong selling points, even if emission standards were not already pushing the technology in that direction. The Government initially saw the attractions of a 12 g per test standard—it represents a 37 per cent. reduction over the current standard at little real additional cost to the consumer.

The Commission's proposal of a combined standard of 8 g per test for hydrocarbons and oxide of nitrogen would impose the need to fit catalysts on almost all small car models. The need to fit controls of mixture strength, with electronic management of fuel injection, would be avoided. Systems could be kept simple, and lean burn engines would continue to be an option. When assessing the costs of a continued limit value of 8 g per test, the Government have used the 12 g standard as a new baseline.

We believe that the technology to achieve the 12 g standard will be available anyway. Our estimate of additional cost when the 8 g standard is fully implemented is about £250 million a year, or 3·5 per cent. of small car motoring costs. This fits in with the Commission's estimate of 4·5 per cent. increase in costs when compared with the current 19 g per test baseline. About £30 million of these additional costs can be accounted for in increased fuel consumption. As modern engine technology becomes more sophisticated and efficient, such fuel consumption penalties can be expected to fall.

A combined standard of 5 g per test is another matter altogether. It is universally accepted that such a standard would be fully equivalent to current United States standards, and that the only proven technology to achieve it is the fully controlled, three-way catalyst with electronic engine management which holds the air-fuel ratio at a fixed level. The standard rules out entirely the possibility of the fuel economy benefits of lean burn. The Commission has estimated that small car costs would rise by 13 to 15 per cent. relative to the current standards. That is an enormous amount to the cost of motoring where the market is the most price sensitive.

There is no question about our needing to improve emission standards so that total emissions from motor vehicles can be contained and then reduced, in spite of increases in vehicle activity.

Detailed computer modelling of the effects of vehicle emissions on air quality has been carried out for the Department of the Environment by the Harwell laboratory. The standards the Government are already committed to apply—the medium and large cars standards and the stage I standard for small cars—are predicted by the model to achieve substantial reductions in nitrogen oxides and hydrocarbon emissions. As a result, peak ozone levels are expected to fall too. This is thought to be particularly important for sensitive vegetation.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): How far the Government seriously expect levels of pollution to decline is a fundamental point of the debate. Would the hon. Gentleman like to comment specifically on what estimates the Government base their claim that ozone levels will fall if this compromise is adopted?

Mr. Bottomley: The facts of the physical chemistry are not in dispute. It is expected that the 8 g per test standard compared to the 12 g will mean that the level of ozone harmful to the vegetation will be reduced by 6 per cent. more, the level of hydrocarbons by 7 per cent. and the peak ozone levels by an extra 2 per cent. Obviously, people can have their views on whether the limit can be reduced further. At 5 g per test, there would be a significant impact on the fuel economy of cars. That becomes important with small vehicles and even more important when we realise that half the cars sold in Europe are small cars. We need to look also at the costs to consumers. There is just as much cost benefit in ecology and the environment as in other respects.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): My hon. Friend is obviously aware that, no matter what system of engine management and combined catalyst one has, exhaust gases of some kind will come out the back of the vehicle. Usually, that will result in an increase in carbon dioxide emissions. Did the Commission bear in mind the concern, which has escalated as recently as the last few months, about the build-up of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere and the fact that this legislation will accelerate that process by the time European cars are converted to lean-burn catalyst devices? Does my hon. Friend agree that this will exacerbate a problem which is causing growing concern to everyone?

Mr. Bottomley: The Commission wants the Council of Ministers to be able to reach agreement. Britain has helped to lead the way towards general acceptance of the Commission's compromise between 12 g per test, which was put forward by Britain some months ago as the preferred level, and 5 g per test, to which some countries wanted the whole Community to move.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) rightly says that one of the consequences of catalytic conversion is increased carbon dioxide. Increased fuel consumption is also associated with the 5 g per test. There seem to be significant costs above the potentially justifiable costs arising from the 8 g per test standard. Renewed concern for the atmosphere and for the greenhouse effect, led in Europe by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, demonstrate that we need to be practical as well as idealistic.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): My hon. Friend referred to the academic research carried out, particularly at Harwell, on behalf of his Department. Is my hon. Friend aware also of the great volume of academic research being carried out into the very localised conditions caused by pollution from car exhausts? Where that is exacerbated by temperature inversions, much building damage occurs. I hope that my hon. Friend will bear in mind the consequences of pollution, not just in the very broad sense but in terms of local traffic management.

Mr. Bottomley: Anyone who works in this place will be aware of the effect on the buildings around here when traffic comes to a standstill around Parliament square. Hon. Members will be aware that the fumes pumped out do not just affect the buildings but may even affect the quality of some of our judgments as we do our work at 2.33 in the morning, or is it late evening? I do not know how one is supposed to refer to it.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): The Minister said that some countries advocated 5 g per test, as opposed to 8 g per test, which the British Government support. If the Minister thinks that 5 g is not a good idea, why did some countries believe that it was a reasonable and attainable proposition? What case did they make for it?

Mr. Bottomley: I do not want to get into deep water. These countries have coalition Governments. I make no secret of the fact that if we had a significant number of Green Members, that would show that our major parties had failed. Green issues should not be left to one party; they should be with us all. In countries with proportional representation minority groups may have more power, and may show it by demanding that their Governments commit themselves to programmes that are not cost-beneficial. It is far better to examine the science involved in going to 5 rather than 8 or 12 g per test. That is my answer to the hon. Gentleman's question; perhaps Opposition Members will advance others.

A stage II standard of 12 g per test would reduce nitrogen oxides and hydrocarbon emissions further, with a small decrease in ozone levels. At 8 g per test there is a jump in air quality impact. Hydrogen emissions would be controlled more than twice as effectively as by a 12 g standard, and ozone levels would be lower.

[Mr. Bottomley]

A 5 g standard would effectively mandate full three-way catalysts on all small cars. Compared with an 8 g standard it would reduce nitrogen oxide emissions but would have no significant effect on hydrocarbons or ozone.

A stage II standard of 8 g would lead to significant further improvements, and, for ozone, is probably close to the optimum that can be achieved by controls on small car emissions.

In consultations with the motor manufacturers the Government have been left in no doubt that their preferred outcome for the present negotiations would have been a standard of about 12 g per test. They have also recognised that European agreement at that level has become impossible, with many member states either supporting the Commission's proposal or wishing to go further.

Uncertainty in such a key area as vehicle emissions can be very damaging to industry. The detailed development of new engine specifications is one of the major tasks in preparing a new car for the market. When emission standards remain unresolved, manufacturers have no choice but to plan for several outcomes, since they must have models that they can legally offer for sale by the time the standard comes into force. That is wasteful of resources and should be avoided whenever possible. On balance, the advice that we have had from industry was that an early agreement at 8 g per test was preferable to continuing delay in agreement. It would allow the lean burn engine technology being developed by the United Kingdom manufacturers of small cars to show its worth, although oxidation catalysts would be needed as extra emission control equipment.

In the lead-up to last June's Environment Councils these considerations were leading the United Kingdom to reconsider its position in negotiations. We were aware that if we were to move, others might follow us. We were also detecting a willingness on the part of the Germans, who had the influential duties of the Presidency, to seek some sort of compromise.

It was in this climate that the United Kingdom decided, shortly before the first June Council, to be sufficiently flexible in its negotiating to be able to support the Commission's proposal if, by so doing, a qualified majority could then be assembled.

Member states that had stood with the United Kingdom in the 12 g camp quickly followed the United Kingdom lead to support the Commission's proposal. One other member state joined us from the 5 g camp. Others who wanted the 5 g per test limit wished to add conditions before they could agree to a compromise. The key conditions were, first, to commit the Council to a firm third stage for application some time in the 1990s at the limit of 5 g per test. Second, member states should be free to offer tax incentives to purchasers of cars that met the 5 g limit before the mandatory application date. Third, it was said that the revision of the test cycle to include high-speed driving sequences should be prejudged so that the Council agreed now on limits for the new cycle for medium cars in a way that forced the use of three-way catalyst technology for that category.

These three conditions were unacceptable to the United Kingdom and to several other member states. After some difficult negotiations, a qualified majority was able to support the Commission's proposal, with the addition of an article committing the Council to review vehicle emission standards in 1991. Whilst taking note of some member states' desire for 5 g per test for a third stage, there is no commitment to such a limit. Those participating in the agreement——

Mr. Tony Lloyd: One of the countries that wants to pursue the 5 g test is Denmark. The Danes may seek to go it alone in some sort of Nordic agreement. What would be the British Government's response to that?

Mr. Bottomley: That is a matter for the Commission, which should take them to court. The same would apply to any country that tried to impose a standard beyond that agreed in the directive. It is a permissive directive that allows countries to come up to standards set in the directive, but not to go beyond. If I have that wrong—[Interruption.] I had hoped that by giving way there would not be too many speeches, but obviously I am provoking comment so I shall continue with my speech and then answer points raised in the debate.

Those participating in the agreement have also undertaken not to extend the use of tax incentives, which undermine the harmonisation of the market by creating the unique specifications of car models for sectors of the Community market in advance of dates set out in the directive.

On the test cycle, the Commission has reaffirmed its intention to make a proposal within the next year. The agreement is still not assured since the French believe that some improvement on the conditions surrounding it should be made. They have sustained their reserve, and we can expect further negotiation on details at the November Council.

We now have the makings of an agreement that still leaves many issues on vehicle emissions to be decided by the Council. We look forward to further proposals from the Commission on the high-speed cycle, evaporative emissions, durability testing and further tightening of limits on gaseous emissions from commercial vehicles and the introduction of particulate limits for large diesel-engined vehicles, which are now a dominant source of black smoke in urban areas.

I say to all those concerned about the environment that there are opportunities for people to contribute. About 49 of the 50 people in every 80 who could use unleaded fuel do not do so. Most people have cars that can use unleaded fuel. Most people with those cars could save 4p to 6p a gallon. The numbers of petrol stations that have unleaded fuel are growing dramatically. Sales of two-star are falling and I expect most petrol stations to switch to supplying unleaded fuel. I ask everyone, whether in business or individually, to find out as soon as possible whether his or her car can use unleaded fuel so that we can get the lead out of the atmosphere.

To return to the emissions in the directive, we have made significant progress at a faster rate than we had hoped. The agreement will be good for the environment and will give the motor industry the opportunity to show us the real benefits of advanced fuel emission technologies such as lean burn. It is now up to it. I commend the agreement to the House.

2.42 am

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): The Minister's comments tonight do not allow us to give even one cheer for the Prime Minister's conversion to a greener Britain and a greener Europe. Unfortunately, the Prime Minister believes that we can have bolt-on environmentalism—almost like a bolt-on catalytic converter—that can be assembled and make no difference to any other aspect of policy.

The agreement is a compromise that is fairly typical of many things that are happening within the European Community. It is a compromise at almost the worst possible level because it advances the argument hardly a jot and the cause of a cleaner and better environment scarcely at all. It is rather ironic that the translation of the letter from the Vice-President of the Commission, Lord Cockfield, should make the point that the Luxembourg agreement was premised with the view that the basic principles of future emission requirements of the European Community should be adapted by categories of motor vehicles so that the effect on the European environment would be equivalent to that produced by USA standards, taking into account different patterns of use for each category.

It is ironic that the Minister prays in aid the idea that there should be some approximation to USA standards when, in reality, under existing regulations—we are moving on from those—a car in the United Kingdom, on an annual basis, produces about eight times more hydro carbons, carbon monoxides and nitrogen oxides. Even under the new proposals, the smaller vehicles of less than 2 litres will produce about twice the pollution of an equivalent vehicle on the USA.

Mr. Bottomley: Is the hon. Gentleman basing his remarks on United States standards or United States car emissions? I understand that about half the cars in the United States which start off in theory meeting the regulations do not meet them shortly afterwards. That may be a question, as I said in my earlier remarks, of whether Britain is right to try to agree to measures which we will make happen, rather than do what others do, and pass laws but do not get people to live up to them.

Mr. Lloyd: Perhaps the Minister would care to say how many prosecutions there have been in Britain in recent years for emissions that transgressed existing laws. Most vehicles on the roads of Britain are in breach of existing regulations which prohibit emissions dangerous to health or which cause damage to property. Any vehicle on our roads that is pumping out carbon monoxide or nitrogen oxides of different kinds or hydrocarbons is already in breach of our regulations.

Even if the Minister says that that is a technical point—I concede that it is—he will be aware that one can walk outside this building at any time of the day or night and find lorries belching out exhaust emissions which fall foul of the Minister's pragmatic levels reached by negotiation. So as we in Britain do not control emissions either, it is disingenuous of the Minister to refer to the state of affairs in America, when the United States can point to a real improvement through emission control—an improvement which Britain cannot claim.

I speak of the irony of the Minister praying in aid the example of the situation in the United States and the approximation of this European compromise to it—ironic because the European compromise is massively worse than the United States position—because this debate is taking place on the day when Lord Caithness has been signing the United Kingdom's acquiescence to a freeze on nitrogen oxide emissions which will have the effect that by 1994—not by 1992 or 1993, as applies in this directive—those emissions from all sources will be cut back to the levels of December last year.

That may seem a great achievement, but there is a problem for Opposition Members, who regard the Prime Minister's conversion to environmental issues as being totally bogus, when we consider the situation in other EC countries. France, which has a generally bad record in these matters, and Italy, which, in defence of the small car industry, has been as recalcitrant in the past as has Britain have agreed to support the more aggressive and more acceptable 30 per cent. reduction in nitrogen oxide emissions by 1994. The British Government, on the other hand, have said that they do not want to know about that level. So it is ironic for the Minister to claim that the British Government have credibility in this sphere when the rest of Western Europe is out of step with the Prime Minister's newfound environmental credentials.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The hon. Gentleman makes much play with the commitment of certain other countries. The Soviet Union is a signatory to the 30 per cent. declaration. Should one therefore attach any credibility to that? Is it not better to approach this issue in the way the British Government have—to mean what they say and get down to the objective level instead of going along with political ploys, as do many Governments in Europe and elsewhere?

Mr. Lloyd: The credibility of the British Government is not high in this area. They have resisted any move towards more acceptable controls of pollution. The compromise now before the House, as I shall demonstrate, is unsatisfactory because it will not achieve the improvement in the environment that the Government claim that it will. It is ironic that the directive should come before the House today, given that last night—the night when the Minister discussed penalty points with me—it was recorded that at the York road junior school not far from here the World Health Organisation's recommended maximum of 10 mg per cu. m of carbon monoxide was exceeded. In the area of the Houses of Parliament the level of carbon monoxide was 11·3 mg per cu. m.

Most of the carbon monoxide in a city such as London comes from emissions from motor vehicles. In the period from 7 o'clock last night until this morning, at Bedford junior school near Heathrow airport, the World Health Organisation's recommended maximum for emissions was exceeded when 10·7 mg per cu. m were found. In the area of the York road junior school last night the World Health Organisation's recommended maximum nitrogen oxide level of 400 mg per cu. m was also exceeded. This morning, during the peak period of travel for commuters in London, the level reached 482 mg, which is way over the figure that the WHO finds acceptable.

I hope that the Minister accepts that the consequences for the health of those travelling through the area at that time may be serious. I hope that he will accept that it is ridiculous for the Government to lay claim to any credibility, given that we experience the physical impact of the problem on a day-to-day basis. I now remember what the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) said.

[Mr. Lloyd]

It is ridiculous to talk in terms of global or national limits. The problem exists in local areas, and particularly in London because of high traffic density.

Mr. Roger King: I do not say that such levels of pollution are in any way acceptable; of course they are not. However, it must be remembered that over the past few days, and last night, weather conditions were especially conducive to a build-up of pollution. We have had fog, temperature inversion and all the rest of it. Such conditions are exceptional in London. There is usually a wind so that exhaust fumes can dissipate. I hope that the House is not concluding from the hon. Gentleman's remarks that such pollution is an everyday occurrence with which we have to live, with the consequent danger to us all.

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman seems to misunderstand what a maximum recommended limit means. It means just that. It is extremely dangerous for those in the vicinity when that limit is exceeded. There is some merit in the hon. Gentleman's argument that so far such events have been relatively infrequent, but in London the limits have already been exceeded twice in the past week.

The hon. Gentleman may want to talk about unusual weather conditions, but they are not so odd. It was predicted that the limits would be exceeded in November and December this year because the amount of nitrogen oxides and carbon monoxide being pumped into the atmosphere in London has increased year by year as a result of the increase in the volume of traffic on the roads of London. The Minister knows that some of the increase in the volume of traffic is due to the relative affluence of commuters in London but that much of it is also due to the Government's refusal to invest in public transport.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Nonsense.

Mr. Lloyd: The Minister must accept that important point. He made some play of trying to justify lean burn engines in terms of national fuel consumption. He knows that there are far more efficient ways of reducing the national consumption of fuel—among them better and slower traffic systems and getting people out of motor cars and on to a more efficient public transport system.

Mr. Bottomley: May I abbreviate parts of this debate? Will the hon. Gentleman accept that the number of people commuting by car into London in the past six or seven years has fallen from 190,000 to 160,000, that the number of people using the underground each day has risen by 60 per cent. since it was taken back from the GLC, that the decline has been reversed in the number of people using the buses and that investment in the public transport system has been running higher than the investment in national roads? Almost everything that the hon. Gentleman has said is wrong. Why do we not come back to emissions and concentrate, perhaps, on the 5 g. and 8 g. standard? Perhaps he will accept that putting three-way catalysts on to small vehicles, with the fuel injection control equipment, is likely to worsen the fuel economy by 10 per cent., which will not only lead to extra carbon dioxide, but to increased fuel and fumes.

Mr. Lloyd: The last point is not true, because the difficulty of especially the lean burn technology is that it offers very little in the reduction of nitrogen oxides, and that is the most fundamental criticism of that technology. It is an untested technology and cannot even guarantee to deliver what the Minister claims. It certainly will not reduce at high speeds the amount of nitrogen oxides that are pumped into the atmosphere. As nitrogen oxide is the most important of the three pollutants from vehicle emissions—because of its impact on acid rain and the creation of ozone in connection with hydrocarbons—the Minister cannot wriggle out of the problem simply by referring to fuel efficiency or cost.

The Minister waxes eloquent about the Government's success in transport, but the reason why tubes in London are overcrowded owes nothing at all to Government investment, but a lot to the Government's incompetence in the management of traffic systems in London. Because of the way that traffic operates in London, there is more pollution in the atmosphere now than there has been in previous years. That is a statistical fact which cannot be altered by any argument put forward by the Minister. I will let him think about that while his hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) speaks.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does the hon. Gentleman concede that the clean air Acts were passed by a Conservative Administration, and that much of the argument that he is constructing in attacking the Government on this point is absurd?

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman picked on someone from the wrong city to talk to about clean air Acts, because pressure for clean air Acts came from northern cities and from the Labour councils. Labour councils were putting pressure on a Conservative Government that operated down here, but it was their pressure that led to those Acts. The hon. Gentleman should know that Manchester, which has been Labour-controlled for far longer than the hon. Gentleman has lived in a northern city, took the lead in clean air matters.

The specific question must be where we go from here, because the present EC compromise will not begin significantly to reduce the amount of environmental pollution caused by vehicle emissions. When we study the Warren spring calculations of the impact of nitrogen oxides by the end of the century, we see that, if the present Luxembourg compromise is brought into effect, the reduction will be 12 to 32 per cent. If three-way catalytic converters are introduced, the reduction will be 60 to 70 per cent. We are told by environmental scientists that that is the sort of level that will be necessary if we do not simply maintain our present position, but we begin to undo the damage of the impact of acid rain. The Minister must deal with that because skirting around and saying that we can achieve stability is not satisfactory. Stability is not a position of credibility if we are to take seriously the Minister's cost balance of trading off cost and improvement. We will not improve if this order is to be the full stop for Western Europe.

The Minister must recognise that if the directive comes into force in the early 1990s, its full impact will not be felt until well into the next century. Even in 1992 or 1993 any attempts would mean that we delay the inevitable need to take any practical action until 2010 or even after that. We are playing with a 20-year time scale that we do not have.

There is no sense in allowing permissive legislation of this kind——

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman one small question. What is the Labour party's policy on exhaust emission and has it been discussed with the car manufacturers and the trade unions? Will the hon. Gentleman tell us what he would do?

Mr. Lloyd: I think that I have made quite clear what I would do, but I shall spell it out to the hon. Gentleman in case I was not clear. We would press for the introduction of three-way catalytic converters on all new motor vehicles because that is the only way that we can begin to tackle the problem of vehicle emissions.

Conservative Members will obviously want to pray in aid all sorts of bogus statistics, but the most important statistic is that a third of the world's vehicles are now fitted with a technology which was developed in Britain but rejected by British Governments on the most ridiculous grounds. That third of the world includes the United States, Japan and Australia. The technology is already there and will, inevitably, have to be imported into this country at a later stage. I hope that that makes what I am saying clear to the hon. Gentleman.

The point that I was making before I gave way to the hon. Gentleman was that this permissive legislation does not offer a realistic prospect of improvement because permissive legislation is designed to prevent countries such as Denmark from introducing a more acceptable standard.

I readily accept the argument that one country's solutions are not totally adequate because pollution knows no boundaries. The Minister has made it clear that the British Government's view is that the Commission should take action against Denmark to prevent Denmark from trying to improve its own environment. That is an act of the utmost folly. Rather than trying to prevent the Danes from moving in that direction, perhaps the British Government should take seriously what the Danes are saying and move in that direction.

If we are to take seriously the problems caused by vehicle emissions, we will not achieve our aim by this shoddy compromise. If we are to begin to reverse the damage that has already been caused, we must be prepared to embrace a more radical technology. The Government are clearly not prepared to accept that and in being unprepared to take that step they are making it clear that the Prime Minister's recent claims of an interest in the environment are as bogus as most people in this country thought that they were.

3.2 am

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Some of the interventions that we have heard from the Government's Benches have convinced some of us that one speech does not change a party. The Government will have to come up with something rather more forceful than they have yet produced if they are to convince the wider public that the conversion to green issues will bear fruit in any radical changes in policy, rather than in attempts to justify policies that will be pursued anyway. One of my party's supporters has commented that it is apparent that the Prime Minister has developed green edges but that only time will tell whether that turns out to be mould.

We are debating some fairly mouldy proposals because, as the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) said, the Government are supporting a compromise permissive resolution of the European Commission which simply freezes the agreed emissions for 1994 at last year's level. If we are supposed to accept that as a radical new departure and a great new "greening" of the European environment, I for one am less than convinced of it.

The Minister acknowledged that other countries want to go further. He had the grace also to acknowledge that this compromise goes further than Britain had originally wanted. It is now being accepted on the basis that any agreement is better than no agreement, especially if it is an agreement that does not cause us too much trouble, does not cost us too much and is not very inconvenient—it is only permissive.

The European Parliament's environment committee was pushing for 5 g and 20 g limits which are still substantially higher than the limits accepted for many years in the United States. The Minister argued that it was all very well for the United States to set those limits, but they were not necessarily enforced and did not necessarily produce significant achievements. The United States monitoring system has suggested that, at least since the more radical proposals than we are debating were introduced 18 years ago, the quantities of the relevant gases in the United States atmosphere have reduced by one third in one case and 6 per cent. in others. Those are measurable reductions, but no one is suggesting that they are closely connected with the measures.

The standards adopted in the United States have been taken up by Canada, Japan and Australia and are being taken up as objectives by other European countries. As this motion proves, Europe is collectively lagging behind the rest of the world. Britain was conspicuously absent from the declaration in Sofia. That was only a declaration of pious intent, but the fact that we are not prepared to make such a declaration suggests that we are a long way from achieving radical changes.

The harm done by these gases is no longer in dispute. In debates on environmental pollution, the Government have sometimes argued that there was no proof that particular emissions cause problems and that, until there was proof, they were not prepared to take any action. The situation should be reversed. It does not require a great deal of scientific research to know that exhaust fumes are noxious and that maximum control over those emissions, to ensure minimum pollution, is desirable.

How do we achieve a sensible balance? For a number of years, the Government, backed by the motor manufacturers, have argued that that they do not want to become involved in catalytic converters. They want to develop the lean-burn engine as British technology, again ignoring the fact that the catalytic converter was British technology. However, the people of Europe do not have time to wait. That is not to suggest that this development should not continue or that the lean-burn engine does not have a contribution to make, but it is not ready to go into commercial production. One wonders why a company such as Ford appears to be so resistant to the idea of catalytic converters here, when it has accepted them in its home base because the legislation decreed that. How did Jaguar manage to cope with a successful export drive to the United States, meeting United States standards?

Mr. Roger King: That was as a result of legislation.

Mr. Bruce: That is exactly the point. Legislation and pressure to raise standards force the pace of technology and develop the ability to meet those standards at a cost-effective level. The cost of introducing such changes is often lower than forecast.

Mr. Roger King: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has read the document that we are debating today. He talked about Jaguar, but we have already dealt with that kind of car which will be fitted with three-way catalysts. We have dealt with cars of 1·6 litres to 2 litres and tonight we are talking about cars of 1·4 litres and below—a type of car which is not freely available in the United States where the system of three-way catalytic converters is more suited to the large V8 car or our export Jaguars, BMWs and Mercedes. However, with the smaller cars, such as the Metro and the Mini, there are problems in fitting these installations. The hon. Gentleman should address those problems and note that Ford already has a lean-burn engine in production.

Mr. Bruce: It is true also that Ford has said that if it were required to introduce catalytic converters, it could and would do so. I do not dispute the specific terms of reference of the document and supplementary explanatory memorandum that we are discussing, but it should be said that on previous occasions manufacturers have resisted changes of this sort. They have not wished to make them, but when put under pressure they have been able to respond in a cost-effective and technically acceptable way. Pressure in the area with which we are concerned would produce similar results. Many who are pressing for change know that that is the position. As long as pressure is not produced because Europe cannot agree to proceed to sufficiently restrictive standards, the technology will not be developed and the necessary cost reductions will not be achieved.

The Minister referred to the gradual phasing out of two-star petrol and the gradual growth of availability of lead-free petrol. Perhaps we should look to the West German example and ban two-star petrol. The Minister's ministerial colleague and wife, the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, has said that that would be undesirable because users should have choice. The Minister has said that the problem is that we have lead-free petrol and that motorists are not using it. The Government should be considering how they will hasten the process.

The Select Committee on Trade and Industry, of which I am a member, has recently investigated petrol retailing. It found that the introduction of lead-free petrol with wide availability is proceeding at a relatively slow pace. It will be about two years before there will be sufficient distribution to unleaded petrol outlets to make consumers feel confident, especially if they live in an area such as my constituency, which is a large rural patch, that unleaded petrol is freely available.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is probably better that I make an intervention in the hon. Gentleman's speech and not wait to deal with the matter when I reply to the debate. A motorist will know that his car does not have a catalyst because he will be aware that he can put ordinary two-star or four-star petrol into the fuel tank. Anyone whose car can use unleaded fuel without adjustment, or after having been adjusted, and who finds that unleaded fuel is not available will be able to use ordinary two-star or four-star petrol. He will find that it will have no noticeably different effect on the engine.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will help my colleagues in the Department of the Environment and myself, as well as CLEAR and Friends of the Earth, to deal with the appalling ignorance, as well as apathy, which is preventing motorists from having their cars converted so that they are able to use unleaded fuel and then using it. If a car can use unleaded fuel, it can also use leaded.

Mr. Bruce: I accept that that is a useful contribution to place on the record. In a sense it reaffirms my argument that the message is not getting through. There is a lack of knowledge, understanding and action. It seems that potential users are not responding. Indeed, the oil companies are not responding.

The Minister has said that if someone has had his car converted so that it is able to use unleaded petrol, his natural wish will be to buy unleaded petrol for economic and other sound reasons. I accept that what the Minister has said is true, but I think that he will accept that users will be looking for outlets with unleaded fuel. The sooner that they are available throughout the country, the sooner we shall be able to speed up conversion and use. There is no doubt that it is accepted that the lead emissions in car exhaust fumes are inflicting considerable damage to both the environment and human beings.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Surely we need to deal with the inertia factor in the use of unleaded petrol. Surely it would be sensible to persuade or if, necessary, to legislate for car manufacturers to produce cars that will use unleaded petrol so that users do not have to go to the trouble or expense of having them converted to enable them to use leaded petrol. Would not that be a major step forward?

Mr. Bruce: I am sure that it would. I am sure that we have established a useful understanding across the Floor of the House. I am saying that we can deal with the problem through legislation, the raising of standards within areas of known technology and the forcing of the pace of technological and social change. The proposal from the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) is perfectly sensible and reasonable. The Government may have to take the suggestion on board and it may require legislation which I hope will be forthcoming if it is needed.

I do not think that anyone can now fail to be aware of the serious concerns about the consequences of acid rain and lead pollution on the physical environment in Europe. It is interesting to note that when the West Germans saw the trees in the Black Forest suffering and dying they thought initially that the cause was British power stations. Subsequent findings caused the West Germans some embarrassment over their initial hypothesis. Incidentally, I have friends in the Black Forest area and I witnessed the damage to the trees, which were a pitiful sight. The West Germans put a lot of pressure on us. In case I am misunderstood, I must state that I believe that British power stations contributed to the problem in West Germany.

It was interesting that the West German research showed that their biggest single problem came from pollution from car exhausts. Once that was brought home to them, they acted more speedily as they have a high proportion of high-powered cars to which catalytic converters could easily be fitted.

This has been a very lacklustre debate about a proposal over which no one can get very excited. It is a pretty lame, rough old compromise and it does not really force the pace on the issue anything like far enough or fast enough. I am worried that the directive may well be taken as the marker for all that we have to do over the next five years. If that is the case, it is a very inadequate marker. We should be forcing the pace. If the British Government want to take up those green issues, they should accept that they should take a lead. To pretend that a loose compromise which is further, sharper and more radical than what they originally wanted is some kind of radical initiative that arose from the Government's forward thinking is simply not credible.

We will still be operating at standards of half the United States level. The proposals are only the beginning of the debate. The European Parliament environment committee will want to force the pace. The fact that others like France are being disruptive should not allow us to use the disruption as an excuse to settle for a compromise that takes us nowhere. The Government must accept that they should look ahead and recognise that the commitment to the lean-burn engine will not solve the problem, but will make only a contribution to it. We must think in terms of the standard objective of reducing emissions by 30 per cent. plus over the next five years. I hope that the Minister will come back to the House well within the five-year period with radical proposals from the Government on how a 30 per cent. reduction can be achieved. The present proposal makes no contribution to that.

3.18 am

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): I must first declare an interest as I am adviser to Johnson Matthey plc. I am also a member of the Select Committee which recommended that the House debate this matter. We have had an interesting if somewhat low-key debate. Perhaps that is explained by the late hour.

I welcome the Government's realism in the way in which they have moved on the proposal within the confines of the political constraints in the Community. At least we are taking a step forward in the right direction. We should not approach the subject in a spirit of hesitancy. We should understand that, without making party political points, there is growing recognition of the need to protect our environment. Pressures for further improvement will grow. Therefore, the spirit of the House in approaching the matter should be to support and encourage the Government to press on as fast as they possibly can.

It is understandable that, being responsible, the Government must recognise that the British car manufacturing industry must adjust to such changes, but I hope that it will equally be recognised that some car manufacturers are already prepared to go faster on this issue, even if they are not all prepared to move at the same time, and so there are signs that the industry is coming round.

My hon. Friend the Minister said that there is a desire for certainty, which the Government have recognised and which he dealt with in his opening speech. The Government are also concerned for the consumer, but I wonder whether added costs that might come from pressing on not only with this proposal but going further eventually would be too severe a deterrent. If people are to become more aware of the need for the protection of the environment, they might be prepared to pay an additional sum in order to ensure that they were making their contribution.

I do not want to be controversial, but we spent the earlier part of today discussing why charges should be imposed for dental check-ups and eye tests and it was suggested that people would pay those charges because they would be in their interests. It could be said that they might not be completely put off by having to pay a bit more. But if the Government did think that they would be, they have a weapon that might help to alleviate the problem.

I am not clear that we are obliged by Community law to impose a car tax. If the Government want to help in adjusting to the change, it would be possible to tinker with the car tax without at the same time causing a boost to consumer demand if the price of more environmentally friendly cars were to increase because of the adjustments made to them.

My hon. Friend made an impassioned plea for greater use of lead-free petrol. This is national lead-free petrol week. I endorse that because it is the obvious preliminary to some of the other changes that will have to take place if car engines are to become cleaner. I urge my hon. Friend and his colleagues to persuade my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he next considers these matters, that he should go much further in what he has already done because the gap between lead-free petrol and leaded petrol in countries such as Germany is much greater than it is here.

When it is possible, by shopping around, to see a spread of between 12p or 14p a gallon on leaded four-star petrol, the difference that we have instituted so far, which I welcome, will not be a positive attractive incentive to people to change over. That could be achieved at no cost to the Exchequer if adjustments were made by increasing the duty on leaded petrol and reducing it still further on unleaded petrol. There must be an equation at some point where that could be done at nil cost to the Exchequer. But there would not be a great cost to the Exchequer, nor would it add to the consumer demand which is causing the Chancellor concern at present, if there were a substantial reduction in the duty on unleaded petrol so that there would be a clear incentive for people, other than that of good sense and care for the environment, to switch over to it.

That would be an important boost to the campaign which my hon. Friend and his colleagues are trying to press at the moment. The Government would make their enthusiasm on this subject clear beyond all doubt in a means that they have at their disposal which is not conditional on the support of any other Government in the Community.

3.22 am

Sir Hal Miller (Bromsgrove): The Opposition's curmudgeonly attitude quite took my breath away, so much so that I was almost bereft of speech until I reflected that their attitude could lead only to the conclusion that they would join us in supporting the construction of further nuclear power stations as the only environmentally acceptable way of power generation to meet the growing needs of our economy and country.

The way that the Opposition appear blithely to ignore the 25 million driving licence holders and the owners of more than 20 million cars in Britain is staggering. Their mathematics seem to be at fault. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister, to whose work I pay tribute, could confirm that the shift that he is announcing represents a reduction of more than 30 per cent. on the figures obtaining in the first stage programme, from which we are now moving more rapidly than originally envisaged. How we can be chided for achieving more rapidly a reduction in excess of 30 per cent in the face of a difficult political situation in the Community strikes me as odd.

Pace my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst), the Opposition's devotion to the cause of the catalyst also strikes me as odd, as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) briefly remarked, because the experience of looking after catalysts leads us to suppose that we have a long way to go, not only in terms of education, but perhaps, I fear, of regulation, on the efficient continuing maintenance and use of catalysts, particularly as related to small cars. They are of course already fitted to larger vehicles.

We should like to know what the European Parliament has said about this matter because the documents before the House state that a decision is still awaited. That was in July, so I wonder whether there is any news of what was decided.

We are retrospectively debating these issues because decisions are being taken on the continent by majority vote. By the time those matters reach us, they have already been settled. That is why the Opposition's strictures are even more absurd. To chide the Minister for having moved his colleagues is a very curious way to proceed. I support my hon. Friend the Minister, if only because of the certainty that is being offered to our manufacturers—and the need for such certainty could not be more clearly illustrated than by the recently announced engine facility, with more than £350 million being invested by the Ford motor company. I wish my hon. Friend the Minister every success in his efforts.

3.26 am

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am grateful to my hon. Friends. It is worth noting that, as this debate concludes in the early morning, there are present 12 Government Members, but that the Liberal, the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), has no supporters, and nor has the Labour Member, the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd). Yet we are supposed to believe that the environmentalists are not on the Government Benches.

The Royal Society speech of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was a reflection of the Conservatives' interest in the environment. We do not deny that other parties also have an interest—we just wish that they would manifest it more often and in greater numbers. Looking around this Chamber, it is evident that we not only outnumber the other parties—that might be expected—but also that we outnumber them by a factor of seven or eight to one. We also outdo them in our understanding of the subject.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Will the Minister educate the House on one important point? If he wants serious discussion of this issue, why was this debate arranged to begin at 20 past two in the morning, thus preventing any serious discussions? Also, will the Minister respond to the question put by his hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Sir H. Miller): why are we discussing this matter now—after the event, rather than before?

Mr. Bottomley: I explained the reasons at the beginning of this debate and I am happy to do so again now. However, I want to deal with the 30 per cent. point raised by the hon. Member for Gordon. The 20th report of the Select Committee on European Legislation of 30 March states:

"The application of Directive 88/76/EEC in combination with a 12 grammes/test standard for small cars would give a 53 per cent. (HC + NOx) average limit reduction for all cars, when compared with the current 83/351/EEC Directive limits."

That provides some encouragement.

In this Parliament, we should try dropping some of the adversarial politics that may be necessary in other debates. This is a take-note motion on a Community proposal that is almost a British-led compromise. We have brought other countries together in arriving at the 8 g test standard and that deserves some recognition—even from the hon. Members for Stretford and for Gordon. I believe that the whole House welcomes the movement towards an 8 g standard and Britain's leadership in persuading other Community members to arrive at that acceptable compromise.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: It is rather curious that last night when the Minister was being savaged by his own side the only person who spoke in his support was me, from the Opposition. For him to argue that in no circumstances is there agreement across the Chamber is ridiculous. I must say, however, that there is no all-party welcome for this agreement: it is rubbish, and we have made that clear.

Mr. Bottomley: Now we have the Socialists in Britain saying that the agreement is rubbish. I thought that when Jacques Delors came to speak to the Socialists they turned around and began to accept that Community agreement would be good not only for our common European environment but for our common European car and engine manufacturing, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove has said. Because we are becoming increasingly efficient in this country, we have more to gain in terms of both manufacturing and being able to trade across Europe without unnecessary barriers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) put a very fair argument. He mentioned his interest in Johnson Matthey, which the House acknowledges; but he also talked about a sensible approach. I think that it makes sense to go for the oxidation catalyst on small cars, with the 8 g per test limit, and developing lean burn. I said in my opening remarks that we could not expect the lean burn technology automatically to work, and that it was up to those developing it to prove that it would meet the standards. We are perfectly aware that if it does not, a different approach will be necessary.

Let me return for a moment to the subject of unleaded fuel. My hon. Friend talked about the need for an increased differential, but I feel that the existing differential can work. Unleaded fuel is being supplied by some major firms—such as Tesco, which is never knowingly undersold.

Even the cheapest petrol station in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley), the Jet petrol station on the way to Godalming, sells unleaded fuel. I think we shall see more and more competition involving not only the major fuel companies but the smaller ones as well.

I am delighted to announce that I have made arrangements for a sign to go up as soon as possible on every motorway where there is a motorway service area selling unleaded fuel saying that it is for sale there. I think that that will help to get the information across.

According to a newspaper report, when the director of Friends of the Earth was asked whether he had a car, he said no. When asked if his wife had a car, he said yes. When asked it he used it, he said occasionally. When asked if it used unleaded fuel, he honestly said that it would soon. That is the problem. If our "greens" in Friends of the Earth need a bit of reminding from a newspaper journalist, think how many of the rest of us need to have our cars adjusted. I am delighted to learn that manufacturers such as Ford and Vauxhall have arranged for the conversion to be done virtually free, or free in most cases. I would ask all other manufacturers to find out whether their cars can use unleaded fuel and to put a sticker—preferably green—on the dashboard and fuel cap to make sure that people buy unleaded fuel, because it saves money and the environment.

It has been suggested—I am grateful for the help of my hon. Friends in this regard—that if we want emissions reduced, we must go for a greater element of nuclear fuel. It is a straight fact that that is one of the ways of reducing the greenhouse effect. Otherwise, people are opting for conventional pollution. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment made that point in some excellent replies to questions put to him on Sunday by Jonathan Dimbleby.

We should also try to make the Opposition realise that they can approve of something that is being agreed in Europe. That is what this take-note motion is about. The hon. Member for Stretford and I will continue to have debates while I have my job and he has his position, but he might try to discover from the leader of his party whether that party is in favour of more road spending or against it. It is rather odd to read many reports saying that we are spending too much on roads and others saying that we are spending too little. The Leader of the Opposition seems to be saying that we are spending too little. I do not want that question answered now, but it would be useful to learn the party's view in the future.

The hon. Member for Gordon says that we are trying to put forward a freeze at last year's level for 1994. The position is exactly the opposite. The 12 g per test limit would bring about dramatic reductions in emissions and pollution. Moving to 8 g per test will go even further. The reports of the Select Committee on European Legislation suggest that we may have been going too far already. I consider that the 8 g per test is easily defensible, and I should like a bit more help from the Opposition in avoiding the tag that Britain is the dirty person of Europe. Because we make agreements that we stick to, we are ahead of many other countries.

I give the hon. Member for Stretford this challenge. Perhaps he should take a bit of water out of the Rhine and a bit of water out of the Thames and decide which he wants to drink.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 4637/88 and the Supplementary Explanatory memorandum submitted by the Department of Transport on 8th July on air pollution by the gases from the engines of motor vehicles; and supports the agreement reached at the 28th and 29th June Environment Council in Luxembourg.

Industrial Chemical Premises

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Fallon.]

3.35 am

Mr. John Ward (Poole): May I first thank my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Employment for being present to answer the debate at this late hour?

Although the reasons for the debate are mainly concerned with an incident that took place in my constituency, the lessons learnt from that incident could have much wider application on a national basis in ensuring that other towns do not have to go through the same experience as some of my constituents did last June.

It would be helpful if I set the scene and gave the background to the fire and explosion which took place in BDH Limited's chemical works at West Quay road in Poole on 21 June this year. The fire broke out in a building used as a chemical store at the factory. The building was constructed in 1982 and was divided into three sections —one used for storing oxidising substances, a larger area used as a main chemical store and a smaller area used as a flammable solids store. The three sections were separated by concrete block walls. Immediately outside the oxidising substances store was a bonded and protected area used for the storage of flammable liquids in drums.

At about 6.15 in the evening of 21 June a fire was discovered in the oxidising store and it took hold of that area rapidly and spread to the adjacent area containing flammable liquids.

Many hon. Members will have seen the television news reports of the fire, showing a large fireball accompanied by a plume of yellow-brown smoke rising over the old town section of Poole. In addition, some of the drums of chemical liquid exploded and travelled up to 300 ft in the air before falling back to the ground, some within the factory premises and others outside. At the peak of the emergency, some 100 firemen were in attendance, together with police and ambulance services and other local organisations.

Because it was not known precisely what chemicals were involved in the blaze—I shall refer to this later—a decision was made by the police and fire brigade to evacuate more than 2,500 people from the area and emergency centres were opened at Poole arts centre and the Henry Harbin school for their accommodation. This was the biggest mass evacuation in the United Kingdom since the second world war. The residents were not allowed to return to their homes until 5.30 the following morning.

The police and fire brigade officers who took the decision to order the evacuation are to be praised for their clear thinking. The back-up services which ensured that the operation was carried out smoothly and without undue distress to those concerned were a model of how such an operation should proceed. Again, I shall refer later to their activities.

I visited the site the morning after the fire and again during the clear-up operations and was impressed with the quiet efficiency of all concerned, but I have to acknowledge that there was also a sense of profound relief that what could have been a major disaster had, with a certain amount of good fortune and a great deal of skill from the emergency services, been contained so that most of the damage done was to property rather than people. If I do not describe the events of the night in great detail, it is because they are already on the record and I believe that we now have to examine them to learn what action we can take to prevent such an occurrence in the future, either in Poole or elsewhere.

Before leaving the events of 21 June, it would be wrong if I did not put on record the admiration and gratitude which all the citizens of Poole feel for the many people who helped that evening. I have already mentioned the police and the fire brigade. Others who gave valuable assistance were Poole district council staff, the county emergency planning officer and his team, the staff of the Poole arts centre, who opened their doors to the evacuees, and the cast of the show which was appearing at the arts centre at the time, the New Vic theatre company, who put on a free show for the evacuees in the arts centre starting at midnight. The WRVS lived up to the high esteem in which we have always held them, as did the St. John Ambulance Brigade and the Red Cross.

Poole general hospital staff were both helpful and co-operative, as they always are, and so, too, were the bus operators who helped with the evacuation. Wessex Water was immediately on hand to ensure that drinking water supplies were protected and that there was no pollution of Poole harbour, and the Poole harbour commissioners rendered valuable assistance. The gas and electricity services worked tirelessly to make apparatus safe and to ensure supplies, and the Royal Marines, Poole, helped by providing such things as bedding material for those evacuated to the Henry Harbin school. It was a model of what should take place in a well-planned emergency operation of that nature, and I hope that any other local authority in the country which has any doubts about the need for good, planned emergency procedures to deal with such incidents will learn from the lessons of Poole.

The Health and Safety Executive has conducted an inquiry at the request of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary and I should like to refer to some of the conclusions that it reached, which were published in the form of a summary of its inquiry report, with a press release, on 17 October. The primary cause of the fire appears to have been a lack of proper segregation of chemicals in the store concerned, which led to a rapid and violent spread of the fire. It has been the practice of BDH for a number of years to accept out-of-time and unwanted chemicals in even very small quantities from customers and to dispose of them as a service to those customers.

It appears that some of the chemicals which had been returned and awaited sorting were not compatible and should therefore have been separated immediately, but that was not done. Because of the massive destruction in the immediate area of the fire, the Health and Safety Executive was unable positively to identify the cause of the fire, but the summary of its report suggests that a probable cause was the leakage of strongly corrosive substances on to organic materials, or exothermic decomposition of stored material. It concludes that incompatible materials had been placed too close to each other because the sorting system for returned chemicals had become overloaded. That probably resulted in the fire which took hold extremely rapidly and with violent consequences. The fire penetrated the exterior walls of the immediate store and overheated drums of flammable liquid stored outside the oxidising store. The HSE also said that the decision to locate oxidising materials close to flammable liquids was flawed because, although the building was originally built to the building regulations in force at the time, it did not conform to Health and Safety Executive guidance issued subsequently.

The HSE concludes that the storage practices adopted by the firm failed to cope with the problems created by the need to store and dispose of such a vast range of chemicals. It says that the public were not at risk from the drums of cyanide stored elsewhere in the building.

The HSE supports the police and fire brigade decision to evacuate the public because there was a mixture of a wide range of chemicals, some of which might have been hazardous and some of which were unidentified at the time of the fire.

I should like my hon. Friend to comment on the following matters. The full report has not been made public. Although I am sure that the HSE has done its best to provide an accurate summary, like all summaries it leaves a number of points unanswered, and I urge my hon. Friend, even at this late stage, to use his best endeavours to have the full report made public.

I hope that my hon. Friend will not underestimate the real sense of fear that will persist in the old town of Poole until the rumours which feed on part information are countered. I believe that my constituents are as entitled as anybody else to know exactly what the HSE inquiry revealed, whether or not it proves embarrassing to other parties. I am supported in this view by Poole borough council which, at its meeting a few hours ago, expressed its disappointment that the full report has not been published and gave its full support to my request to my hon. Friend the Minister.

My hon. Friend will be aware that on 15 July I asked him whether he would ensure that the results of the inquiry conducted by the HSE would be made public and whether he would set up a public inquiry. He said that a summary of the results would be made public. That has been done. He also said:

"I do not propose to set up a public inquiry since this would be unlikely to identify any causes or contributory factors which will not be identified by the HSE investigation." —[Official Report, 15 July 1988; Vol. 137, c. 383.]

I tend to agree with the last sentence of my hon. Friend's reply, but I hope that he will understand that the summary of the report issued by the HSE prompts a number of questions and it has certainly not satisfied members of the Poole residents association, who are still calling for a public inquiry. They have told me that they consider that there are questions still to be asked which are not answered in the HSE summary. It is ironic to consider that, if lives had been lost and we had had a tragedy instead of a serious incident, there would almost certainly have been a public inquiry and all the evidence which is at present being withheld from public examination would have been given in open court.

Given that, so far, the report has not been made public, the summary issued by the HSE prompts me to make a number of observations.

A brief assurance is given in the summary that there was no danger to local people from cyanide and a reference is made to what is said to be a similar incident at River road, Barking in 1980. Frankly, without further information, that is not reassuring. Can we know whether the conditions were precisely the same, whether the dangers were similar and, in particular, whether, if cyanide needs to be kept on that site in Poole, as I understand it may well need to be for some industrial processes, there was at any time any risk that it would affect the local population?

The HSE summary says that off-site damage was limited. I hope that that does not mean that it has ignored the fact that at another time of day, for instance, in the rush hour, when perhaps the bridge connecting old Poole with Hamworthy was open and with much more traffic on West street, there could have been considerable off-site damage with catastrophic consequences. It was also fortunate that many of the surrounding office buildings were empty at the time and even the wind direction that evening helped to limit the effects of the fire. I therefore regard the fact that off-site damage was limited as due to luck rather than skill.

Referring again to good fortune, the HSE summary says that the vast majority of fire brigade water was contained in surface water holding tanks and these presumably are part of the Wessex Water drainage system. No thought seems to have been given to what would have happened if there had been heavy rain before the fire or if the tide had been at a different state. In those circumstances, can we be reassured that harbour pollution, with its effect on both the amenities and the fishing industry in Poole, would not have been much worse?

The HSE summary refers to the fact that the building concerned met the building regulations at the time it was built, but there appears to have been no requirement to update it if the building regulations changed, and that is perhaps understandable. What is not understandable is that, subsequent to the construction of the building, the Health and Safety Executive issued guidelines which underlined the need for considerably more protection against fire than the building had at the time of the fire. I would ask my hon. Friend what provision there is for ensuring that HSE guidelines are complied with and, perhaps more important, what provision there is for ensuring that HSE guidelines are applied retrospectively in such areas where there is a danger to the public from the storage of toxic and flammable materials.

Although I understand the policy that it is for the commercial organisation concerned to devise and implement its own safety requirements, these should surely need HSE approval. The summary of the report prompts me to ask whether there is sufficient supervision in sufficient detail by the HSE. The summary of the HSE report recommends that all chemical companies ensure that their segregation policy for chemicals is clearly set out and fully implemented. Does this imply that there is room for doubt about whether this occurs as a matter of course? If so, surely everyone would agree that it is a matter for major public concern. My hon. Friend may well consider that this would lead to additional costs on HSE expenditure, but, with all the worries about environmental pollution at the present time, it would seem that there is a case for looking closely at the manning of this important Government agency.

I now turn to the actions of BDH since the fire. I should explain that it is a reputable firm employing several hundred people in Poole on two sites and that the firm has been a valued member of the Poole community since 1942. Immediately after the HSE press conference on 17 October, the company issued a statement in which it went further than the requirements now laid upon it by the Health and Safety Executive. It has agreed to remove all the chemicals arising from production from the West Quay road site, and in future chemicals returned from its customers for disposal will go to other depots or be transferred straight to waste disposal sites. I believe that that will go a long way towards meeting the anxieties of my constituents.

The company has also agreed that the open drum store, which was the immediate cause of much of the damage and spread of fire, will be removed to another site and kept in a specially constructed store which will be fitted with automatic fire extinguishing equipment.

The company is preparing a detailed and comprehensive storage policy document, which I am sure it will discuss with the Health and Safety Executive, and any reconstruction of the chemical store which is needed will take place in accordance with conditions to be agreed with the Health and Safety Executive.

I believe that, following the fire, the company has behaved responsibly, and that it will continue to be a valued employer in Poole for many years. However, there are a number of lessons which I believe may well have application not only in Poole but throughout the country. I have already queried whether the HSE resources are sufficient to carry out the important task of ensuring that chemicals and toxic substances, particularly those stored in urban areas, are properly stored and recorded. It is essential that a list which is detailed and comprehensible to people other than chemists must be immediately available at every chemical store, for use by the police and fire brigade.

I believe that when guidance books are issued by the Health and Safety Executive which, in the light of experience, call for a tightening of regulations, some further consideration must be given to how all users of chemicals and toxic materials are informed and, more important, how the Health and Safety Executive will ensure that the new safety regulations are applied retrospectively. I have already referred to the value of proper pre-planned emergency procedures for such events as took place in Poole on 21 June. I hope that my hon. Friend will use his influence to ensure that all other local authorities learn the lesson.

As our chemistry research finds new materials, life will become increasingly complicated in the area of industrial safety, and I hope that my hon. Friend will think it worthwhile that the chemical industries and their trade associations should, together with representatives of the Government, continuously monitor safety requirements, particularly as they are applied in urban areas such as Poole.

I have spoken of the luck and good fortune associated with the outcome of the events in Poole on 21 June, but I remind the Minister that 2,500 of my constituents were evacuated from their homes late at night, experiencing considerable fear and distress, and I hope that he will appreciate that they will not be satisfied until the full facts surrounding the incident are made available to them. I therefore once again plead with the Minister that he should seek, with the agreement of the company if possible, to ensure that the whole report is made public. I believe that, following their experiences on 21 June, my constituents deserve nothing less.

3.52 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Patrick Nicholls): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Ward) on bringing this important issue before the House—despite the eccentric hour at which he has managed to do it.

The fire at the British Drug House plant in Poole on 21 June was a serious incident and I fully appreciate the concerns that my hon. Friend has expressed so eloquently. He was extremely prompt about contacting my office and making clear his worries; his constituents need be in no doubt about that, or about the steps that he has taken to bring the matter to my attention, to ensure that such an incident never occurs again.

I will do my best to return to my hon. Friend's detailed points, but first I will need to say a word about the regime of control measures covering the use of chemicals at work, because it is necessary to understand the context in which these events took place.

To say that life in an industrial society involves coping with processes and substances of great complexity and potential danger may be atruism, but it is an accurate statement for all that. Industrialisation brings great benefits, but at the same time it poses great hazards and risks. Fuels, for example, are a potent source of energy, but are also potentially dangerous because of their highly flammable nature. By the same token, no one seriously doubts the need for effective pesticides, but their very effectiveness derives from their toxicity.

The key issue which my hon. Friend has brought before us is how to enjoy the benefits of these substances and processes without putting in undue jeopardy the safety and health of the workers who produce and handle them or of the people, like those living near chemical plants or warehouses, who will be at risk if things go wrong. A balanced approach is required, and the framework for achieving that balance must be enshrined in law. It must maintain essential levels of safety, but avoid imposing unnecessary rigidities and costs.

The fundamental law in this area is the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. It places general duties on employers, and anyone else who is in control of a work activity, to safeguard the health and safety at work of all employees, and to ensure that the public are not exposed to risks to their health and safety. These general but very powerful obligations are further strengthened by a number of more specific regulations, many of which directly address chemical safety. Within that framework it is especially important to have specific systems of control for places where hazardous chemicals are concentrated in significant quantities.

Our approach—both domestically and in Europe—is to identify which substances—and, indeed, what quantities of a particular substance—are a hazard or risk, and then to set out the necessary precautions. Central to that approach are the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984, which implement a European Community directive. Those apply to sites with the greatest potential danger and impose some stringent requirements. They include the submission to the Health and Safety Executive of detailed safety cases analysing hazards and risks, the preparation of emergency plans to protect people both on and off the site in the case of a serious accident, and furnishing information to people living nearby who might be affected by a major accident.

In addition, the regulations are now to be amended to apply to a greatly increased range of places, including many warehouses containing packaged goods.

As I have said, the regulations apply only to workplaces handling the most dangerous substances, but the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substances Regulations 1982 apply to a larger group of chemicals and prohibit any person from using them unless he has notified the Health and Safety Executive at least three months previously. There are also other important statutes, like the legislation on fire precautions and pollution control and the town and country planning legislation, which serve to protect people from the hazards of chemicals.

The Health and Safety Commission is shortly to consider some possible further regulations that would require the notification of sites containing an aggregate quantity of 25 tonnes or more of dangerous substances and the erection of warning signs. Those regulations would assist enforcing authorities and the fire services in carrying out inspections, and most importantly would alert firemen to the presence of dangerous substances when they arrive on site, which is one of the specific points raised by my hon. Friend. Taken together, the regulations represent a system of graduated response, according to the severity of the hazard. They seek to give enforcing authorities and the emergency services the right degree of control, information and capability.

I hope that it is clear, from what I have said about the impending extension of major hazards legislation and the proposed regulations on notification and markings of sites, that we are far from complacent in this area. However, while the legal framework is essential, obviously it cannot be the whole story. What the law can do is to set conditions and make provision for enforcement, but what really matters are the working practices where chemicals are made, combined, stored or handled.

It is, of course, vital that those dealing with hazardous chemicals have a full understanding of their properties, not only on their own, but as they might interact. Chemicals that may be relatively harmless when stored separately can produce devastating effects in combination with others. That makes the proper segregation of groups of chemicals and the provision of fire resistant structures absolutely essential. Those, of course, were factors in the fire at BDH Ltd in my hon. Friend's constituency.

Having set out the general framework briefly, I should now like to address some of my hon. Friend's more specific concerns. The House has already heard some of the details concerning the explosion at the BDH plant. I agree with my hon. Friend that the severity of the incident should not be underestimated, and I should like to join him in paying tribute to the work of the emergency services and the many other organisations and individuals involved. There is no doubt that their calm and responsible action did much to mimimise the inconvenience and fear suffered by the residents of my hon. Friend's constituency.

In addressing my hon. Friend's specific points, I should first like to emphasise that the Health and Safety Executive carried out a very detailed investigation into the incident. It has produced a comprehensive report of its investigations and copies have already been made available to all public authorities with an interest in the incident. In addition, it held a press conference on 17 October when it made available to the public not only a statement but a detailed summary of its investigation. Having seen both that and the full report, I should like to think that my hon. Friend agrees that the detailed summary gave a full and comprehensive list of the HSE's recommendations and conclusions.

While I appreciate my hon. Friend's point about a wider dissemination of the report, I must emphasise that the requirements of section 28(3) of the 1974 Act, which deal with matters of confidentiality, mean that the report cannot be published in full. But I was pleased to hear my hon. Friend agree that he did not see any advantage in setting up a public inquiry.

I am confident that the HSE's investigation was thorough and has gone as far as possible towards identifying the causes and contributory factors surrounding this incident. The House has already issued an improvement notice to BDH Ltd. to ensure that the key recommendation of the report is implemented, and I understand that the company agreed and accepted that recommendation. I was encouraged to hear my hon. Friend's description of the various actions taken by the company since the fire occurred.

However, I appreciate that the residents of Poole may still have questions that they wish to raise. I shall be more than happy to meet the Poole residents association to discuss with it any concerns which it has.

My hon. Friend raised a number of other points about the events at Poole. On the question of sodium cyanide, the HSE does not consider that this substance in itself presents a hazard in a fire. If it were to come into contact with an acid solution, cyanide gas may be given off, but I am advised that in a fire the heat involved would almost certainly destroy this gas.

I agree that there was some good fortune that the off-site damage resulting from this explosion was not more extensive. But it was also bad fortune that the incident occurred at all. The HSE and the public authorities involved are looking closely at the conclusions of the investigation and will obviously consider existing procedures in the light of this experience.

My hon. Friend also asked about the adequacy of the water holding system. I understand that the bulk of the liquid was contained within the effluent plant on site. Any fire water that was not contained went to the pumping plant, which has two holding tanks. In any case, the quantities of water involved would have significantly diluted any particularly hazardous substances, and any rain would only have helped this process.

I come to the question of the HSE's resources. My hon. Friend asked a number of times whether I was satisfied with the manner in which the HSE carried out its responsibilities and with the measures it takes to ensure compliance with new and existing safety requirements. I am fully satisfied that the HSE has sufficient resources to carry out its responsibilities and to monitor safety standards.

But I must also add that the prime responsibility for the prevention of accidents clearly lies with employers, employees and others at the workplace.

On any basis, the incidents at Poole which my hon. Friend has brought to our attention tonight were, frankly, terrifying and I well understand the concern which he and his constituents have had to ensure that such a thing should never happen again.

I hope that in what is inevitably a brief contribution in a brief debate I have been able to offer my hon. Friend some of the consolations and assurances he sought. I stress again that I shall be delighted to meet the delegation he wishes to bring to me and to do what I can to set their minds at rest still further.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at two minutes past Four o'clock on Wednesday morning.

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Royal Assent

Mr. Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

1. Housing (Scotland) Act 1988
2. Foreign Marriage (Amendment) Act 1988

PRIVATE BUSINESS

RIVER HUMBER (BURCOM OUTFALL) BILL [Lords]

PORT OF TYNE BILL [Lords]

LONDON REGIONAL TRANSPORT (PENALTY FARES) BILL [Lords]

LONDON LOCAL AUTHORITIES BILL [Lords]

AVON LIGHT RAIL TRANSIT BILL [Lords]

CITY OF LONDON (SPITALFIELDS MARKET) BILL

Orders read for consideration of motions.

To be considered on Thursday 10 November at Seven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Housing Starts

1. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of the number of housing starts in the north-west region between 1979 and 1987.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. David Trippier): One hundred and sixty-four thousand seven hundred dwellings were started in the north west in the nine years 1979 to 1987. In 1987 there were 14,500 private sector starts—more than 2,000 more than in 1979.

Mr. Lloyd: Will the Minister confirm that in every year under this Government the rate of housing starts in the north west has been as low as two thirds of what it was in the last full year of the Labour Government? The Government claim, perhaps truthfully, that the private sector has made up for the public sector in the south-east, but that is massively untrue of the north west.

Does the Minister accept that every credible survey of housing—the Duke of Edinburgh, the Institute of Housing and the local authorities' inquiries—has said that there is massive under-investment nationally in housing, particularly in the north-west? When will the Government do something serious about the approaching housing crisis in that region?

Mr. Trippier: What really matters is that the total stock, public and private sector, has increased since 1979. The number of households in the north-west increased in the last years on record—1981 to 1986—by 2·3 per cent., compared with an increase in dwelling stock of 60,000, or 2·4 per cent. Therefore, the growth in dwelling stock has more than kept pace with the growth in the number of households, which is the most important point. In the same period, the population in the north-west declined slightly.

Mr. Burt: My hon. Friend will know of the need in the north-west, as in many other parts of the country, for low-cost rental accommodation. Bearing in mind the Government's justifiable concern about the way in which some local authorities manage their housing stock, may I ask what the Government are doing to boost housing associations, which greatly contribute to low-cost rental housing? Will more be done for them in the north-west?

Mr. Trippier: My hon. Friend will know that, in the Housing Bill, we are directing more resources to the housing corporations, and thus to housing associations. He should draw comfort, as I am sure do many Conservative Members, from the substantial increase made available by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer yesterday—a rise of £1·328 billion by 1991, which is 80 per cent. above this year's estimated outturn.

Mr. Alton: Does the Minister agree that one way of providing more homes for people on waiting lists would be to liberate under-occupied properties? The key to that is to build more sheltered accommodation for the ever-increasing number of elderly people in our region. Does the hon. Gentleman also agree, based on his recent visit to Liverpool, that the key to good management of properties is to hand them over to tenants, and that a good way of doing that is through housing co-operatives?

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman is certainly right. The Government are keen on housing co-operatives, and at the moment we are studying the under-occupation of dwellings. We need to address our minds to that problem. The current review on homelessness will be a major feature in the decisions that we shall eventually reach.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Will my hon. Friend pay a well-deserved tribute to the stirling work of the Abbeyfields Society, which has just opened another charming home in Lancaster and is hoping shortly to build one at Garstang?

Mr. Trippier: I am happy to concur with my hon. Friend. The Abbeyfields housing association is incredibly well known, especially in the region from which my hon. Friend and I come and represent. I am delighted to put on record my praise for that organisation.

Housing Bill

2. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received on the Housing Bill since July.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I and my colleagues have received a number of representations from hon. Members, interested bodies and the general public on a wide range of matters relating to the Housing Bill.

Mr. Winnick: Why are the Government apparently so determined to reverse the decision of another place that council tenants should be balloted to allow them to decide whether their property should be included in a housing action trust? Why should council tenants be denied the right to decide on this issue, and why are the Government so afraid of democracy?

Mr. Ridley: I have never quite understood why the Labour party seems so determined to whip up a campaign of misinformation about a matter that is of pure benefit to tenants, who will have a large amount of public money put at their disposal to improve the rotten houses in which many of them have to live.

Mr. Heddle: Has my right hon. Friend received any evidence at all that some Labour-controlled councils are using municipal harassment to discourage tenants from eventually opting out of their control by threatening not to carry out repairs if they do vote to opt out? Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to deplore such tactics, and will he take action against authorities that use those tactics?

Mr. Ridley: I have heard all sorts of rumours. If Labour councils want to be seen as sensible and fair and want to provide for their people, they must try to maintain higher standards of accuracy about what the Government are trying to do.

Dr. Cunningham: If the Government's housing proposals are so good for tenants, why is the Secretary of State so reluctant to let tenants decide for themselves? Is it not significant that in a leaflet of proposals about the balloting of tenants the Government fail to say or deliberately omit the fact, that if tenants do not vote they will be counted as voting in favour? What bigger gerrymandering of a vote can there be?

Mr. Ridley: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on scraping back. We hope that he will spend many years on the Opposition Benches, asking questions such as the one that he has just asked.

In reply to his first point, I suggest that the time to debate any amendments made in another place is the next time that the Bill comes before the House.

The hon. Gentleman's second point is entirely separate. He knows full well that any tenant who does not wish to go with the majority who are exercising their right to choose a new landlord has a right to go back to the local authority for a direct tenancy.

Mr. Squire: Does my right hon. Friend agree that when the miasma of distortion mounted by the Opposition on the Housing Bill is finally revealed, most people will welcome the Bill, not only because of the substantial resources in the form of increased housing benefit, but also for the increased protection that private tenants will enjoy in future?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is right. The attitude of the Opposition is beginning to raise questions about whether they are interested in the benefit and welfare of tenants, many of whom have real problems, or are simply trying to stir up opposition to try to make some sort of political capital, the point of which I do not see.

Conduct of Local Authority Business

3. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received in response to the publication of the White Paper on the conduct of local authority business.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): My right hon. Friend has received 65 letters from Members of Parliament, local authorities, councillors and interested organisations, commenting on the White Paper.

Mr. Banks: Is the Minister aware that the White Paper is nothing more than a long essay on Government hypocrisy? How dare the Prime Minister go to Poland and start lecturing the Poles about freedom when she is dismantling local democracy? For how much longer are these attacks on local authorities going to continue? Is the Minister aware that no Government this century have sought to interfere in the affairs of local authorities as much as this Government. have done? When will he start defending, instead of destroying local democracy?

Mr. Gummer: The greatest damage to local authorities and local democracy has been caused by Labour councils run not for the benefit of ratepayers or for those who are in need but for the benefit of the furtherance of extreme Left-wing Marxist ideas. Any hon. Member who can make that kind of comment after the revelations about Brent today should be ashamed of himself.

Mr. McLoughlin: Will my right hon. Friend, when looking at the responses that he has received on the conduct of local government business, bear in mind what happened on Cannock Chase district council when I was a member of it? The then chairman of the council lost his seat in the May election, but remained as chairman until the annual meeting. In between there was another meeting of the council and he used his casting vote, despite not being a member of the council. Will my right hon. Friend consider whether that has any relevance to the conduct of local authority business?

Mr. Gummer: The conduct of local authorities is best seen when people obey the rules and carry them out and do not try to make party political propaganda out of following the rules.

Dr. Cunningham: Before we have too many sanctimonious lectures about local government from the Tories, will the Minister comment on the conduct of the Conservative-controlled Westminster city council, which sold cemeteries for 15p, which are now being advertised for sale at £5·5 million, and which is not charging for refuse collection from commercial organisations, which the district auditor has quite clearly said is unlawful? If the Minister has something to say about standards of conduct, why does he not look a little closer to home?

Mr. Gummer: I am willing to condemn unlawful action from wherever it comes. I only hope that the hon. Gentleman will condemn his hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), who is a Labour Front-Bench spokesman on the Health Service, for refusing to pay taxes, which are lawfully levied, and encouraging other persons to do the same.

Factories (Sale and Letting)

4. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the sale and letting of factories by the Commission for the New Towns in 1987-88.

Mr. Trippier: During 1987-88 the Commission for the New Towns made good progress in the letting of vacant factory space and with the implementation of its programme of property sales, including the sale of factories.

Mr. Hind: Has my hon. Friend had an opportunity to read the article in the Sunday Express of 16 October entitled, "Skelmersdale Bounces Back in New Towns Bonanza"? Is that not a major tribute to the Commission for the New Towns, which, over the past two and a half years, has let or sold 3·5 million sq ft of empty factory space in the new town and introduced 78 new firms, with a parallel reduction of unemployment of more than 2,100 over the past two years? Is it not significant that Skelmersdale, like many other new towns, is represented by Conservative Members of Parliament?

Mr. Trippier: My hon. Friend has made a significant point. Yes, I saw the article and I thought that it was a tribute to the Commission for the New Towns. I had the opportunity to meet the members of the board yesterday, and they particularly remarked on the significant change round in the industrial situation in Skelmersdale, which is to be commended. I have seen what has been done. It is truly remarkable that there is hardly any vacant factory space available to let in that area.

Mr. Conway: Does my hon. Friend feel that there is growing conflict between the activities of the commission with regard to factory lettings and those of English Estates? Are we not approaching the time when one or other of the organisations should be subsumed?

Mr. Trippier: No. Their briefs are entirely different. Obviously, there is a finality to the work of the Commission for the New Towns. That is enshrined in legislation. I was discussing that matter with the commission only yesterday. English Estates, however, has a very important regional role.

Westminster City Council (Freehold Sales)

5. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will exercise his powers under section 22(2) of the Local Government Finance Act 1982 to require the Audit Commission to direct the holding of an extraordinary audit into the accounts of Westminster city council relating to the disposal of the freeholds of 32 Smith square and 67 Tufton street, London, SW1.

Mr. Ridley: No, Sir.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: How else will we find out the truth? Does the Secretary of State know that, despite being pressed by Westminster councillors, Lord McAlpine, treasurer of the Conservative party, refuses to divulge any information about that transaction? What is he trying to hide? Why does he not let us have the figures or let us have sight of the documents so that we can stand the allegations up or the Conservative party can knock them down? All we want is the truth. Will the Secretary of State go to Lord McAlpine and ask him to publish the documents in the public interest? As a Westminster ratepayer, I want to know what is happening.

Mr. Ridley: I am delighted to give the hon. Gentleman such information as I have, including the figures. At the beginning of this decade Westminister sold quite a number of freeholds to sitting tenants. The freehold, plus the lease, is worth more combined than the two separately. The council's policy was to obtain 70 per cent. of the gain that arose from combining the lease with the freehold.

In the case of Smith square, the council sold a freehold valued at £60,000 for the sum of £1·325 million—a profit for Westminster ratepayers of about £1·25 million.

As for Transport house next door, the council sold the freehold of the Labour party's headquarters to the Transport and General Workers Union for £2·25 million —a profit for Westminster ratepayers of about £2 million. In the two transactions, the Transport and General Workers Union probably made a far bigger profit than Conservative Central Office on the sale of the lease. I quite understand why the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), who is sponsored by that union, has not raised this particular question. He must know what a bonanaza that union has made by its very wise purchase of the freehold.

I can assure the House that the district auditor will give his views on whether the original transactions were made at the proper market value, as all those concerned believe they were.

Mr. Wilshire: Does my right hon. Friend agree that trying to score cheap party points off the sale of one property in Smith square is really bringing politics to an all-time low if Opposition Members do not admit to profits being made by their friends in the trade unions?

Mr. Ridley: I make no complaint about either transaction. I believe that they were both at proper market value, I am delighted that both purchasers and many others managed to take advantage of the rise in the property market later on. However, I believe that the Labour party should stop being so partial and selective.

Mr. Rooker: The Secretary of State is not telling the whole truth; he is misinforming the House. Is it not a lapse in accepted standards of conduct of public administration in this country when the governing party conspires with a local authority in a property transaction which, as the Secretary of State did not say in his reply, leads to the governing party making a profit of £2·4 million at the expense of ratepayers? That is what actually happened as a result of the transaction in 1983, which is not the transaction about which the right hon. Gentleman told the House. The governing party of this country made that profit. No other political party or trade union has been involved in making a profit further down the line.

Mr. Ridley: That really was lame. The hon. Gentleman knows full well that there was an interval between the two transactions, during which property values rose. He knows that the TGWU has made just the same profit over the same period, although it has not yet chosen to cash it in.

Mr. Speaker, if you are not able to call the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who has been rising to intervene, let me say that I would ask him to withdraw the allegation that he made in his speech on Monday—column 728 of Hansard—that the sale of the freehold for Conservative Central Office was a scandal. I have now made it clear that it was not a scandal, and I hope that he will do the decent thing and withdraw that remark.

Homelessness (Rural Areas)

6. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to take in the light of the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux report concerning homelessness in rural areas; and if he will make a statement.

12. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimates he has made of housing need in rural areas.

Mr. Ridley: I have received this valuable report, which is now being studied. My officials will be meeting representatives of the association shortly to discuss the report's findings. On 5 July I published consultation papers on planning and low-cost housing in rural areas. I hope that the hon. Gentlemen have studied these.

Mr. Taylor: The Secretary of State may be aware that homelessness in rural areas in the south has nearly doubled since 1979. Does he agree that he sold the homeless down the river by yesterday's announcement that the Department of the Environment's housing budget will be slashed by 21 per cent., and that, of the council house receipts which he says he is putting back into housing, a full £500 million will be returned to the Treasury? Did he not wave the white flag to the Chancellor, rather than defend the homeless?

Mr. Ridley: In the hon. Gentleman's local authority, Carrick district council, in the first quarter of 1988, 34 households were accepted as homeless and there were 19 empty council houses. I do not believe that the figures support what he said. I agree that in many rural areas there is a shortage of planning permission to build houses for the people who want them. However, the hon. Gentleman seems to have failed to study the Department of the Environment's spending plans. If he had looked at them, he would have seen the Housing Corporation line rising to £1,328 million in 1991-92—an increase of 80 per cent.—for the provision of new low-cost housing for rent or sale. I will ensure that a sufficient proportion of that is allocated to rural areas.

Mr. Worthington: When will the Secretary of State realise that it is a shortage, not of planning permission for those who want to build houses, but of houses for those who already live in rural areas? The Secretary of State should realise that market forces will not deal with that problem and that it is essential for public action to be taken to ensure that low-cost houses are built, for purchase or rent, for people who legitimately want to continue to live in rural areas.

Mr. Ridley: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the benefit of any knowledge that I have about Clydebank and Milngavie. However, I can tell him that in the south of England the problem is very much one of sites as well as houses. It is no good having more money for more houses if we do not have the plots on which to build them.

Mr. Steen: With regard to housing needs in rural areas, will my right hon. Friend confirm that, where there are properly constituted local district plans—following discussions between parish and district councils that have been confirmed by the Department of the Environment—and where the housing allocation for villages or towns has been reached, if the district council planning committee turns down a development application for more houses because it exceeds the local plan, on appeal his inspectors will be instructed to refuse that appeal because the local plan housing allocation has been exceeded?

Mr. Ridley: I do not instruct inspectors to do anything. They follow the pubished guidance and the published local plan, provided it has been properly adopted and is up to date. In the circumstances that my hon. Friend described, it is unlikely that they would overrule a planning committee on appeal. If such development were not allowed on appeal, it might—indeed, probably would—result in a shortage of houses in some rural areas, which is the cause of the problem.

Mr. David Martin: Is not one of the main problems of the shortage of houses in rural areas that those already living in such areas, and those representing them, strongly object to new proposals for development, while pushing them in the direction of cities that are already well developed, such as Portsmouth?

Mr. Ridley: I am afraid that there is much truth in what my hon. Friend said. Those of us who live in the pressure areas of the country—mainly the south—must come to terms with the dichotomy between the undoubted need for more houses and the need to find places to put them.

Mr. Madden: As the question concerns a report from the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux on the homeless, is the Secretary of State aware that in one fell swoop Bradford Tory council is proposing to stop funding a hostel for homeless——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is nothing to do with homelessness in rural areas.

Mr. Madden: There is homelessness throughout the rural areas of Yorkshire, and Bradford Tory council is proposing to stop funding that hostel. It is also proposing to withdraw funding from Bradford Citizens' Advice Bureau. As the Secretary of State made an urgent visit to Bradford in the past fortnight to praise the policies of Bradford Tory council, will he make urgent investigations to ensure that funding is made available to keep that hostel open?

Mr. Ridley: I was not expecting rural Bradford to arise from this question, but if Bradford city council is able to avoid wasting money extravagantly on unnecessary things, it will have more money to spend on the homeless and on securing more homes for people who need them.

Mosques

7. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from Ealing, North constituency about the operation of the planning regulations as they relate to the construction of mosques in industrial areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: A number of representations have been received from my hon. Friend and many of his constituents about a proposal to erect a mosque on the site of the former Sadia industrial works in his constituency. The planning issues to which the proposal gave rise were for the local planning authority to determine.

Mr. Greenway: Will my hon. and learned Friend confirm that Ealing council should rescind its mistaken planning permission for a mosque on the Northolt industrial site and find the Dawcodis Bhora community an alternative site? Is he aware that the people of Northolt have unanmously opposed the granting of planning permission for two years, most recently at a meeting attended by 1,000 people, which I chaired? They have written thousands of letters to the council which have been ignored. The council is refusing industrial applications on industrial sites which would bring jobs to the borough, so there is a perceived threat to jobs. Is this not a serious position that is damaging for race relations?

Mr. Howard: I certainly confirm that the powers to revoke planning permission are contained in the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, but the exercise of those powers is, in the first instance, for the local planning authority.

Water Meters

8. Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a further statement on the introduction of water meters in private homes.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Colin Moynihan): It is for each water authority and company to decide whether to charge domestic customers by meter, taking into account all the circumstances. The metering trials which are to take place over the next three or four years are intended to help water undertakers take their decisions.

Mr. Atkinson: Does my hon. Friend accept that large numbers of elderly people will be especially grateful to him and to his Department for seeking to end the unfair system of water charges based on rateable values instead of on usage? How much will consumers in the trial areas be expected to pay towards the cost of metering, and does that represent the actual cost of installation?

Mr. Moynihan: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's first comment. Under the Public Utility Transfers and Water Charges Act 1988 the cost of installing meters compulsorily will be paid for by the water authorities or the companies concerned, which will recover those charges from the generality of customers. The customer cannot be charged directly for the compulsory installation of a meter. As my hon. Friend knows, the costs of the current trial programme is being shared between the Government and the water authorities.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister accept that any move towards metering will involve large capital and ongoing revenue costs for the water authorities? Will that not mean that the water authorities will have to obtain increased income from consumers unless there is a massive saving of water because of the introduction of meters? Who, ultimately, will pay the costs involved with a metering system?

Mr. Moynihan: It is clear that the customers, ultimately, will have to pay those costs. We are considering whether to include a condition in the privatised utility companies' terms of appointment so that they can recover the cost of installing meters through their water charges to customers.

Mr. Barry Fields: Will my hon. Friend reconsider the trial meter areas and his Department's request that a certain number of meters be installed in homes? Does that not run contrary to the intention of the Home Office to reduce the number of people required to enter homes to read meters? The Isle of Wight is the largest meter trial area in the country, with more than 50,000 homes having meters installed and includes the homes of many elderly people. Will my hon. Friend reconsider that policy? Will he also commend the Southern water authority for its excellent consultation process on its trial area scheme?

Mr. Moynihan: It is right that proper care and attention is taken over the vetting of anyone entering a home to install a meter for any utility purpose. I am happy to congratulate the Southern water authority on its excellent work in the Isle of Wight. It has been wise enough to set up a free hot line so that anyone can telephone direct if he or she is in the least bit concerned about the validity of the individual coming through the door to install a meter during the trial period.

Mr. Boyes: Does the Minister recall that during the passage of what is now the Public Utility Transfers and Water Charges Act 1988, he gave an assurance that the views of those taking part in the meter trials would be fully taken into consideration during the consultative process? Will he prepare a report on the problems experienced during that consultative process? Is he aware that, in particular, the people of Normanton have been shabbily treated by the Yorkshire water authority and are highly dissatisfied? Will he visit Normanton so that he can appreciate the deep opposition to the introduction of universal water metering?

Mr. Moynihan: All schemes for approval have detailed proposals on the consultation process undertaken. They are considered in detail by my right hon. Friend before he gives approval for any of the schemes. I am aware of the strength of feeling in south Normanton and I have given an assurance to the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) that, once we have received the formal proposal, I shall go with him to a public meeting in the area to hear the views of local residents on its terms.

Sports Council

9. Mr. Jessel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next intends to meet the chairman of the Sports Council.

Mr. Moynihan: I regularly meet the chairman of the Sports Council. The next occasion will be on 10 November.

Mr. Jessel: When my hon. Friend meets the chairman, will he discuss the damage to the goodwill of the Sports Council because of its part funding of a horrible scheme to erect eight floodlight towers, 52 ft high and emitting 66,000 W in the heart of a residential area of Teddington? Richmond-upon-Thames council scheme is so unpopular that two public meetings voted against it, first by 132 to 17 and later by over 400 to 12. Will my hon. Friend invite the chairman of the Sports Council to consider instead an improved playing field for Teddington school, but without any floodlights?

Mr. Moynihan: I am aware of the Teddington school scheme and my hon. Friend's detailed representations on the subject. He will understand that, on planning grounds, I have no locus to intervene, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already published his decision not to call in. However, I am aware that further local developments of significance to the sports initiative are now available, and I undertake to ensure that the chairman of the Sports Council receives details of my hon. Friend's representations to the House and myself.

Mr. Pendry: The Minister seems to be quite proud of his so-called streamlined Sports Council, but should he not feel quite ashamed that, despite the great successes of our black athletes at the Olympic games, he has chosen this time to snub ethnic minority sports people by removing their representation from his diminished Sports Council?

Mr. Moynihan: I regard that as a deeply offensive reflection on the enormous hard work that has been done by members of the Sports Council, whatever their colour, on behalf of everybody who enjoys participation in sport and the development of excellence. I am glad to say that we in this country do not have positive discrimination in public appointments, based on colour. It is quite right and proper that we put people into the Sports Council who are competent and capable of reflecting the needs of everybody in the community on their merits.

Mr. John Carlisle: When my hon. Friend next meets the chairman of the Sports Council, who is also the chairman of Liverpool football club, will he re-emphasise to him Her Majesty's Government's determination to press ahead with a full membership scheme for soccer at an early opportunity, based on the lines of the successful experiment at Luton Town football club, as being the only real answer to hooliganism and violence which, sadly, still besmirch the game of football?

Mr. Moynihan: Yes, Sir. Those guilty of hooliganism must be stopped from entering football grounds. A full package of measures for inside and outside grounds is needed.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: When the Minister next meets the chairman of the Sports Council, will he draw his attention to an article in today's edition of The Independent, which outlines the plight of the British Bobsleigh Association and the British Ski Federation, both of which have had to abandon plans for their high-level competitors? Does the Minister accept that receptions at No. 10 Downing street are no substitute for proper, substantial and systematic support for our Olympic competitors?

Mr. Moynihan: Of course. Receptions were never intended to be a substitute, nor has anybody ever suggested that they should be. The hon. and learned Gentleman will know that, in the build-up to an Olympic games, the Sports Council places additional resources available to several governing bodies in the Olympic games. If we separate the Olympic review money, as I wish The Independent had done, to give a fair representation, we will note that, over the past three years, money going from the Sports Council to the British Ski Federation has risen from £207,500 to £227,500, and to a higher figure of £236,000.

Mr. Lord: When my hon. Friend next meets the chairman of the Sports Council, will he suggest to him that the Seoul Olympic games should be the last in their present form? Is he aware that many lovers of sport believe that they were rather more of a professional sporting circus than a true Olympic event, which will be remembered more for the drugs that were taken than for sporting achievements? Will he urgently consider establishing a permanent site for the Olympic games, perhaps in Greece? More important, will he take urgent steps to try to re-establish true amateurism among participants in the games, to try to regain the true spirit of the Olympics?

Mr. Moynihan: I do not accept the premises that my hon. Friend has brought to the attention of the House. However, I will raise his specific comments with the chairman of the Sports Council, although it would be even better if my hon. Friend were to direct his comments towards the British Olympic Association.

Mr. Denis Howell: Will the Minister kindly tell us why last weekend he was selectively and anonymously engaged in leaking new Government proposals to tax football transfers in order to pay for the Government's new computer? Why did the Minister not have the decency to make a statement instead of leaking the proposals to two political journalists? Why was "football" not consulted about this new proposal? Why is it that this week 60 sports have learnt that their grants are to be cut, when there has been no consultation whatever with them or the Central Council of Physical Recreation, as is required by the royal charter for sport? Is it not clear that we no longer have a Ministry for sport, but instead have a dictatorship for sport, headed by the absurd figure of this Minister?

Mr. Moynihan: I never behave selectively and anonymously. The right hon. Gentleman's allegations are complete nonsense. I spent Saturday in my constituency and Sunday enjoying a relaxing day with my family.

Estate Action

10. Mr. Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the level of Estate Action funding for the years 1987-88 and 1988-89, respectively.

Mr. Trippier: The funding was £75 million in 1987-88 and £140 million in 1988-89.

My right hon. Friend announced yesterday a further substantial increase for next year of 36 per cent. That brings the total to £190 million.

Mr. Patnick: I thank my hon. Friend for that response and, on behalf of Sheffield, for the £7 million that it received. This year we shall receive £6·8 million and, as an Oliver Twist, may I ask whether there will be any more please for next year? If so, how much?

Mr. Trippier: I cannot answer the last question, because it is too early to say how the money will be allocated. My hon. Friend pointed out that Sheffield received 17 per cent. of the total regional allocation for Yorkshire and Humberside. From the increase announced by my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Chancellor of the Exchequer it is clear that there will be increased allocations on a regional basis. We shall consider carefully the application that Sheffield submits.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Will the Minister confirm that £190 million spread across the country is hardly a significant amount compared with the massive cuts in local authority housing investment programmes? Is not Estate Action funding a palliative? Small sums are given to local authorities to patch up poor estates which really need major surgery. They are palliatives that the Government have introduced to conceal the fact that they are not allowing local authorities to build new council houses.

Mr. Trippier: The gross provision for capital expenditure on housing in 1989-90 will be £441 million, which is a 12 per cent. increase on what was previously planned. Why is it that the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends never take account of capital receipts and behave as if they did not exist? They choose to ignore capital receipts simply because they are not keen on the right-to-buy policy that draws in those receipts. The receipts are estimated to be about £3 billion, which is an impressive figure. Estate Action money is over and above that sum.

Angell and Loughborough Estates, London

11. Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many (a) letters have been sent and (b) visits have been made, by his officials, to tenants and residents of the Angell and Loughborough estates, London SW9.

Mr. Ridley: A total of 4,326 copies of two letters have been sent to occupiers of Angeltown and Loughborough estates. I met council and tenant representatives on 27 July, and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier) has visited the estates. In addition, there have been three meetings attended by my officials.

Mr. Fraser: Does that not involve political expenditure in advance of a decision by Parliament, and is the Secretary of State not paying a substantial fee to Peat, Marwick, McLintock to find out whether there is support for housing action trusts among the tenants? In the interests of saving public expenditure, will the Secretary of State take it from me that the tenants are opposed to HATs? If he does not believe me, will he accept the decision of the other place to have a ballot of tenants?

Mr. Ridley: I remember the meeting which the hon. Gentleman attended with the tenants. I am sure that he will sympathise with me on how difficult it is to discuss and explain these matters to people if they walk out before the meeting starts. I find it difficult to discover whether they are in favour or against HATs when they do not stay to talk to me.

Mr. Soley: Will the Secretary of State explain why he cannot tell the tenants what housing action trusts are about? He told us earlier that they were about getting extra money, but Peat, Marwick, McLintock clearly says in its document, which I have here in full, that "the goal" is "successful transfer to the private sector."

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member should not quote.

Mr. Soley: As that is the intention of Peat, Marwick, McLintock, has it misled, or have the tenants been misled?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman, as he knows, has obtained another stolen document—only this time it was stolen by the tenants. I express no dismay, because he does not quite know what it means. The private sector, of course, includes housing associations and tenants' co-operatives that are classified as being in the private sector.

Housing Associations (London)

14. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met representatives of housing associations in London; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Ridley: I recently met the chairman of the Housing Corporation and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier) will hold a meeting of representatives of the London Housing Associations Council next week.

Mr. Bowis: Is my right hon. Friend aware that many thousands of former council tenants have lost their right to buy by being transferred to housing association tenancies? Is he aware that in London the transfer discount scheme is not a realistic option because of house prices? Will he and his hon. Friend ensure that discussions take place with housing associations in London to ensure that possibly 20 to 30 per cent. of such properties are in share purchase schemes?

Mr. Ridley: As my hon. Friend knows, the Government had always hoped that they could persuade another place to agree that charitable housing associations should be subject to the right to buy. They have not so far succeeded in that objective, and that has been the root cause of the trouble that my hon. Friend quite rightly mentioned. It denies rights to buy to some people which are granted to others who happen to be tenants of non-charitable housing associations. I agree that the home ownership for tenants of charitable associations scheme—HOTCHA—is hardly likely to fill its place as it is at present. I could not agree more strongly that the answer is that there should be more shared ownership schemes brought forward by such charitable housing associations. We cannot compel them to do so, because housing associations are voluntary bodies, but we can encourage them. I have already asked the Housing Corporation to allocate sufficient funds for this purpose if the housing associations will take them up.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Secretary of State—
[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is unfair to those who follow.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Secretary of State accept that there is increasing difficulty for housing associations in London in seeking to acquire any land or build any houses because of the extremely high cost of the land? Will the Secretary of State ensure in future that they are given the resources through the Housing Corporation to have a 100 per cent. grant, so that they can continue to meet the need that they were established to meet, which is low cost housing for rent for those in need?

Mr. Ridley: I read that SERPLAN believes that some 260,000 houses can be accommodated in London up to the end of this century. Therefore, I believe that there is still land available to build more houses in London. The vastly increased programme of funding for the Housing Corporation that my right hon. Friend and I announced yesterday in the public spending review should help to provide housing associations with the funds to build more.

There are still large numbers of empty houses and large numbers of council houses that are being abused. For instance, Brent council has now discovered that a large number of its council houses have the keys traded in Nigeria for £500 a go. If those houses were available, it would help the hon. Gentleman's constituents and other London homeless people. It is another example of the gross inefficiency of Labour authorities in the centre of London.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton rose——

Mr. Speaker: This question is about London.

Mr. Winterton: Indeed, Mr. Speaker. I am well aware of that.

Does my right hon. Friend accept that some specialist housing charities provide much-needed specialist accommodation in areas where housing costs are very high, so there could be a danger in introducing legislation to give people the right to buy because that could remove such accommodation from certain areas, thus depriving many deserving people of the opportunity of living there?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is quite right. That was the reason why the other place did not wish to grant the right to buy to tenants of charitable housing associations. However, it is a difficult decision, because at the same time large numbers of people, such as the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis), are denied the right to buy where the objections that my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) rightly mentions do not apply. Therefore, I hope that charitable housing associations will adapt their policy on the ground according to whether they are in the category of my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield or that of my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is the Secretary of State aware that an undertaking given by the Government at the time of the abolition of the GLC in respect of seaside and country homes has been reneged on by the Government? Old people were told that when their homes went over to housing associations the rent levels would remain broadly what they were at that time. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that since the London Residuary Body has sold on those homes to housing associations those old people are now having to pay staggeringly high rents? Is the Minister not ashamed of what he has done?

Mr. Ridley: I have some of those houses in my constituency. Those rents are not fixed unless the rent officer agrees any change. But it must be right that rents should rise to the general level of rents in the area concerned. I am still waiting to hear from the hon. Gentleman whether he will withdraw the word "scandal" that he used on Monday [HON. MEMBERS: "No."]

Bradford City Council

15. Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what account he took, in fixing the rate support grant for Bradford city council for 1988-89, of information provided by the council on projected staffing levels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: An authority's entitlement to block grant depends on the rate support grant settlement and on its total expenditure. My right hon. Friend took no account of individual local authority projected staffing levels in determining the RSG settlement for 1988-89.

Mr. McKay: It is regrettable that the Government took no notice of staffing levels. If they had, they would have noted that those levels were aimed at looking after the most needy in Bradford, the elderly, the young and the unemployed. Is it not a fact that Bradford Tory council, in making 9,000 people redundant over the next five years, in addition to the 25,000 already unemployed, will undermine the local economy and efforts to solve the inner urban problems of the area?

Mr. Gummer: It would be much better if the hon. Gentleman accepted the verdict of the electorate and allowed the council that they elected to make local decisions for itself, instead of constantly misinterpreting what the council is doing in a way that is wholly wrong and unacceptable.

Mr. Batiste: Does my right hon. Friend agree that ratepayers elsewhere can only benefit if their councils follow the excellent lead of the Conservatives in Bradford in cutting out waste and political appointments when making staffing decisions?

Mr. Gummer: Of course, it is up to Bradford council to make its own decisions, but the House will probably feel that, for example, the money that will now not be spent on a ludicrous nuclear-free zone will be better spent in other ways.

Mr. O'Brien: The Minister cannot deny that through the casting vote of the Conservative lord mayor of Bradford 9,000 men and women will lose their jobs, and the ripple effect wil mean further job losses in a city where 23,000 people are already looking for work. When will the Minister take action against the Right-wing Tory group which has taken over Bradford and is causing devastation in the area? Is it not time that he took action against that group rather than condemning Labour party members in other parts of the country?

Mr. Gummer: I can deny it, because the hon. Gentleman is wholly untruthful in what he has said—[Interruption.] I withdraw that comment. The hon. Gentleman is wholly mistaken in what he has said. He is confusng that with the fact that a number of jobs will go to private enterprise, others will be redeployed and in the end others will not be filled. The result will actually be more jobs in Bradford because there will no longer be such a weight on the ratepayers, and that money can be used elsewhere. The hon. Gentleman must not ask this Government to interfere in the democratic process. We believe in local government and we do not believe in directing it from the centre.

Mr. Waller: Will my hon. Friend congratulate Bradford council on recognising that the local authority exists to provide services, not to increase its empire? Is he aware that those who pay the rate bills in Bradford in many cases are the same people who have had to reduce the number of their own employees so as to pay for the local government manpower that has greatly increased in Bradford in the past few years?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right. The people of Bradford have clearly decided that they would like their city to be run by politicians, not by the local unions. That is why the argument has taken place. It will be for the Bradford group to make its own decisions about how to run its own show. It seems to me likely, however, that if one cuts the costs of local government and spends the savings on those who are most needy, while ensuring value for money, one can also ensure that there are more jobs in the private sector so that unemployment in Bradford will fall and more and more people will vote Conservative as a result.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will take points of order after the presentation of the Bill.

BILL PRESENTED

National Cervical Cancer Foundation (Establishment)

Mr. Frank Cook presented a Bill to establish a National Cervical Cancer Foundation responsible for a comprehensive programme of cervical screening and the recruitment and training of medical laboratory officers for such a programme: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 222.]

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order arising out of questions, Mr. Speaker. There is an obligation on Ministers——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not arising out of questions. It is a point of order.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order following questions, Mr. Speaker. As you know, there is an obligation on Ministers to provide information to Parliament. That is a convention of the constitution. It is misleading the House to suggest that the Conservatives in Bradford presented information to the electors——

Mr. Speaker: Order. As I feared, that is a continuation of Question Time. I am sorry that I was unable to call the hon. Gentleman, but one of his colleagues from Bradford made a rather long intervention and I cannot get every Member in.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have noticed for some time now that you tend to take points of order after other business. May I ask why?

Mr. Speaker: That has been a long-established practice.

Mr. Heffer: No, it has not.

Mr. Speaker: It certainly has.

Mr. Heffer: It has not.

Mr. Speaker: The moment when points of order are taken is immediately after statements or applications under Standing Order No. 20.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am not prepared to have a continuation of Question Time. If it is a different point of order, I will hear it.

Mr. Cryer: It is a different point of order, Mr. Speaker. The implication of your statement is that if one of a number of Members being considered for calling at Question Time takes what you regard as a long time over a question, other Members from the area will be penalised. That is something that no Speaker has ever announced in the House before. Surely we are all elected to the House and all have the right to be called at your discretion, irrespective of the comments made by any other Member.

Mr. Speaker: That is absolutely correct, but I think the hon. Gentleman will accept that if an area has four Members and every one of those Members is called on every question relating to it, that would be unfair to Members representing other areas.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East) rose——

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that I had better call Mr. Faulds.

Mr. Tony Banks: He has only just got here.

Mr. Faulds: I have been here for 22 years.

Hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that that is too long.

Mr. Faulds: I appreciate your appreciation, Sir. May I make a point that is relevant to this important point of order, without these discrepancies of youngsters trying to intervene and interfere? With due respect to you, Sir, I have been in the House longer than you.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Mr. Speaker has been here for two years longer than my hon. Friend.

Mr. Faulds: In that case, I apologise, Sir. You have done two years' more service than I have, but perhaps my memory is somewhat better than yours. In the old days, points of order were invariably accepted by the Chair the moment they arose. There has been a change in practice, which unfortunately started in the time of your lamentable predecessor.

Mr. Speaker: There has been no change of practice.

Mr. Tony Banks: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With regard to your earlier point on Bradford, you will recall that in the days of the blessed Bruinvels you regularly took questions from all three Members from Leicester——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House must allow the Speaker to make the decision on this matter. I am not prepared to debate who I call at Question Time or at any other time.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. Cryer: May I make a further point of order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am on my feet. The hon. Member may not raise a point of order.

Unleaded Petrol (Engine Adjustment)

3.36 pm

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for the compulsory tuning of motor car engines at the time of manufacture for running on unleaded petrol.

Although I am certain that it will not have escaped the notice of many hon. Members, I point out that this is National Unleaded Petrol Week. This week and my Bill are intended to encourage the take-up of unleaded petrol by the motoring public.

The emphasis on publicising unleaded petrol has been by oil companies. There are 2,300 filling stations out of a total of 20,000 or more with pumps that serve unleaded petrol. Unfortunately, the take-up rate by the travelling public is not great. The take-up rate from unleaded pumps is only 20 per cent. of that from four-star pumps. The rate could be speeded up in terms of the number of pumps available, but my Bill does something slightly different. It seeks to concentrate attention on motor manufacturers and car owners, rather than on oil companies, in order to increase the use of unleaded petrol.

The first part of my Bill aims to make it compulsory for motor manufacturers to tune new car engines to run on unleaded petrol where that can be done with a minimum of inconvenience. Fifty per cent. of new car registrations in this new car registration year beginning in August were of motor cars that could run on unleaded petrol but were tuned to run only on the leaded variety.

The second part of my Bill addresses the problem of cars already on the road. There are now 13 million motor cars on our roads that could run on unleaded petrol, but only 2 million are tuned to do so.

For new cars, my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for roads has made it clear to car manufacturers that he is prepared to issue a waiver so that, if they wish to tune their cars to run on unleaded petrol, they may do so without falling foul of the type approval regulations. For used cars, my Bill would seek to make it a condition of the issue or reissue of an MOT certificate that cars that can be converted to run on unleaded petrol are converted before the certificate is issued.

The cost of retuning is small, varying between £5 and £20, depending on model type. As unleaded petrol is 6p cheaper than four-star petrol since the change announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Budget, it is clear that if a customer completes the average mileage of about 10,000 miles, the cost of that conversion could be recouped within a year.

One motor manufacturer has gone further than that. The Vauxhall company has agreed that cars that were made after 1985 will be retuned free of charge to run on unleaded petrol, and the new Cavalier will be so retuned by the dealer before the customer takes delivery. It is worth pointing out that if cars are converted to run on unleaded petrol, that does not mean that they cannot use the leaded variety when the unleaded variety is not available.

The slow take-up of unleaded petrol is largely the result of the ignorance of car owners and the motor trade generally about it. I hope that my Bill, combined with National Unleaded Petrol Week, will improve the level of knowledge and encourage car owners to make the change to unleaded petrol. I hope that my hon. Friends and other hon. Members will take a lead and, if they are able to do so, have their cars converted to run on unleaded petrol as soon as possible.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Keith Mans, Mr. James Paice, Mr. Irvine Patnick and Mr. Julian Brazier.

Unleaded Petrol (Engine Adjustment)

Mr. Keith Mans accordingly presented a Bill to provide for the compulsory tuning of motor car engines at the time of manufacture for running on unleaded petrol: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 223.]

Firearms (Amendment) Bill [Money] (No. 3)

3.42 pm

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I beg to move,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Firearms (Amendment) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of sums required by the Secretary of State for making payments in respect of expenses incurred in the performance of their duties by members of the consultative committee established by that Act.

I want so speak about the money resolution, not least because I see that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) is in his place. In the past he has made some comments about money resolutions, and no doubt has had a considerable degree of pleasure from them.

The House will recall that this is the third money resolution relating to the Firearms (Amendment) Bill. The first money resolution, which was debated in January this year, provided for the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any administrative expenses incurred by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State as a consequence of the Bill, and also for the payment into the Consolidated Fund of any sums of money received under the Bill by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

The House will recall that a number of hon. Members —notably the hon. Member for Bradford, South—made the point that the scope of the money resolution being accepted by the House was not wide enough to cover the buy-in policy if it were to be adopted. As the House knows, it was adopted and, as a result, a second money resolution was brought forward and debated in the House at the beginning of March. The second money resolution provided for the making of payments in relation to the buy-in scheme for weapons prohibited under the Bill.

During the progress of the Bill, and particularly on Report, the Government accepted the need to make provision in the Bill for the establishment of a firearms consultative committee, which would be made up of representatives of those involved in the administration and enforcement of firearms legislation and of various shooting interests. The purpose of the committee will be to keep the legislation under review and to advise my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on firearms matters.

Clearly, it is right that the Government should meet the costs incurred by members of the committee in the performance of their duties. The posts are not salaried. I am talking of travelling, subsistence costs and so on. The Government therefore introduced an amendment in the other place to provide for the payment of expenses. As the existing money resolutions do not cover such provision, it is now necessary to pass this third money resolution to cover the cost, which we estimate will not exceed £10,000 a year.

It was not possible to lay a money resolution to meet such expenditure before, because until the Bill reached its Report stage the Government had not intended to provide for a statutory—as opposed to a non-statutory—consultative committee. The House will recall, however, that members of the Committee took a different view and that the Government were beaten on that issue.

3.45 pm

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): I suppose that this could be regarded as a case of "third time lucky" for the Minister. He makes the background to the money resolution sound as though it had involved a comfortable natural process of evolution—far from it. As he said, this is the third money resolution that the Government have tabled. It was only after the Second Reading debate that we discovered that the money resolution did not allow the Committee to debate a possible compensation scheme for the owners of weapons that the Bill will make illegal.

The Minister will recall our exchanges across the Floor of the House and in Committee. The Government tried to gag and stifle debate on this important matter. I remind the Minister that, despite the cosy way in which he described the process, he managed to get his sittings motion passed in Committee only by giving an undertaking to undo that attempt at cheating and to table a second money resolution to enable the Committee to discuss the principle of a possible compensation scheme.

We now come to the third money resolution. To be fair to the Minister, he reminded the House that it was at the insistence of members of the Committee, including my hon. Friends and myself, that we amended the terms of reference of the consultative committee to ensure that it was set up on a statutory basis. Nevertheless, the provision was not perfect, because it meant that the members of the Committee—some of us suspected that it was simply the old home affairs arms consultative committee dusted down and given a new title—could speak only when spoken to by the Home Secretary. That was a wholly wrong approach to such an important matter, and I am glad that it was put right in another place.

Why has this third money resolution come before us so late? If the Minister and the Government had allowed proper and adequate debate on Report and Third Reading we could have disposed of the matter at that stage, but Ministers came to the House with a gagging motion—a guillotine—which meant that that part of the Bill was not discussed. Indeed, the bulk of the Bill was never discussed on the Floor of the House. That was no accident. It was done in a remarkable way. It was not a Government response to the Opposition messing about and filibustering —far from it. I have no need to remind the Minister that he relied heavily in Committee on the general support of the Opposition for the Bill's aims, although, like some Conservative Members, we disagreed with its detail.

Why was this not allowed to be dealt with on Report or Third Reading? I am not complaining about reimbursing the proper expenses of members of the consultative committee; I am complaining because of the underhand and outrageous manner in which the Government have dealt with the Bill. It has been an affront to the House. That is not a party political point—I make it on behalf of all hon. Members. Now, the Government are in an even worse mess. It is right that the committee members should be paid, but I strongly resent having to return now and spend time on this resolution because of the trouble into which the Parliamentary Under-Secretary and his colleagues dug themselves earlier this year.

3.51 pm

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I agree with the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) that the Minister's benign statement covered a great deal of unhappiness with sweetness and light. The Bill is small, but its repercussions will be serious, and it is incredible that we are now discussing a third money resolution.

The first, as the hon. Member for Erdington said, dealt with manpower, which was grossly underestimated. The second covered compensation, without whose acceptance the Standing Committee would never have begun to sit. The third has to do with the consultative committee. These grudging extensions to the original money resolution were squeezed out of the Government until the pips began to squeak.

New clause 14, which originally instituted the consultative committee, was an important part of the wishes of both sides of the Committee. It was voted in because we won the argument and we won the vote. We planned to have a committee of five and not more than eight members. The Minister's committee is more expensive, which is why we want to know a little more about the money resolution.

We wanted experts in the use of firearms, in security, in weapon technology—the Home Office was lamentably short of experience in that—in sport, recreation and competition and in the police and enforcement. At the Olympic games, two of our great triumphs came in winning the gold and silver medals in rifle shooting, which showed that our discussions were held against a background of responsible competitors.

The purpose of the committee that we set up was to advise the Government on security, the proper use of firearms and any other matters that the Secretary of State decided upon. It was voted in with cross-party support, and we were given every sign and assurance that it would be kept in the Bill as it was. But things did not turn out that way.

At the eleventh hour, on the day before Report, the Government tabled amendments that made substantial changes to the committee, perhaps improving it in the Minister's opinion, but the majority of the Committee's Members did not agree with the changes. We could not discuss them in the debate on the guillotine motion on Report. I am glad that Lord Swansea and his team continued the attack in another place in an attempt to get the consultative committee right, and the Government had to agree to include representatives expert in sport and recreation in the committee's membership. The Government have increased that membership to at least 12. Under the terms of the money resolution, we are entitled to know who the extra members of the committee will represent.

The Minister spoke about £10,000. We need proper advice on weapons technology, especially for the future, and we cannot have that without some laboratory and range facilities. If the committee is to do its job properly, £10,000 is fairly minimal, because the committee might need to have a full-time technical officer. A sum of £10,000 far underestimates the value and importance of the work that the committee will do for the Home Office. I hope that the Minister will go into some detail about how he reckons £10,000 can possibly do the job, when the Home Office, as was demonstrated throughout the passage of the Bill, is so short of expertise.

The Bill says that personnel would amount to about 80, which is an insignificant manpower requirement. However, we hear from police authorities that Cambridge has already taken on 13 people and that Dorset has taken on six. On such figures, it will be seen that the personnel required for England and Wales would be 450, additional staff who would be required to monitor the Bill. That would cost £5 million or £6 million, and I should like to hear from the Minister about that.

The Minister seeks authority under the three money resolutions for significant expenditure. Throughout the passage of the Bill he has failed to say what the legislation will cost or how much the fee will be for firearms and shotgun certificates. He has left us in the dark—which is probably his intention.

3.57 pm

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I can recall the debate on the first of the money resolutions. That debate developed when the money resolution was about to go through, largely on the nod. I thought that we should have an explanation, and it became clear that the first money resolution after Second Reading did not meet the scope of the assurances that the Minister had given. I thought that I was doing the job of scrutinising the work of Ministers, even though I know that some of us who speak a great deal in the Chamber sometimes incur some criticism. We should not be criticised and penalised by, for example, a totting up of the speeches that we make, because they are by way of scrutiny.

This debate is an example of the way in which the scrutiny of Ministers has worked. In order to comply with the pressure from the House, the Minister had to bring forward a second money resolution, which, as he said on Second Reading, was to pay compensation for old firearms. It was rather surprising to find that the money resolution was so narrowly drawn that it did not make provision for any other consequences of the legislation, especially as this is controversial legislation. That controversy is fuelled by hon. Members in all parts of the House, and especially by Conservative Members. It might have been prudent for the Government to realise that there might be changes. The establishment of a statutory review committee is a useful development. Therefore, it should be financed, and we are discussing a money resolution for that statutory committee.

I endorse the comments of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro). The Government are cheering the Tory-controlled Bradford council for sacking people who provided services for the old, the young, very young children, education and sports services and a huge range of other local authority services. Bradford council is proposing to sack 9,000 people, yet the Government are apparently providing a system that will, not entirely by way of Government finance, but through other finance provided by various authorities, involve the employment of 450 people. That is, I would have thought, extending bureaucracy somewhat unnecessarily, but then some critics of the Bill thought that that was explicit in the original legislation anyhow.

The extent and scope of the money resolution should be more closely defined by the Minister. After all, they are supposed to be the Government who are critical of expenditure and who want to see bureaucracy cut. That is why they praise the lunatic endeavours of the tiny extreme Right-wing Tory clique that is manoeuvring cuts by Bradford city council.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Is not the difference between Bradford city council and the point that the hon. Gentleman is trying to make that, under its previous administration, Bradford city council was grossly overstaffed, whereas police forces are grossly understaffed? Therefore, his comparison is invalid.

Mr. Cryer: I do not want to go too far down that road, because I always try to follow Standing Orders, and sometimes get penalised for so doing. The hon. Gentleman's point is not based on experience or accuracy. Bradford city council tried to use an absolute minimum number of staff to provide the best possible service, bearing in mind that the rate support grant had been savagely cut by the Conservative Government, who are now preparing——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us bear in mind the Standing Orders.

Mr. Cryer: I was just coming to the motion before you interrupted me, Mr. Speaker, as you interrupted my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) during Question Time, and extended the speech, you may recall,——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman, who is an old hand here, knows that we must stick to the motion before the House.

Mr. Cryer: That is so, Mr. Speaker. I was about to say that, with this money resolution, the Government are proposing further expenditure when it is open to question whether that expenditure is justified. Therefore, I look forward to hearing the Minister's explanation of the precise extent and nature of the money resolution, and whether he is satisfied that it covers all the changes made to the Bill by the two Houses of Parliament.

4.2 pm

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): I should like my hon. Friend the Minister to clarify one or two points. By way of prefacing that, I would say that it is ironic that this Government, of all Governments, who are doing their best to improve efficiency, get better value for money and, above all else, to use police resources more effectively, are embarking on legislation that will greatly increase the pressure on those scarce police resources. It is ironic because there was not adequate consultation on the Bill, which was rushed through far too quickly.

The Bill will break the trust and confidence between the shooting community and the police, which is one of the sine qua nons of workable firearms legislation. I fear that that will be breached and then destroyed. I have had worrying reports from my local police force, the Norfolk constabulary. It is worried about the extra pressure that the Bill will place on its scarce resources to cope with bureaucracy and provide the extra manpower.

My hon. Friend the Minister has to tell us exactly what he thinks the financial consequences will be, because the Bill is couched in extremely general terms. It says:

"some increases . . . will initially be required".

Can my hon. Friend tell us why the increases will be required only "initially"? We are bringing in a panoply of new controls and structures, which will need a continuing commitment of police resources. To use the word "initially" is unrealistic.

Will my hon. Friend let us have more details about the amount of money that we are talking about in compensation? I welcome the moves made by the Government on compensation. When the Bill was first published, many of us were appalled and outraged that the Government were taking away people's weapons without giving compensation. It probably ill-behoves people like myself, who pressed so hard for compensation, to say now that it is not adequate. It could be improved on, but, in the circumstances, we got the best that we could have expected. However, I should like my hon. Friend to tell us exactly what sums of money we are talking about. He should know by now the number of weapons involved and the sums of money available to be paid out. I should like some more details on that.

I should also like my hon. Friend to give us some idea of what the consultative committee will cost. My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) pointed out that when we first put this animal into the Bill in Committee it was an excellent body, and the Government then attempted, in an underhand and squalid way, to dismember it. I am pleased that some of its teeth have been returned to it by the other place, although one thing concerns me, and it may be appropriate for my hon. Friend to cover this. I am concerned that it has been established to last for only five years. It would be helpful if my hon. Friend could tell us what he feels the Committee has to do, or what criteria of competence and effectiveness it has to work to, to secure its position beyond five years. Will my hon. Friend tell us something about that, and about what the cost of the committee will be?

4.6 pm

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): My hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Mr. Cunliffe) and I recently met Lord Ferrers to discuss the resources for the Greater Manchester police force, and in our discussions the issue of the administrative resources and the disagreement about the level of funding of those resources was paramount. Therefore, I look to the Minister for some clarification of what he said about resources, start-up money, and the way in which the Greater Manchester police force will be involved in the consequences of this legislation. To what extent are the Minister and Lord Ferrers to provide additional resources, in real terms, to Greater Manchester police force to cover this provision?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have some difficulty in relating that to the firearms legislation.

Mr. McCartney: I respect your ruling, Mr. Speaker. Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), I am somewhat new to these procedural matters. I am trying to relate what I am saying to what the hon. Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) said about the police force in his constituency. I ask the Minister to clarify what the effects of the legislation will be on the administrative responsibilities of the Greater Manchester police force and the resources available to it.

4.8 pm

Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe (Leigh): I was a member of the Committee that considered this legislation, and I know that at no time in the Committee's proceedings was it the Government's intention to pay compensation. They came along with an ill-prepared Bill that had not been properly thought out and conceived without any rational judgment about the various interests involved.

I am opposed to anybody, with the exception of the armed forces and the police, having guns. My hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) raised the point about Greater Manchester police force resources. I share the view of the chief constable of Manchester. He is much criticised and much attacked for his views, but he is a first-class policeman. Politically he is a disaster, and in public relations and the other sectors into which he strays from time to time he is wrong in his opinions.

At the end of the day, regardless of personal beliefs, there was a degree of tolerance and democracy in the Committee for other interests. It was rather ironic that a minority Labour representation on the Committee consistently bailed out a Conservative Minister and provided him with a majority. The Bill would never have got off the ground if it had been left to Conservative Back-Benchers, who for obvious reasons were promoting a campaign to safeguard various shooting societies throughout the country.

I accept that that is fair play and that they did it extremely well, but I take umbrage at certain applications for gun clubs that are sprouting up throughout the country. There was a recent application for a shooting club in my constituency, in Greater Manchester, to be set up in a wildlife area in a green belt. That would be an environmental intrusion. All the money in the world could not compensate for such an environmental intrusion into that area.

The Government were hell-bent on pushing through the legislation although it was ill-prepared and badly thought out. We could have taken a more rational and sensible approach, which would have saved the embarrassment of my party having to bail out Government Ministers in order to make progress on the Bill.

4.11 pm

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I shall be very brief. I have been here throughout the debate, and I must say that there are some honourable fools in the Chamber. From time to time we have to listen to them.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us agree that they are hon. Members.

Mr. Haynes: They are hon. Members, but they are fools.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that that might be considered unparliamentary.

Mr. Haynes: In that case, I withdraw it, but I hope that they will be reasonable while we are here.

First, in regard to the money resolution, the Minister cocked it up right from the beginning. I was here when my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) and the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) had a go at the Minister at the Dispatch Box.

I share some of the concern among hon. Members that the Government are finding money for this purpose. Normally when we ask for money for services in our constituencies we are refused, as we were for rate support grant, yet the Government are able to find money today.

I think that this is the thin end of the wedge. I hope that the Minister will put us straight and tell us where he thinks the legislation is going. What will happen in future? Will there be more and more bodies providing this kind of service? If so, even more money will have to be found. Will larger and larger accommodation have to be provided for those people? I can visualise what is happening in the Minister's mind over the provision of money for this type of work.

I share the concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South, who spoke about the way in which the Government treat local authorities, particularly those in his area—I am glad that he is listening now—when he mentioned that Bradford city council is now Tory controlled. I shall not say any more about that, but I know what happens when Conservatives take control of local authorities. We experience it here in the mother of Parliaments. There is a by-election tomorrow in the city of Nottingham. The Tories are in control at the moment, but if we win that seat we will be in control. I am sure that people will be listening to what is being said today about money being provided for this kind of thing, but not for necessary and important services that people need.

I hope that the Minister and the Government do not have it in mind, when they get this measure off the ground, to find more and more money at the expense of services that people need. After all, we represent those people and we are speaking on their behalf.

4.15 pm

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have had a surprisingly wide-ranging debate, given how narrowly the money resolution is drawn. The money resolution is drawn exclusively to meet the payment of out-of-pocket expenses of members of the consultative committee. It goes no further than that. Therefore, the broader issues that have been raised do not arise directly out of the money resolution; and I propose to keep my remarks fairly narrowly focused.

The money resolution is designed to give financial effect to the power of the Secretary of State to meet the out-of-pocket expenses of the consultative committee, if that is the will of the House. I shall be commending to the House a Lords amendment to that effect. Quite plainly we cannot put a precise figure on that, but it is bound to be extremely modest, because we are talking about the out-of-pocket expenses of a relatively small number of people.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) criticised the Government, and particularly me, for increasing the number of members of the consultative committee. I wonder whether he is wholly fair in that respect. The definition of those eligible to serve on the consultative committee includes quite a number of people —those with expertise in possession, use, keeping, transactions, technology, enforcement and administration. My hon. Friend wished to add to that sport and recreation, and I agree with him. If one representative for each of those interests served on the committee, it would consist of nine people. If we wanted to have one or two more, say two from one interest group, we would get to 12 very quickly. Simply to meet my hon. Friend's natural desires, it was necessary to extend the number.

My answer to the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) is that I get cross sometimes, but I never criticise hon. Members who talk about money resolutions. When I was sitting below the Gangway I used to do so frequently. I thought that it was good sport, and occasionally it was useful.

I admit that the hon. Member for Bradford, South made a good point when he spoke about the first money resolution. He was right in saying that the money resolution then before the House was not drawn sufficiently widely to cover a buy-in scheme. The reason for that was quite plain and was nothing covert. We did not intend to have a buy-in scheme. There was no pretence about that, there was no intent to cheat, deceive or fetter the ability of the committee. We did not intend to have a buy-in scheme, and that is why the money resolution as originally formulated did not provide for one.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South was a little unfair when he criticised me, and certainly the Government, for not ensuring that the second money resolution covered the requirement now before the House. As he will recall, when we were debating the second money resolution we did not have in mind a statutory consultative committee, and therefore we assumed that the issue would not arise.

As the hon. Member for Bradford, South is joining the Conservative party in his anxiety to safeguard and husband public money, I am sure that he will not ask for money resolutions that are at large, which is what he would have to argue for if he were to sustain his proposition that the money resolution now before the House should in some way have been encompassed within the second money resolution. On reflection, I think the hon. Gentleman will feel that he scored one good point, but also made one rather less good point. I commend the money resolution to the House.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Firearms (Amendment) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of sums required by the Secretary of State for making payments in respect of expenses incurred in the performance of their duties by members of the consultative committee established by that Act.

Firearms (Amendment) Bill (Allocation of Time)

4.32 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I beg to move,

That the Order of the House [25th May] be supplemented as follows:—

Lords Amendments

1.—(1) The proceedings on Consideration of Lords Amendments shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion three hours after the commencement of the proceedings on the Motion for this Order.

(2) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business) shall apply to those proceedings.

(3) No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, the proceedings shall be made except by a member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

(4) If the proceedings are interrupted by a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration), a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on the Motion shall be added to the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion.

(5) If the House is adjourned, or the sitting is suspended, before the expiry of the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion, no notice shall be required of a Motion made at the next sitting by a member of the Government for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order.

2.—(1) For the purpose of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 1 above—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided and, if that Question is for the amendment of a Lords Amendment, shall then put forthwith the Question on any further Amendment to the said Lords Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown and on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in the said Lords Amendment, or, as the case may be, in the said Lords Amendment as amended;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining Lords Amendments as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege and shall—

(i) put forthwith the Question on any Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown to a Lords Amendment and then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in their Amendment, or, as the case may be, in their Amendment as amended;

(ii) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in a Lords Amendment;

(iii) put forthwith with respect to the Amendments designated by Mr. Speaker which have not been disposed of the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendments; and

(iv) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Amendments;

(c) as soon as the House has agreed or disagreed with the Lords in any of their Amendments Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith a separate Question on any other Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown relevant to that Lords Amendment.

(2) Proceedings under sub-paragraph (1) above shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

Stages subsequent to first Consideration of Lords Amendments

3. The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion one hour after the commencement of those proceedings.

4. For the purpose of bringing those proceedings to a conclusion—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and has not yet been decided, and shall then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown which is related to the Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining items in the Lords Message as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege and shall—

(i) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown on any item;

(ii) in the case of the remaining items designated by Mr. Speaker, put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in their said Proposals; and

(iii) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Proposals.

Supplemental

5.—(1) In this paragraph "the proceedings" means proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill, on the appointment and quorum of a Committee to draw up Reasons and the Report of such a Committee.

(2) Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown for the consideration forthwith of the Message or, as the case may be, for the appointment and quorum of the Committee.

(3) A Committee appointed to draw up Reasons shall report before the conclusion of the sitting at which it is appointed.

(4) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings.

(5) No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, the proceedings shall be made except by a member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

(6) If the proceedings are interrupted by a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on the Motion shall be added to the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion.

The effect of the timetable motion is to bring to an end the House's consideration of Lords amendments three hours after the start of the present debate. It is right to mention that this debate cannot last more than one hour. The timetable motion thus provides for the termination of debate and for voting on various questions.

Without seeking to curtail the debate, it might be helpful to remind hon. Members that the sooner we finish the debate on the timetable motion, the sooner we shall get on to the substantial consideration of Lords amendments.

I know quite well that the House views timetable motions with some hostility. Indeed, I have sometimes expressed such hostility. On occasion, timetable motions are justified, and I hope that the House will agree that this is such an occasion.

The Government's policy for reforming firearms legislation and for the Bill has been the subject of extensive debate and scrutiny. The House will recall that, in December 1987, we discussed the White Paper on the firearms proposals. The House gave a Second Reading to the Bill and it went into an extended and interesting Committee. The Bill spent a total of 28 hours in Committee. That was a substantial period, when one remembers that the Bill then contained only 19 clauses. I make no complaint about it being debated so fully, because, as a result of remarks made by hon. Members, substantial and useful changes were made.

The Report stage of the Bill was a wonderfully interesting occasion. It lasted 16 hours, which is a trifle unusual for a Bill of this length, and there were 67 Divisions. My recollection is that most of them were fairly unusual. For about five hours, hon. Members rose every two and a half minutes to express their views.

The Bill has had many curious aspects, and we have seen one recently. The House will recall that the Opposition urged us to set up a statutory consultative committee: we were reminded of that this afternoon by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett). He said that it was good that we had set up a statutory consultative committee, so we moved the money resolution to pay the out-of-pocket expenses of the committee, which was set up to meet the wishes of the House. What happened? The Labour party caused a Division and voted against the proposition that we should pay the expenses of the members of the committee, which the Labour party urged us to set up. The hon. Member for Erdington, who is an Opposition spokesman, and the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) entered the Opposition Lobby to vote against the payment of out-of-pocket expenses to those whose establishment they urged on us. As I said, this has been a remarkable Bill.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): Does my hon. Friend agree that, when the debate about the consultative committee began in Committee, there was broad agreement between those who tabled the amendment and the Opposition? The animal that we created was different from that on which we voted today in connection with the expenses of its members.

Mr. Hogg: No, I do not. The consultative committee that is encapsulated in the Bill is a more powerful and effective institution than that for which my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) and some of his supporters voted in Committee.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): The Minister resisted it.

Mr. Hogg: I resisted it because at that stage I thought it was an unsustainable proposition. In deference to the House, we accepted it and improved it by giving it more force and efficacy. Those who suggest to the contrary do not understand the legislation.

From time to time, the House is entitled to protect itself against an undue prolongation of procedure. I am not one to criticise hon. Members who use parliamentary rules. I have done so myself on many occasions, and should I be deprived of my comfortable seat on the Front Bench I shall do so again. I recognise that there is a converse to that proposition, which is that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or the House collectively, are entitled to take proper action to prevent an undue prolongation of procedure. What happened on the money resolution was a good example of the practices that the House, on the whole, deems undesirable.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): I am grateful to the Minister for allowing me to pose a question. Is he seriously suggesting that parliamentary procedures have been abused during the passage of this legislation? If he is, I demand that he puts evidence for that before the House. Conservative Members know clearly that that is not so and never has been.

Mr. Hogg: The House will have heard my reference to 67 Divisions and my view that that was somewhat unusual. I did not say that it was an abuse; I said that I never criticised hon. Members for using parliamentary procedure, if only because I had done it myself. However, on occasions it is right and proper to give the House an opportunity to protect itself against the undue prolongation of proceedings so that it can focus on the issues that really matter. The Opposition's behaviour on the money resolution shows the good sense of the timetable motion.

4.40 pm

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): When the Minister and others read Hansard tomorrow, they will see one of the most remarkable attempts to justify an outrage that has ever been made from the Dispatch Box. I do not object to the odd history lesson, but I and, I think, many others object to the entirely one-sided and selective nature of the Minister's recollection of earlier events on the Bill. It should be understood—if the Minister needs reminding, I am happy to remind him—that those 67 Divisions following Report and Third Reading arose solely because of the outrageous way in which the Minister and his colleagues slapped a guillotine on those proceedings, despite the most amicable series of Committee sittings——

Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe (Leigh): The Government would not have had a sittings motion without us.

Mr. Corbett: As my hon. Friend says, and not to put too fine a point on it, if it had not been for the good will and co-operation of the Opposition, the Minister would not have had his sittings motion, let alone his Bill. It is a fine way to say thank you.

It is traditional, and perhaps part of the ritual of this place, for Oppositions to protest against a guillotine motion. I wish to make it immediately clear that I do not do so on that basis today. I oppose the motion because it is needless and vindictive. It is the second time this Session that this arrogant Government have imposed a guillotine on debate of the Bill—not because of obstruction by the Opposition, but because a number of the Government's supporters tried to insist, with our support, on proper debate and to persuade the Government to see better sense on some of the provisions of this unhappy Bill.

As has been made clear throughout the proceedings, well before Hungerford and well before the Bill was presented, the Opposition demanded a tightening of the gun laws to protect public safety. Initially, the Home Secretary said that there was no need for that. He said so to a number of my hon. Friends who represent London constituencies and who were rightly alarmed about the shocking rise in violent crime on the streets of our capital —something that is being echoed in Birmingham and other parts of the country.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): The hon. Gentleman is aware that the Bill was prepared in 1973 and then shelved. It sat on a shelf during the entire time that the Labour party governed the country. Why did it not bring it in then?

Mr. Corbett: I do not accept that. My point, which is incontrovertible—as the Minister and his colleagues can confirm—is that when a deputation of my hon. Friends from London constituencies went to see the Home Secretary in June 1986 to argue the case for some tightening of the gun control laws on the ground of public safety, they were sent away with a flea in their ear.

We gave a general welcome to the Bill and both promised and delivered co-operation—while, of course, exercising our right to seek changes in what was proposed. The Minister will remember that, at the Committee's first sitting, he could not obtain a sittings motion without our assistance because of a shabby attempt to deny the Committee the right to discuss the issue and the detail of compensation for weapons made illegal under the Bill. The fact is—and remains so as we reach the final stages of the Bill—that the details and scope of compensation have never been discussed on the Floor of the House, despite the fact that on Second Reading all but one of the Government's Back Benchers, including a distinguished former Prime Minister, insisted—in the face of Government opposition—that there should be some compensation.

No proper details were made available during the Committee stage. We were promised—and, to be fair to the Minister, received—details of what was proposed before Report and Third Reading. That is where the cheat and the affront came in. Between the end of the Bill's Committee stage and its Report stage, the Minister hid from members of the Committee, and indeed the whole House, the fact that a guillotine would be placed upon Report and Third Reading in a way that made it impossible for compensation to be debated in the time allowed.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The hon. Gentleman will recall that the guillotine was tabled only after the Bill had already been discussed for six hours on Report, without a guillotine, during which time remarkably little progress had been made.

Mr. Corbett: Had the Minister and his hon. Friends not been so bone-headed, but had taken more time to consult the quite legitimate range of interests involved in the legislation, some of that time could have been saved. Even if what the Minister says is true——

Mr. Hogg: Which it is.

Mr. Corbett: I accept that. However, that is no good reason for the Government to use their mailed fist to prevent proper discussion on the Floor of the House of important acres of the Bill. It is a shabby and a shoddy way to shovel legislation on to the statute book. That was to treat the House with contempt because, apart from its effect on us, it denied the voice to those who shoot for leisure or for competitive purposes. That is what is happening again today.

The background is important because, as I have said, it would have been more understandable that the Government should seek the motion had there been adequate debate at earlier stages of the Bill. That was not the case. I shall offer the Minister and the House an illustration of what this needless gag has done. Dealers and their proper actions and the control of them are a vital part of achieving better public safety, but that has never been discussed on the Floor of the House. Certain actions have been taken on, for example, photographs on certificates, but the Bill contains no provision for section 5 dealers' certificates to carry a photograph of the holder. I am told that those certificates can be, and indeed are being, simply photostated and sent with an order as part of trading arrangements between dealers.

Even worse, there is no provision to check the character or the bona fides of those whom the dealers employ. I ask the House to think of the risk of illicit trade in weapons not just for criminal use, but possibly for terrorist use. There is a gaping hole in the Bill, yet the Minister is trying to persuade us that we have had adequate time to debate that issue.

The Opposition and other hon. Members have been prevented from discussing that important matter, and the same is to happen again today. The Minister has not yet told us why there is such a rush about the Bill and why the Government refused properly to consult and respond. The Minister will know that, for more than 12 months, the International Sports Shooters Liaison Committee has been begging for a meeting with him.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I find it difficult to make the hon. Gentleman's remarks compatible—he is asking why we were in such a rush—with those of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who, apart from anything else, invited us to take the Bill on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Corbett: The choice of how the Bill was dealt with belonged to the Government and not to the Opposition. It is as simple as that. Perhaps the Under-Secretary of State will wish to come back to me on that point. It is a fact, is it not, that large parts of the Bill have never been discussed on the Floor of the House? Yes or no?

Mr. Hogg: Will the hon. Gentleman kindly answer the question that I put to him? How does he reconcile his present observations, which are blaming us for discussion, with those of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, who urged us to get on with the Bill without any delay at all?

Mr. Corbett: The Minister is being unusually confusing about the matter. A suggestion that the Bill might be taken on the Floor of the House does not mean that discussion would be curtailed or rushed. It depended upon adequate time being provided. The Government chose not to take up that suggestion. The House and others will note that the Under-Secretary of State is unable to dispute my point that large parts of the Bill have never been discussed on the Floor of the House. That remains the position.

I was saying that, for more than a year, the International Sports Shooters Liaison Committee, by letter and even by fax during the dispute involving letters and parcels, asked for a meeting with the Under-Secretary of State or the Home Secretary. That committee is not a gang of head bangers who want to shoot around the clock willy-nilly, but a group of responsible people who are experienced in the use of weapons. They want more effective controls on the possession and use of weapons. As recently as 14 October the Under-Secretary of State's private secretary had to tell Mr. Desmond Hughes

"I am afraid that"—

"that" is misspelt, but never mind—

"Mr. Hogg's schedule of engagements would not permit a meeting with you in the short time available before the Bill completes its Parliamentary passage."

The letter goes on to state that there could be a meeting at official level. I understand that view, in a letter dated 14 October, but it was not the first request that was made by that body: it was the umpteenth request. That illustrates the unwillingness of the Under-Secretary of State and his colleagues to consult those who have legitimate interests in the matter and a right to be heard.

In case he has inadvertently given a wrong impression, I inform the Under-Secretary of State that, as far as I am aware, not a single voice in the House wants to weaken the control of weapons. Nobody is calling for the indiscriminate right of any individual in this country to possess and use firearms. In fact, opinion goes the other way. The House as a whole wants more effective control of the possession, use and storage of firearms. The argument has been about ways in which that control might be achieved.

As it stands, the Bill has a small chance of achieving what we all want to achieve in terms of public safety. It will not, and, as has been acknowledged, cannot, prevent another Hungerford. At best, it has laid more work on a hard-pressed police force and might mean an additional 300 to 400 officers to ensure that it is carried out. If I might be allowed to say in parenthesis, this is at a time when the Under-Secretary of State and the Home Secretary—and the Prime Minister, no less—have told me that there is not 181,000 quid in the kitty to convert a building in my constituency into a police office. Yet, suddenly, extra officers can be found out of nowhere to police the extra powers that the Bill lays upon them.

The Bill is silent on better measures to detect and control the illegally held weapons that are used in crime. It is one of the ironies of this legislation that, compared with 1986, the number of firearms offences known to the police —that is, when weapons are fired, used as a threat, or used to cause injury—actually fell last year by 4 per cent. That total was 8 per cent. less than that in 1985. What problems are the Government trying to deal with?

We know that, last year, under this so-called law and order Government, there was a 12 per cent. rise in violent crime on the streets of our towns and cities. Last night the Birmingham Evening Mail was able to report that in the inner-city suburb of Handsworth

> "Robberies and assaults with intent to rob . . . had rocketed by 51 per cent. this year.
> And thefts from the person—mostly purse and jewellery snatches from women and girls—had soared by an alarming 31 per cent."

That is the problem for the West Midlands police force, which the Home Secretary has said cannot have the 1,000 extra officers that it says it needs over the next three years to deliver the kind of service that it wants to deliver to the public of Birmingham and the rest of the west midlands. Yet apparently we can find 300 or 400 spare officers knocking around to deal with the consequences of this Bill.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): It is not a case of the Government trying to find extra officers. Surely it is a case of diverting existing officers from the duties in which they are presently engaged.

Mr. Corbett: The hon. Gentleman's point is well made. He put it far more accurately than I could. That is what will happen. From what the Home Office said on the back of the Autumn Statement earlier this week, we know that there will be a small increase in total police numbers. The hon. Gentleman is exactly right. If he is not exactly right, I should be more than pleased to stand at the Dispatch Box and withdraw my allegation.

Because of the contempt with which once again the Government are treating the House, my right hon. and hon. Friends will vote against this heavy-handed guillotine. I hope that some Conservative Members will join us to reinforce last night's message. On behalf of our constituents, we are here, irrespective of party, primarily to hold the Government to account. The guillotine denies us that right, and that is why it is an offence and offensive.

4.57 pm

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I rather hope that I address the House for the last time on this infamous Bill. My hon. Friend the Minister highlighted the number of Divisions on Report. It had nothing to do with many of us who were interested in discussing the Bill, and we felt that it was quite the wrong action to take. If there was any blame at all, it lay with those who drew up the timetable motion. They should have ensured that so many Divisions did not take place, as so frequently happens with other guillotine timetable motions. My hon. Friend considered also that we took undue time in Committee. He really should do an apprenticeship on the Scottish Standing Committee. He would then know what serving time was like.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My hon. Friend will remember that I said that I had no criticism of the time that we took. It was used beneficially for everybody. I merely outlined the length of time; I made no criticism of it.

Sir Hector Monro: I am glad. We had an excellent Committee stage which, compared with many Committees on which I have sat, was of a reasonable length, bearing in mind the controversial nature of the legislation.

I have no personal interest to declare. What weapons I own will not be affected one way or another by the Bill. I have been involved because of my interest in shooting sports and because I feel that the Bill is manifestly unfair to many people. I have served on a police committee for 15 years and, indeed, was chairman of it, so I am wholly on the side of the police and support law and order 100 per cent. But I am afraid that of the many measures in the Bill only a few will reduce crime involving the use of rifles. We could have a far greater impact on armed crime by bringing back the death penalty, but Home Office Ministers seem to object to that most strongly.

Obviously, the Government had to act after Hungerford, if only to ensure that police procedures were implemented. All hon. Members who served on the Committee were behind my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson), who produced so many constructive ideas. We appreciated how he felt about the importance of strict control of firearms, but we would all agree that we should not go too far and that we must be fair.

The Government's major failure was their failure to consult responsible shooting bodies, despite requests to do so, before the Home Secretary made his announcement in Torquay at the end of September 1987. If he had consulted, much of the antagonism to the Bill would have been removed and the Bill would be much more effective. I pay warm tribute to the chairman of the British Shooting

[Sir Hector Monro]

Sports Council, Lord Swansea, who did a tremendous job throughout the Bill's passage, particularly while leading his team in another place.

Many aspects have not been thoroughly discussed on the Floor of this Chamber, particularly those relating to the consultative committee and compensation. Yet today we are again on a timetable motion and the procedures of the House prevent us from discussing such subjects because they are not included in the Lords amendments. For that reason, the timetable motion is somewhat hypothetical because it provides time only for what we are allowed to discuss, which is of minimal importance.

We welcome the amendments because they are favourable to shooting interests. Throughout the Bill's passage, shooting interests have achieved notable victories, mostly against a stubborn Government who are determined to avoid any amendment, even when they have made major mistakes, such as they did on the sporting rifle. We argued at length on that in Committee and lost, but second thoughts in another place have produced a worthwhile Lords amendment.

It is particularly sad that there has been such an attack on genuine shooting sports interests. It is sad that a Conservative Government, who should be so knowledgeable about competitive shooting and country sports, have been involved in that. I am sad that, while we carried amendments in Committee on an all-party basis, many were reversed in this Chamber on Report. I am sad, too, that so much of the implementation of the Bill is left to police rules or Home Office guidance. We hear on all sides that chief officers of police are already interpreting the Bill as if it were law.

Some attitudes of the Minister have been difficult to follow. I have already mentioned the sporting rifle. One of the most depressing episodes involved the Government's attitude to the disabled. We welcome back those from the paraplegic games in the far east, but at the same time from now on we shall stop the disabled using three or four-shot self-loading rifles and enjoying the sport in which they may have participated for years, on a wrong premise. The Minister says that the fire power of a three or four-shot self-loading rifle——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I have allowed the hon. Gentleman a great deal of latitude. He should now relate his remarks more closely to the motion.

Sir Hector Monro: I am trying to show that we have not had time to discuss these matters on the Floor as I should have liked, and that our last chance to do so seems to be disappearing rapidly. I am worried that we cannot debate in depth either how the Bill affects the disablod or the consultative committee. We may discuss neither in detail today.

Most important, we have not had a chance to discuss compensation. The Minister did not introduce the scheme while we were in Committee. He gave an assurance that we could discuss it on the Floor, but the Report stage was timetabled, and we had no time to discuss it. This House, which is elected to represent people throughout the United Kingdom, could not discuss the compensation scheme with the Minister. To introduce a scheme offering £150 or 50 per cent. of the alleged value of a weapon is unfair for the higher value weapons. Many a rifle costs more than £1,000 and the owner, who will have owned that weapon legitimately, will lose substantially. But we could not and cannot discuss the scheme because of the timetable motion, which is why the Minister is being unfair with us today.

An M14 carbine, which many people have bought for the enjoyment of their sport, costs about £500, and with a new barrel its value will be £1,000. The owner will be lucky to see £500 for it and there is no appeal. Compensation is a serious issue, which we have not been able to discuss. Today, I received a parliamentary answer and I thank the Minister for it, but evidence from one auction house and the trade papers is not a sufficient basis for compensation terms.

I have a heavy heart. I am an elected official of the National Rifle Association, the National Small-Bore Rifle Association, the Clay Pigeon Shooting Association, the British Association for Shooting and Conservation, and the British Field Sports Society. It is sad that those responsible bodies, which have done their best to lobby Ministers in every possible way, have not had a fair response. I am gravely concerned about the cost of the legislation, police manpower and firearm and shotgun certificates, but the Minister has not answered our questions on those matters. He owes us much more information today.

The Bill should not have been controversial. It should have been one on which the Committee could unite to support stricter and fairer controls in the interests of those with legitimate weapons. Whatever happens, I know that the Government will have their way. More important, the few Lords amendments which we may discuss are of small importance compared with the subjects which we may not discuss, but such is life in this House.

5.8 pm

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): I support my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro). The time has come when debate on the Bill should end and it should be implemented, but I am left with the impression—I am heartened by what my hon. Friend has said—that the vast majority of those involved in shooting regard it as an inconvenience, an irritation and, alas, a measure which in the end will have little result. Law-abiding shooting organisations are sad and bewildered. Only this afternoon I took two such bodies to the Ministry of Defence in an attempt to save a rifle range in the Warwick area. They are all thoroughly good individual citizens who have conducted themselves very well over the years in their sport. The Bill has been a bad experience because of the troubles with the votes and the Lords amendments to which my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries has referred.

I feel that, with the best of intentions, the Government overreacted following the terrible events of Hungerford. There should have been some reaction, but in this respect it was overkill, and it will not bring about the ideas that were predicted at the time. Of course I hope that it will, because no one wants to see anything like Hungerford happen again.

In those circumstances, it is more in sorrow than in anger that I make known my views, which I know are shared by many hon. Members who are not necessarily in the Chamber this afternoon.

5.10 pm

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): I agree with everything that my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) has said. I am deeply sorry to hear that the Ministry of Defence is contemplating closing a range in his constituency where I have spent many happy hours. I would like to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), who has effectively led the opposition to the Bill from this side of the House with the greatest of patience, competence and hard work. I am sure that that is something with which all my hon. Friends will agree.

Normally, I would be in favour of all guillotines. The time that we have wasted in the House in debating Bills without a timetable has been a farce. I will not trouble the House with the reasons this afternoon, but there is a very good case for timetabling all Bills. However, until such a practice comes in, and bearing in mind that the Select Committee on Procedure did take its first light step down that road in the last Session but one, the Government must be cautious before proposing a timetable motion. I believe that they panicked on the last occasion. We had overcome the burden of the Bill in the middle of the night, and we would have made good progress with it. I know that this has been mentioned before, but I think that it is worth repeating.

On the following day the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) and I and my hon. Friends who were opposed to the Bill agreed that we would have only one vote and then we would allow the Government to have the Bill, providing they allowed us to have the consultative committee that we requested. As the Government refused even that amazingly modest concession, Opposition Members were enraged, and I believe rightly so. I took no part in those further proceedings, but I believe that what happened should be on the record.

It is clear that the Government have no intention of allowing the Bill to go back to the other place, for reasons that I understand, but they are all modest improvements to the Bill—all of which I welcome—and I see no purpose in debating the amendments further. I cannot understand the neurosis that has struck the Government's business managers in proposing this timetable motion.

5.12 pm

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): I agree entirely with what my hon. Friends the Members for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) and for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) have said. There is no doubt that there is some good in the Bill, but there is also a great deal of bad. We have, at times with the co-operation and help of the Minister, improved the Bill, and I would pay some tribute to the Under-Secretary for his good humour and patience in Standing Committee, because there were undoubtedly occasions when he did—[Laughter]—sit down and talk to us about certain matters. There were times, too, when he changed his mind after due consideration of the argument.

Having paid that tribute, I must say that the shambles that took place in the House when the guillotine was imposed caused a tremendous amount of ill feeling. The Minister's implication that there was time-wasting and filibustering is complete rubbish. Yes, we did discuss for about six hours on Report various matters in the earlier clauses of the Bill, but at no time did anyone in this place try to filibuster. There was an extremely long list of amendments, as well as many Government amendments, and not to allow us to continue discussing them has added a great deal of insult to the injuries already caused.

My hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington mentioned compensation and the statutory expert committee, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro). Those are crucial matters that were not discussed on the Floor of the House. Many of us made fairly general and wide-ranging speeches on Second Reading and we discussed three or four clauses on Report, but many other crucial matters were not discussed at all.

What about the process of sleeving shotguns? What about some of the exemptions from controls for self-loading rifles and shotguns deactivated to a standard approved by the proof houses? What about the creation of the conterminous shotgun and firearm certificate? There has been some movement by the Government on some of those matters in the other place and we have had some results, but a number of crucial matters for our constituents—such as the visitors' permits and the dealers' certificates—were not discussed in the House because of the shoddy, shameful tactic of applying the guillotine.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare that there are times when it is necessary to apply the guillotine—for example, on Report if we are dealing with a Bill that has only a small number of amendments, when perhaps the debate is prolonged unnecessarily—but on this occasion we had a huge amount of material to get through. To use bully-boy tactics in those circumstances was wrong. I must say to the Under-Secretary and to my right hon. Friend that many people in East Anglia supported some improvement and tightening up of firearms controls, but what they find hard to accept is that debate in this place was curtailed. Many people are having their weapons taken away, and many other people fear that the new panoply of controls and structures will prevent them from enjoying their sport. I hope that that will not happen.

For example, some of my constituents enjoy rough shooting and wild fowling, but may not be used to dealing with the police when it comes to filling in forms and so forth. They may not be very knowledgeable when it comes to asking solicitors or friends how to apply for a certificate. Those people fear that the new structures will militate against them. Those of us who have been talking in this debate and have an interest in shooting have no problems in carrying on our sport, but there is a concern in rural areas that people who enjoy rough shooting and clay pigeon shooting will find it difficult in some circumstances to comprehend that good reason. I hope that they will not have any difficulties, but it is a pity that we could not have discussed this at greater length.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): All that my hon. Friend says about the difficulties that will be experienced by people in rural areas is even more true in the urban areas, especially the suburbs of London—one of which I represent—where a number of people especially enjoy clay pigeon shooting. There is no doubt that they have a real fear that they will find it difficult to get a licence from the Metropolitan police if the latter can find an excuse.

Mr. Bellingham: My hon. Friend is right. I received a letter recently from someone who lives in a council bedsit in an urban area. He has had a run-in with the police before. He fears that, if the wrong sort of policeman was dealing with his shotgun certificate, he could suffer because of that officer's prejudice. I hope that that will not happen. My hon. Friend is absolutely right—there may be difficulties in urban areas.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My hon. Friend has just told us about his constituent and friend. Is that the gentleman who keeps the shotgun under his bed, about which we were told last time we discussed the matter?

Mr. Bellingham: The Minister is wrong. I have had another letter from someone outside my constituency. I do not represent an urban area. However, the Minister is right that in Committee we discussed a constituent of mine who kept a gun under his bed, in a flat.

If some good comes out of the Bill—I am not saying that it is all bad—it will be the inculcation in many sporting and shooting people of the understanding that they must take more care of their weapons. There will be greater emphasis on security and on the care of weapons during transportation, for example, from a shooting ground back home. Within the shooting community, there is greater realisation of the responsibilities. In that respect, the Bill is to be welcomed.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary knows that I am concerned about practical shooting for the disabled. My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries made his feelings clear. We are trying to encourage disabled people to participate in sport, to find their feet, as it were. We are trying to give confidence and pride back to them. Therefore, it is appalling to stop them taking part in target shooting, stalking or other forms of rifle shooting. The Minister knows that we have had this argument time and again, but it is sad that, as we put the Bill to bed, disabled people have not had——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot see anything in any of the Lords amendments relating to the argument that the hon. Gentleman is putting before the House. He should address his remarks to the motion.

Mr. Bellingham: I was about to refer to practical shooting, which was discussed at length in the other place. It is important to mention that the sport of practical shooting may soon become an Olympic sport. As a result of the Bill, we in this country will be prevented from taking part in that sport, which is sad. It is also sad that, for the first time ever, our citizens——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I fail to see what the hon. Gentleman's speech has to do with the motion before the House. He should address his remarks to that.

Mr. Bellingham: I certainly will. It is unfortunate that, when the previous guillotine fell, we were prevented from discussing many of those points.

We welcome the guillotine now. We bitterly regret the fact that the Bill was not properly discussed on the Floor of the House. The Minister must be left in no doubt about the fact that there was widespread support in the shooting community for a measure to improve firearms legislation and to improve the working relationship and co-operation between the sporting community and the police. The Minister could have won the confidence and support of the shooting community.

It is sad that the Government felt minded to rush into the Bill and that the necessary consultation did not take place. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) said that Mr. Des Hughes wrote to the Minister asking for a meeting on 14 October. I was sent a copy of that correspondence. Much criticism was levelled against the Under-Secretary and the Home Secretary for not consulting widely enough. They said at the time that they were consulting and that their doors were open. To keep the door shut during the final stages of the Bill is most unfortunate.

Mr. Wiggin: Does my hon. Friend agree that much of the difficulty that was created in regard to consultation arose from the fact that the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) gave my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary the green light from the Opposition Benches? One of the lessons of the House that one should have thought had been learnt 100 times over is that, when both Front Benches are in agreement, the Bill before the House is rotten.

Mr. Bellingham: My hon. Friend makes his point effectively, but that does not detract from the fact that Ministers said that their doors were open and that they wanted to have discussions and consultations with the shooting community. I know that some efforts were made. The Home Secretary and the Under-Secretary have indeed had many discussions and meetings, but it is sad that, in the final stages of the Bill, when a meeting was requested, an excuse was found not to have it.

Mr. Corbett: Although there was a green light from the Opposition, the hon. Gentleman should know that it was also on amber.

Mr. Bellingham: We appreciate that.

I do not believe that there is a single colleague who represents shooting intrests in the House who has not been lobbied furiously on the Bill. I think that every colleague is in agreement that there is grave disquiet and concern about the effects of the Bill on reducing crime, on tying down the police and, above all, on the excellent series of relationships between the shooting community and the police.

We cannot gaze into a crystal ball. I wish the Bill well, but I am pessimistic. We shall have to come back in about a year or two, because only then will we know its effects.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Order of the House [25th May] be supplemented as follows:—

Lords Amendments

1.—(1) The proceedings on Consideration of Lords Amendments shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion three hours after the commencement of the proceedings on the Motion for this Order.

(2) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business) shall apply to those proceedings.

(3) No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, the proceedings shall be made except by a member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

(4) If the proceedings are interrupted by a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration), a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on the Motion shall be added to the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion.

(5) If the House is adjourned, or the sitting is suspended, before the expiry of the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion, no notice shall be required of a Motion made at the next sitting by a member of the Government for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order.

2.—(1) For the purpose of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 1 above—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and not yet decided and, if that Question is for the amendment of a Lords Amendment, shall then put forthwith the Question on any further Amendment to the said Lords Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown and on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in the said Lords Amendment, or, as the case may be, in the said Lords Amendment as amended;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining Lords Amendments as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege and shall—

(i) put forthwith the Question on any Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown to a Lords Amendment and then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth agree or disagree with the Lords in their Amendment, or, as the case may be, in their Amendment as amended;

(ii) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in a Lords Amendment;

(iii) put forthwith with respect to the Amendments designated by Mr. Speaker which have not been disposed of the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendments; and

(iv) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Amendments;

(c) as soon as the House has agreed or disagreed with the Lords in any of their Amendments Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith a separate Question on any other Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown relevant to that Lords Amendment.

(2) Proceedings under sub-paragraph (1) above shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

Stages subsequent to first Consideration of Lords Amendments

3. The proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion one hour after the commencement of those proceedings.

4. For the purpose of bringing those proceedings to a conclusion—

(a) Mr. Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has already been proposed from the Chair and has not yet been decided, and shall then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown which is related to the Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) Mr. Speaker shall then designate such of the remaining items in the Lords Message as appear to him to involve questions of Privilege and shall—

(i) put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown on any item;

(ii) in the case of the remaining items designated by Mr. Speaker, put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in their said Proposals; and

(iii) put forthwith the Question, That this House doth agree with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Proposals.

Supplemental

5.—(1) In this paragraph "the proceedings" means proceedings on any further Message from the Lords on the Bill, on the appointment and quorum of a Committee to draw up Reasons and the Report of such a Committee.

(2) Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown for the consideration forthwith of the Message or, as the case may be, for the appointment and quorum of the Committee.

(3) A Committee appointed to draw up Reasons shall report before the conclusion of the sitting at which it is appointed.

(4) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings.

(5) No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, the proceedings shall be made except by a member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

(6) If the proceedings are interrupted by a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on the Motion shall be added to the period at the end of which the proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion.

Orders of the Day

Firearms (Amendment) Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 1

PROHIBITED WEAPONS AND AMMUNITION

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 2, line 11, leave out from "to" to end of line 15 and insert—

"(a) any firearm (not being an air weapon) which is not for the time being specified in subsection (1) of section 5, was not lawfully on sale in Great Britain in substantial numbers at any time before 1988 and appears to him to be—

(i) specially dangerous; or

(ii) wholly or partly composed of material making it not readily detectable by apparatus used for detecting metal objects; or

(b) any ammunition which is not for the time being specified in that subsection but appears to him to be specially dangerous,"

5.38 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The purpose of the amendment is to deal with a problem that probably has not yet arisen but it may do so. The problem is the possible manufacture of plastic guns or guns made with non-metallic substances and capable of avoiding detection by detecting machines, especially at airports. I say that it is probable that such guns do not at present exist, but one cannot be wholly certain. There are guns whose metal components can be dismantled and arranged in a suitcase or briefcase in such a way as to make detection very much less likely.

The purpose of the amendment is to enable us, where appropriate, to bring into the prohibited class guns of the description that I have given. It is right to say that that power is subject to two saving provisions designed to prevent its being used oppressively. First, the order will be subject to the affirmative procedure. Secondly, the power will not be applied to those weapons lawfully on sale in Great Britain in substantial numbers at any time before 1988.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 3

GRANT AND RENEWAL OF SHOTGUN CERTIFICATES

Lords amendment: No. 2, in page 3, line 22, leave out "number and"

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The purpose of the amendment is to clarify what was always the Government's intention. At no stage did we intend that chief constables should be able to use their powers, either under the Bill or under the principal Act, to limit the number of shotguns that a shotgun certificate holder could have. A number of my hon. Friends, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham), but also my hon. Friends the Members for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) and for

[Mr. Douglas Hogg]

Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin), were concerned that the Bill did not make that plain. That concern was expressed again in another place when the amendment was moved. The amendment has the effect of saying that the chief constable has no power to impose a limitation on the numbers of guns held by a shotgun certificate holder. That meets what the Government always had in mind, and we are glad to give it statutory expression.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): Although it is obviously far too late in the day to think about dividing the House on any of these amendments, I must admit to some unease that the other place has felt it right to introduce this one. Inevitably, it reopens the argument, which I have heard from chief constables and others, that the Bill treats shotguns as somehow different in lethality from other firearms and that in tightening the gun laws —perhaps because of the Hungerford massacre—authorities have concentrated too much on semi-automatic weapons when other weapons are perhaps still too easily available.

We know that there is little difference between the number of offences committed with shotguns—either the long-barrelled or sawn-off varieties—and the number committed using a pistol or a rifle. I am obliged to draw the attention of the House to the fact that criminals do not seem to care particularly which weapon they use and are as happy to use a shotgun as they are to use a rifle or pistol, whichever is the easiest to obtain. Generally, shotguns are the easiest to obtain.

The debate in the other place focused on shotguns in their traditional role, for shooting game in the countryside, and only a little emphasis was placed on the issue of numbers, and then purely in terms of safe storage. What of the views of the chief constables? We often say in the House that we must strengthen the powers of the police to meet the crimes of violence that are so rife in our society, yet the amendment effectively denies them the power to impose any limit on the number of guns owned by an individual—a change included in the original Bill, which I welcomed. The amendment suggests that no justification need be shown for owning 10 guns or any number of shotguns.

Any ideas that the police might have formed as this legislation proceeded through Parliament, that they were to have a new ability to restrict the number of weapons held by an individual or to impose stricter conditions on the ownership of weapons over a given number, have gone by the board. As Earl Ferrers said in the other place:

> "In order to make it clear we are saying that the chief constable cannot impose arbitrary limits and we shall say so in the memorandum of guidance."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 19 October 1988; Vol. 500, c. 1160.]

Why not? The public are worried about the armouries of weapons held by some people and, so far as I know, public opinion has never expressed itself to be more concerned about rifles, pistols and semi-automatics than it is about shotguns. The public are worried about weapons that kill and injure people.

5.45 pm

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): I am interested to hear my hon. Friend's views, especially in view of his extensive knowledge of the subject after the unhappy occurrences in his constituency. Does he agree that, by and large, apart from some specialists, there is no need for anyone to own more than a few weapons for the pursuit of legitimate sport? Does he agree also that, when a person has a whole arsenal, it predicates the thought that there may be undesirable consequences? As my hon. Friend said, the weapon that is the most popular and most used in robberies—alas, crime is growing not only in this country but throughout the world—is a sawn-off shotgun. Unless one is embarking upon a wave of terrorism, the automatic machine gun or rifle is not used as much as the shotgun. It is the shotgun that is the danger.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, because he makes my point for me. It is a fact that, although Michael Ryan used a semi-automatic, he was in possession of shotguns and, as was said in Standing Committee, had he chosen to use them, he probably would have killed roughly the same number of people as he killed with his semi-automatic weapon.

The public and the police are worried about the use of these weapons. How does the amendment reassure them? I admit that the issue of the security of weapons was considered in the other place in the debate on this amendment and was seen as the circumstance that might be used by chief constables to limit the number of weapons. That presupposes a police check on who has weapons and where they are kept, and we know that such checks will be rare.

Lastly, and I draw some hope from my understanding of the paragraph as now drafted, if a shotgun certificate specifies the description of the shotguns to which it relates, what exactly will that mean? Will it mean an individual description of each weapon, or something more general? If it is the former, does that not add up to numbering the weapons held? Perhaps my hon. Friend will tell me whether the memorandum of guidance will offer any guidance to chief constables about their attitude to weapons and whether they should consider being a little tougher about those who wish to have more than a pair of guns in their possession.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): I was not proposing to intervene. In fact, I was about to rise to ask my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson) whether he would give way again. As my hon. Friend has already sat down, I shall comment briefly.

It would have been extremely damaging to legitimate shooting interests if the words "number and" had been left in the Bill. Contrary to what my hon. Friend said, many people can legitimately wish to keep more than just "a pair of guns"—to use his words—bearing in mind, among other things, the number of children in their families who may want to shoot when they get a little older.

I need a weapon for my young son who is learning how to shoot. When he grows up, I hope to keep it for my younger son when he grows a little older and learns how to shoot. In addition to my guns, I have my father-in-law's gun, so that he can shoot when he visits my farm. The Government are therefore right to delete "number and".

A further point is that the police will need an adequate description of shotguns kept by the certificate holder—although I do not know precisely what description will be required—and that meets the case that was put by my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury. The police will glean enough information from the certificate to judge whether somebody has an armoury, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury fears, or whether the shotguns that are kept are legitimate. The shooting lobby feared the words "number and" because, despite the assurances given in the House, it seemed that some chief constables proposed to limit the number of shotguns to an unacceptably low number.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: By leave of the House, I shall speak again. I am pleased to say that I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor). I understand the argument advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson), but for reasons similar to those given by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster I do not favour a limitation on the number of shotguns held by a shotgun certificate holder.

A number of steps have been taken in the Bill which will certainly improve security. There is, for example, the requirement to keep the gun in a safe place. I have in mind that guns should be locked away. In addition, a chief constable will be able to refuse an application for a shotgun certificate if he is satisfied that there is not a good reason for the applicant to possess a shotgun. The House will remember that we have defined "good reason" to include sporting competitions and the shooting of vermin. We have also provided for the notification of transfers and specified the information that should appear on the certificate. All those substantial measures are designed to tighten the control of shotguns, but we do not seek to impose a positive obligation on the applicant to prove "good reason" or to give a chief constable the power to limit numbers.

I shall make one further point about arsenals. If it were found that an individual was stockpiling guns on a large scale—of course, that would be clear from the description of each gun that the applicant had to give on the certificate—the chief constable would want to be satisfied that the safekeeping of the guns was adequate.

I shall not ask my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster how many guns he has in his house, but I imagine that there are half a dozen or so. He can easily keep them in a steel cabinet. A chief constable would, I am sure, be satisfied with that. If, however, someone had a stockpile of 20, 30 or 40 guns, the chief constable would be anxious to determine the level of safekeeping and security. That is a real means of control, and I hope that it commends itself not only to my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster but to my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury, whose anxieties, which he ventilated so lucidly in Committee and again today, I understand.

TRANSFERS OF SHOT GUNS

Lords amendment: No. 3, in page 3, line 27, leave out "forty-eight" and insert "seventy-two".

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

I think that it was my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) who paid tribute earlier to the work of the noble Lord Swansea. It is right that I should say that the amendment is a reflection of the work done by Lord Swansea in the other place. The object of the provision is to extend the period of loan in respect of which the borrower need not notify the chief constable of the loan.

Clause 4 is designed to ensure that the short-term borrowing of a shotgun does not have to be notified to the police but that long-term borrowing does. We had in mind an occasion, such as a shooting party, where a gun was broken or, conceivably, lost and one of the guests borrowed a gun from his host or a fellow guest. It would be nonsense to require the borrower or anybody else to notify the police of the transfer. The 48-hour proposal was an attempt to impose a realistic threshold, but in another place Lord Swansea suggested 72 hours. I cannot say that that is wrong. It seems reasonable, and on that basis I commend it to the House.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): The amendment is most welcome. The Minister will recall that when we discussed the matter in Committee he gave the example of someone turning up for a weekend shooting party without his gun. The original proposal was ridiculous because it meant that that person would be breaking the law. The threshold of 72 hours is much more sensible. I thank the Minister for supporting the Lords amendment.

Clause 6

SHORTENING OF BARREL

Lords amendment: No. 4, in page 4, line 24, leave out "a self-loading, pump-action or revolver smooth-bore gun" and insert

"any smooth-bore gun to which section 1 of the principal Act applies other than one which has a barrel with a bore exceeding 2 inches in diameter".

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

This is a technical amendment of wonderful complexity. The House will recall that we amended the definition of "shotgun" to that which now appears in clause 2(2). We ought at the same time to have amended clause 6(1). We did not do so. The purpose of the amendment is to correct that defect.

Clause 7

CONVERSION NOT TO AFFECT CLASSIFICATION

Lords amendment: No. 5, in page 4, line 35, after "which" insert "(a)"

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this we may take Lords amendments Nos. 6, 7 and 8.

Mr. Hogg: The amendments are designed to meet anxieties expressed by the gun trade and by hon. Members about the operation of the Bill. Some of the amendments to which I shall draw specific attention meet the point about sleeving made by my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) during our debate on the timetable motion.

Let me explain amendments Nos. 5 and 6. Some self-loading and pump-action shotguns have interchangeable barrels some of which are less than 24 in. long.

[Mr. Hogg]

Without the amendments, if a previous owner of such a shotgun had at some stage—unknown to the present owner—screwed on a short barrel, that weapon would always be a prohibited weapon, even if the barrel had subsequently been unscrewed and destroyed.

Sir Dudley Smith: That is interesting. Is the case that the Minister cites hypothetical, or does the Home Office know of particular instances?

Mr. Hogg: It is not hypothetical, in the sense that it can clearly happen, although I am not aware of its having happened. My hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) will appreciate that in America, for example, self-loading or pump-action shotguns are sold with a range of barrels, some of which may be less than 24 in. long. Suppose that a previous owner in the United States had screwed on a short barrel. Even if that short barrel had subsequently been removed, or even destroyed, the present owner would still hold a prohibited weapon. That is nonsense, and the amendments are designed to eliminate it.

Amendments Nos. 7 and 8 are also designed to assist the gun trade and they are entirely reasonable. We are concerned here with two circumstances. The first is the repair of shotguns by re-sleeving. I understand that sometimes a shotgun barrel will be cut down to a small size and another barrel will be grafted on to it as part of the repair process. In the absence of these amendments, such a gun would at one time have a short barrel and could thus be treated as a prohibited—and certainly as a section 1—weapon. The amendment is designed to cover that problem.

The other circumstance is similar, but not quite the same. The process of converting some rifles to shotguns can involve cutting down the barrel into a stump and grafting a shotgun barrel on to what was a rifle. Under the Bill's original wording, such a gun would remain in its former category and not be treated as a shotgun, which was not the original intention. I hope that the House will accept that the amendments are a positive improvement.

Clause 9

PHOTOGRAPHS ON CERTIFICATES

Lords amendment: No. 9, in page 5, line 23, leave out "two" and insert "up to four".

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

This is a Londonderry, East triumph. The hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) will remember how in Committee, on Second Reading and no doubt on Report he urged on the Government the need to increase the number of photographs. He will further recall that I steadfastly refused to accept that eminently sensible suggestion. Now, overcome with shame and grief, I have decided that the least I can do is to accept this amendment.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): I am pleased to have moved the Minister in one small respect. My only regret is that the rest of the eminently sensible suggestions from Londonderry, East were not accepted, too.

I want to pursue with the Minister the point raised by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) about photographs on dealers' licences. Has the Minister had time to consider that? If so, what conclusions has he reached about photographs for proper identification on such permits?

Question put and agreed to.

New Clause

REVOCATION OF CERTIFICATES

Lords amendment: No. 10, after clause 11 insert the following new clause—

" .—(1) Where a certificate is revoked by the chief officer of police under section 30(1)(a) or (2) of the principal Act he may by notice in writing require the holder of the certificate to surrender forthwith the certificate and any firearms and ammunition which are in the holder's possession by virtue of the certificate.

(2) It is an offence to fail to comply with a notice under subsection (1) above; and that offence shall be punishable on summary conviction with imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months or a fine not exceeding level 4 on the standard scale or both.

(3) Where a firearm or ammunition is surrendered in pursuance of a notice under subsection (1) above, then—

(a) if such an appeal against the revocation of the certificate succeeds, the firearm or ammunition shall be returned;

(b) if such an appeal is dismissed, the court may make such order for the disposal of the firearm or ammunition as it thinks fit;

(c) if no such appeal is brought or such an appeal is abandoned, the firearm or ammunition shall be disposed of—

(i) in such manner as the chief officer of police and the owner may agree; or

(ii) in default of agreement, in such manner as the chief officer may decide;

but, subject, in a case within sub-paragraph (ii), to the provisions of subsection (4) below.

(4) The chief officer of police shall give the owner notice in writing of any decision under subsection (3)(c)(ii) above, the owner may appeal against that decision in accordance with section 44 of the principal Act and on such an appeal the court may either dismiss the appeal or make such order as to the disposal of the firearm or ammunition as it thinks fit.

(5) Subsection (4) of section 30 of the principal Act (surrender of revoked certificate within twenty-one days with extension in cases of appeal) shall not apply where the revocation is under subsection (1)(a) or (2) of that section and a notice is served under subsection (1) above; and paragraph 1 of Part I and paragraphs 1 to 5 of Part II of Schedule 5 to that Act (appeal jurisdiction and procedure) shall apply to an appeal under subsection (4) above as they apply to an appeal against the revocation of a certificate."

Mr. Douglas Hogg: First, on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that there is a printing error in the amendment. I refer hon. Members to subsection (3)(b), the first line of which includes the words "if such an appeal". The word "such" is an error; it should not appear.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Resign.

Mr. Hogg: That was a nasty suggestion.

Mr. Speaker: It is not for me to correct the Minister, but I understand that the mistake is in paragraph (a), not (b).

Mr. Hogg: It sounds as though we are approaching resigning territory. I do not see the word "such" in subsection (3)(a). It is not in my copy.

Mr. Speaker: It is in mine.

Mr. Hogg: Your view, Mr. Speaker, is likely to be authoritative. I am looking desperately for help with this.

Mr. Corbett: I had better make a confession. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) will give me hell when he notices this. He used to go through Bills and spot errors before Ministers did. The copy that I, and, it appears, you, Mr. Speaker, have contains the word "such" before the words "an appeal" in subsections (3)(a), (b) and (c). At least that is consistent. Is the Minister happier with that, or shall I ask him another question? I am not a lawyer, but I should have thought that, on grounds of consistency and clarity, this would be an improvement. It cannot do any great harm either way.

Mr. Hogg: This is the first time in a debate that I have had to say that I am excessively grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I think that we can settle happily on subsection (3)(a). That is where the error is to be found. If we could deal with subsection (3)(a), I should be uncommonly obliged to you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The House accepts that.

Mr. Hogg: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

This amendment represents quite an important change in the provisions in the Bill, and I commend it to the House. In section 30 of the Firearms Act 1968 the chief constable has power to revoke a firearms certificate. That power of revocation is subject to appeal. But what happens to a gun pending the hearing of an appeal? At present, the police have a limited right to require the surrender of the gun. For example, in section 46 of the 1968 Act they have power to search under warrant and the right of seizure when they have reasonable grounds to suppose that an offence has been or is about to be committed. But they do not have power to require the delivering up of the gun after revocation of the certificate on the general public safety grounds referred to in the new clause, whose purpose is to give them that power.

If an appeal against a revocation is successful, the gun and its ammunition, if any, will be returned. If it is not successful, or is not pursued, the new clause provides for the disposal of the gun. In the first instance, that should be done by agreement; in default of an agreement, it should be done on the adjudication of the court.

I hope that the House will consider it right to improve the circumstances in which a chief constable can require the surrender of a gun pending an appeal, and agree that we have got the balance about right.

Sir Dudley Smith: I broadly agree with my hon. Friend's support for the Lords amendment. However, throughout the proceedings on the Bill there has been an undercurrent of anxiety about chief constables responding too vigorously to the measure. Chief constables vary throughout the kingdom, and we want to keep a reasonable check on any actions they may take as a result of the legislation.

There is a large degree of discretion in refusing a gun licence to someone. If there are good and adequate reasons why one should not be given, I am sure that the whole community would support chief constables and the police in withdrawing a weapon. If the subject is debated, and if the police propose that a weapon should be taken away under the provisions of the Bill, the owner of the weapon will have the right of appeal.

I hope that as we proceed with the implementation of the legislation the Home Office will keep a careful check on the weapons that are withdrawn or confiscated as a result of the new provisions. Situations can vary, and I say hypothetically that one thing could happen in Sussex and another in Worcestershire. Subsection 3(c) of the new clause says:

"if no such appeal is brought . . . (i) in such manner as the chief officer of police and the owner may agree".

If a person does not appeal, or if he appeals and the appeal fails and he is not entitled to have a shotgun certificate or to own a weapon, will the police confiscate that weapon? Provided that he is not a criminal, will he be able to sell the weapon so that he does not suffer a penalty on the spot?

Mr. Hogg: I should like to reply to the question put to me by my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith). The situation is comprehensively described in subsection (3) of the new clause. Perhaps I could take my hon. Friend through it, because this rather complicated procedure is dealt with in detail. Subsection (a) provides that if the appeal against revocation succeeds the gun or the ammunition shall be returned. If the gun holder appeals against revocation and wins, he returns to the status quo.

The second alternative is where the gun holder appeals, the appeal fails and the court holds that the chief constable was correct. In that case it will be for the court to decide how the gun and the ammunition are to be disposed of. The parties to the appeal will almost certainly make representations to the court about a fair manner of disposal. I envisage a sale, depending on the nature of the gun, to an authorised dealer, with the proceeds of sale being made available to the shotgun owner whose appeal has failed.

The third situation is where a revocation notice is served and an appeal is entered but not proceeded with. In other words, the shotgun or the firearms certificate holder does not go to court. In that case the subsections apply in the ways that are set out in the Bill. First, they will apply in such manner as the chief officer of police and the owner may agree. If there is such an agreement the gun will be dealt with in accordance with it. If there is no agreement the chief officer of police has a power to impose one. He may say, "We have not agreed, but I suggest that the weapon be sold and you receive the proceeds of the sale." If the gun owner is dissatisfied with the scheme put forward by the chief constable, he has the right of appeal to the court. Ultimately, the court will decide the situation that we have been discussing.

I hope my hon. Friend will feel that, although this is a slightly elaborate approach, at least the interests of the shotgun or firearm certificate holder have been preserved.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: We now come to Lords amendment No. 11, to which there are the following amendments: (a), in line 2, leave out 'of or over the age of seventeen'.

(b), in line 2, leave out 'seventeen' and insert 'fourteen'.

(c), in line 7, leave out 'and'.

(d), in line 9, at end insert

[Mr. Speaker]

'and

(c) if the borrower is under the age of seventeen the occupier or servant in whose presence the rifle is to be used is aged twenty-one or over.'.

(e), in line 10, after 'person', insert

'of or over the age of seventeen'.

(f), in line 21 at end insert—

'(3) In sections 22(2) and 24(2)(b) of the principal Act (exemption for minors in cases to which section 11(3) applies) after the words "of this Act" there shall be inserted the words "or section (Borrowed rifles on private premises) of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988".'.

New Clause

BORROWED RIFLES ON PRIVATE PREMISES

Lords amendment: No. 11, after clause 14 insert the following new clause:

".—(1) A person of or over the age of seventeen may, without holding a firearm certificate, borrow a rifle from the occupier of private premises and use it on those premises in the presence either of the occupier or of a servant of the occupier if—

(a) the occupier or servant in whose presence it is used holds a firearm certificate in respect of that rifle; and

(b) the borrower's possession and use of it complies with any conditions as to those matters specified in the certificate.

(2) A person who by virtue of subsection (1) above is entitled without holding a firearm certificate to borrow and use a rifle in another person's presence may also, without holding such a certificate, purchase or acquire ammunition for use in the rifle and have it in his possession during the period for which the rifle is borrowed if—

(a) the firearm certificate held by that other person authorises the holder to have in his possession at that time ammunition for the rifle of a quantity not less than that purchased or acquired by, and in the possession of, the borrower; and

(b) the borrower's possession and use of the ammunition complies with any conditions as to those matters specified in the certificate."

Read a Second time.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I notice that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary did not rise to his feet. That is why I have risen. It would probably be better if he spoke to the Lords amendment first.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take the amendments first.

6.15 pm

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I share my hon. Friend's enthusiasm for the fact that I was able to support him wholeheartedly on the second amendment that we discussed. It would make me much happier if he were able to support my amendment. For the life of me I can see no good reason why he should not do so. I forbore from commenting while we were on the timetable motion, but I agree with my hon. Friends who said that the Bill gives the overall impression to those of us in the legitimate shooting lobby, and especially to those in the British Field Sports Society, which I have the honour to chair, that the Government do not care for the interests of the legitimate shooting lobby. To a large degree, the Bill tramples upon those interests, with no great malice, but with unfortunate results. One of the ways in which that impression could have been put right was by the Government using the opportunity of the Bill to remedy a clear anachronism in the law.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) said that he welcomed the history lesson. Perhaps he will not mind my taking him back to the distant times in which I was growing up and learning to shoot. Unfortunately, my children refer to those times as the times when the dinosaurs roamed the earth. It was not as far back as that, but it was before the Firearms Act 1968. In those happy days we had a Prime Minister who was a keen sporting shot. He used to appear quite regularly in the national newspapers sporting a pair of plus fours and was seen on the grouse moor on 12 August. I do not know whether he was also a keen stalker, but certainly many shooters who enjoy shooting grouse and other wild birds also enjoy the very old and skilled art of stalking.

In order to be proficient at stalking, it is important at an early age to learn to handle a rifle properly, under proper supervision. I had the good fortune to go to Scotland when I was a boy in my early teens to learn how to stalk, being supervised either by my father or by a professional member of the shooting forest in which I was learning. I also learnt how to shoot stags safely and without danger to others.

In 1968, under a Government of a different political persuasion from ours, the right of a boy of 14 to 17 to shoot under such supervision was unfortunately removed. I do not think that many people realise that it had been removed. I certainly did not realise it, and I have a more than sneaking suspicion that the Minister did not realise it. I do not think that the Home Secretary realised it either. I am certain that my many friends in Scotland, who have perhaps been allowing young people to shoot under supervision on their estates, did not realise it. Looking at the rather complex provisions of the 1968 Act in the early hours of this morning, accompanied by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, I noticed that there appears to be no doubt that in that Act boys and girls —I must not be accused of being sexist in these matters —who wish to go out stalking or to go after a rabbit with a ·22 are banned from doing so.

Their Lordships have introduced a provision in clause 11 so that an estate rifle can now be borrowed by somebody over the age of 17 and may be legitimately used. It is a matter of some astonishment to me that the Bill got as far as the House of Lords before that point was made and it was noticed that, otherwise, an estate rifle could not be used by anybody other than the firearm certificate owner. I understand that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary is about to commend that amendment to the House. This would have been a marvellous opportunity to bring the Bill into line with sections 22, 23 and 24 of the principal Act of 1968 by making a sharp differential between what is allowed at 17 and what is allowed at 14.

Unfortunately, in that principal Act, the effect of that differential would not allow 14 to 17-year-olds to shoot, although I have a strong suspicion that that was what was intended, and an even greater suspicion that that is what most people thought it actually did. Here we have an opportunity to show those in the shooting fraternity that the Government support them, wish to be as helpful as possible and wish to encourage the training of young people in the safe and accurate use of rifles for sporting purposes. Sadly, that opportunity is being missed, and my hon. Friend the Minister has been kind enough to tell me that there can be no question of the Government supporting my amendments. I ask him to tell the House what benefit he thinks there is to the general public, what extra safeguard is contained in the provision as it now stands that my amendments would remove, and why it is that the Government are not prepared to accept the amendments.

This missed opportunity is a great pity. Young people of that age can acquire substantial skills, so denying them that opportunity makes this a thoroughly bad law. I hope that if my hon. Friend will not accept my amendments today he will, at some other opportune moment, reconsider the position and give our youths the chance that those of us who are older enjoyed in our youth—to learn a skill that they will enjoy fully as adults.

It would be a great pity if I and others who own farms cannot take out young people with a ·22 rifle to teach them how to shoot rabbits, or even at targets, in the way that we, as young people, were taught. My wife has some godchildren whom I know she would like me to take out on my farm—my hon. Friend the Minister will know what I am talking about. I am sad that the Government's attitude will prevent my doing so.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) did not rise initially, but his amendment comes first, so I shall call him before I put the Question on the amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor).

Mr. Bellingham: I beg to move amendment (a), in line 2, leave out

'of or over the age of seventeen'.

The amendment is obviously similar to some of the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor). However, it is slightly more simple.

I know that some among the sporting fraternity have suggested that perhaps we should not delve into this part of the law because of the illegal acts that have taken place in the past involving young people using stalking rifles. Many in the other place took the view that perhaps it was best not to discuss the subject, but just pass over it. However, I feel that we should discuss this in detail and get my hon. Friend the Minister to tell us exactly what the position is. I support what my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster has said. We want to encourage young people. A young person of 14, 15 or 16 can go shotgun shooting or clay pigeon shooting under supervision. However, what about the young person who wants to try shooting with a small bore, when stalking in a deer forest, or even to kill vermin and rabbits? Surely it is better for him to put his toe in the water so that he can decide whether he likes the sport.

There is another problem. Let us take two lads at school, who are both in their officer training corps or combined cadet force and shoot with .303s, or shoot on the school range with .22s. Let us say that those two lads decide to take their holidays with their parents in Scotland and both want to try their hand at stalking. One lad happens to live in the country and the other in a large city. The former applies for a firearms certificate and gets one, but the other lad applies and does not get it. I do not agree with Lord Ferrers that anybody in the 14 to 17 age group can apply for and obtain a firearms certificate. Anybody in that age group who applies for a firearms certificate for a stalking rifle in London or Manchester would not have a cat's chance in hell of getting it. As a result of the two lads going on holiday, one would be able to pursue his sport and the other would not. That is ridiculous.

The point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster about encouraging youngsters is important. I did not have the opportunity to go stalking until I was well into my 20s, but I know that many people had the chance to go stalking in their teens. Anyone who has a feel for, or a love of, the countryside and for these pursuits will know that it is important to encourage youngsters at an early age, and that it would be wrong to restrict their taking part in the sport. In every other pursuit—not just country sports—youngsters in that crucial teenage category can play a part, under supervision in many cases, but in other cases without restrictions.

To say that young people in this category must go to the chief constable to get a certificate is most unreasonable. My hon. Friend the Member for Upminster is right to say that it will put an unnecessary dampener on the enthusiasm of many young people and prevent them from finding out about a sport by putting their toe in the water to decide whether they like it. To tell them that they must wait until they are 17 is ridiculous.

What happens if one of the sons of my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster wants to try out a .22 at home? He can use that gun on the range at school, under supervision from a master, or he can use it at a club. What happens when he wants to use it at home, in a completely safe and secure environment and to take a practice shot? If he is under 17, he cannot do so. It is laughable and ludicrous that my hon. Friend cannot go on to a safe area of his farm where he has a range set up and on which he is shooting, and encourage his son to do the same, because if he is caught doing so he will be breaking the law. My hon. Friend the Minister must explain what the Government are doing about this.

I welcome Lords amendment No. 11, and I must give credit where credit is due. There was a lengthy debate in the other place about the so-called estate rifle. A number of their Lordships went on at great length about the absurd situation whereby people on an estate in Scotland or Northern Ireland who go out on a stalk cannot use a gun without a certificate, even under strict supervision. We welcome Lords amendment No. 11, but the opportunity to clarify the position of young people should be grasped. We must encourage youngsters, and we must make the law workable, sensible and credible. My hon. Friend the Minister knows as well as I do that if this part of the Bill is passed many people will break the law inadvertently. I ask him to use this opportunity to make a clear statement on exactly where we are going and to give us some idea of how we get over this unfortunate hurdle.

Sir Hal Miller (Bromsgrove): I support my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor). Some of the debate has been a little esoteric. Not all of us are children of successful practitioners at the Bar with vast estates in Scotland, or have godfathers who are similarly equipped. However, what about the person who potters around the farm with a .22 to shoot rats, rabbits or starlings? I hope to bring my son up learning the safe handling of a comparatively cheap but accurate enough weapon so as to equip him later in life for more serious endeavours. The suggestion that one's son, under supervision, cannot go around one's haybarn with a .22 looking for a rat is the difference between the amendments tabled by my hon.

[Sir Hal Miller]

Friends the Members for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) and for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham), as the amendments moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster provide an element of supervision which is necessary at that age, although I was free from that encumbrance.

6.30 pm

Sir Dudley Smith: I have some sympathy with the case made by my hon. Friends the Members for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) and for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor). However, some difficulties arise. Without trying to anticipate what my hon. Friend the Minister will say, surely the whole thing comes down to supervision and there is a far greater chance of proper supervision if the young person is older rather than younger.

We have all heard of tragedies. I know two families who have been involved in tragedies through the wrong use of rifles. Guns are dangerous things, which have to be treated with respect whether one is 14, 65 or 70. Provided that respect is inculcated at an early age, and the child is made to realise that a gun is a weapon of destruction, perhaps everything will be all right. However, supervision varies enormously. My hon. Friend the Member for Upminster looks dubious. I am sure that he provides the very best supervision, but I am certain that in some other cases supervision would be cursory and therefore quite dangerous.

I should have thought that the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster would have met the point. While I understand the anxieties of my two hon. Friends, I feel that we need to be fairly cautious about reducing the age, because young people in an urban environment would never get the opportunity to use a sporting rifle—that is probably just as well—whereas for somebody brought up on a country estate or a farm it would become second nature.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Does my hon. Friend accept that a young person of 14 is likely to be much more amenable to supervision than a 17 or 18-year-old? The supervision of a 17 or 18-year-old is likely to be very much more cursory than the supervision given to a 14-year-old. Therefore, is there not a great deal of good sense in the amendments tabled by my two hon. Friends, who know a great deal about shooting and sport?

Sir Dudley Smith: I accept that argument, and I consider it reasonably compelling. In contradiction to that, we know that the younger people are, the more irresponsible they can be, and although they accept the tuition that they receive, they can play fast and loose. Difficulties can arise and tragedies happen in a moment. There are no second chances.

Although I accept there is quite a good case for my hon. Friends' proposals, they still fall short of what should be in the legislation. Therefore, I do not support their amendments.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) for the support that he has given to the Government's case on this matter, and I shall adopt the greater part of his argument.

It might be helpful if I were to outline the Government's position on new clause 11, and then turn to the amendments that have been tabled by my two hon. Friends. In regard to new clause 11, I respectfully suggest that the House should agree to the Lords amendment. This amendment concerns estate rifles and it received considerable support in the other place when it was moved by Lord Kimball. It meets the established practice on many estates in Scotland and elsewhere of allowing guests to borrow an estate rifle while under supervision and to use it for stalking purposes. Hitherto, that has been an unlawful practice, and we wish to put it on a regular statutory basis.

The safeguards appear on the face of the new clause —the borrower is over 17, the loan is limited to a rifle and not to any section 1 weapon, the use must be confined to the occupier's land and of course, must be with the occupier's consent and must comply with any conditions on the certificate. Most important, the use must be supervised by a certificate holder, though the certificate holder may be an agent of the lender who is the occupier.

Mr. William Ross: Will the Minister confirm that the present practice of illegally borrowing and using an estate rifle is quite a serious offence which can carry not only a substantial fine but a term of imprisonment? Are we to believe that many people have been breaking the law with impunity for many years?

Mr. Hogg: The answer to the latter question is yes. The use of estate rifles in the way that we have been discussing has been widespread. The great majority of borrowers did not realise that they were acting unlawfully. We are trying to put the practice, which is wholly respectable, on a proper statutory basis, and I am inviting the House to do just that.

I shall turn to the question of age, because I recognise that it is a matter of considerable importance. The amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) seek to introduce an age threshold of 14, whereas my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham)—I do not think that I parody his views, and I apologise if I do—seeks to do away with any age threshold.

Mr. Bellingham indicated assent.

Mr. Hogg: I see that he acknowledges that fact.

I do not wish to be unfair, but if he got his way we would be talking about the use of guns by young persons of any age—they could be 11, or 12 or six or seven—depending on the supervision or the supervisor's choice. We need to be clear what we are talking about. We are not talking about any old gun; we are talking about section 1 rifles, some of which are extremely powerful.

The law at the moment is clear. The general proposition is that, without a section 1 certificate, one may not possess a section 1 firearm. That is subject to a number of provisos, most notably those contained in clause 11 of the principal Act. A person over the age of 14 may possess a firearms certificate. The ordinary procedure applies: the applicant applies to the chief constable. The application will have to be supported, or at least endorsed, by his parent or guardian. That is certainly the case for a shotgun application by a 15-year-old and I believe that it applies to an application for a section 1 certificate. The chief constable then has to determine whether to grant it, and, in the event of the chief constable refusing a certificate, there is a right of appeal to the court.

The argument that has been put forward is essentially twofold. First, there is the argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster to the effect that it is a proper method of providing instruction. The slightly different argument, which has also been touched on, is the desirability of allowing the occasional guest to use a ·22 for the purpose of shooting the odd rabbit in a field. I shall deal with the two arguments separately, because they are distinct.

The concept of training and instruction by a father on an estate implies at least reasonable continuity; otherwise, we are not really talking about training and instruction. If my hon. Friend is proposing to take his son out for training on a fairly regular basis, the proper thing to do is to apply for a firearms certificate. He may say, "I will never get one." I hope that he will forgive me if I say that if he does not obtain a certificate, it is because the chief constable and, ultimately, the courts, think that it is inappropriate to give him one. I am sceptical about the proposition that a young man who cannot obtain a certificate under the ordinary tests should be allowed, on a continuous basis, to use a section 1 gun because of the proviso we are contemplating introducing in new clause 11. That seems to be a serious lacuna in my hon. Friend's argument.

My hon. Friend the Member for Upminster is a highly responsible man and would most certainly provide close supervision over the activities of his son or, with more difficulty, over his godson. However, the amendment he has in mind does not provide for that high level of supervision. It provides for any old supervision, which might not necessarily be direct and precise supervision. The amendment to which my hon. Friend is addressing his remarks is designed to provide cover for continuous use in circumstances which may not be well controlled. We are dealing with section 1 guns, many of which are highly dangerous.

Mr. Bellingham: My hon. Friend is being a little unrealistic. We are talking not necessarily about continuous use but about lads who go on holiday to Scotland. The son of my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) will almost certainly receive his firearms certificate at the age of 15, but what about the punter who lives in a flat in a town? What chance does he have of obtaining a certificate?

Mr. Hogg: We have to look at the consequences. The new clause, as amended by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster, provides for continuing use. It may not always be continuing, but often it will be. My hon. Friend must ask whether that is what he is seeking to justify. As my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West said, no doubt my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster's son will obtain a certificate. However, he asked about people living in a town. If the chief constable refuses to issue a certificate because, in his view, the grounds are not met, and if that decision is supported by the court, we should not try to disturb the position in which an applicant fails on the primary grounds.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I should like to follow up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham). My hon. Friend the Minister is wrong when he talks about continuous use in the context of the stag. I am talking about people who go to Scotland for their summer holiday, not about year-round training. It is wrong to say that, because training is not continuous, it is not useful. I ask my hon. Friend to consider that point.

Mr. Hogg: That is not the case. We have to look at what can happen. My hon. Friend the Member for Upminster is suggesting that he should be able to provide training for his son. I understand that. Instruction implies a continuing process. It may happen over a number of years or over an extended period in one year. If that is what my hon. Friend is anxious to do—it is a respectable thing to do—he should apply for a firearms certificate on behalf of his son. His son can have a certificate as long as he is not under the age of 14.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Another great distinction between what my hon. Friend is saying should happen and what I am asking for is that I am asking for boys of 14 to 17 to have the right to borrow a rifle, not to possess it. There are plenty of occasions when it would be proper for a boy to borrow a gun, but I would be reluctant for that same child to have the right to possess one.

Mr. Hogg: I was about to come to that. I am concerned about the ad hoc use. We are talking about a powerful weapon. The provisions which govern the ad hoc use of shotguns are contained in section 11(5) of the Firearms Act 1968 and they are limited. I shrink from the idea of enabling a boy, on an ad hoc basis, to use a high-powered rifle. It may be that the supervision provided by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster would be wholly adequate—I am not trying to argue to the contrary—but he has to contemplate the possibility of many people doing the same thing under supervision which is much less precise.

We must look at consequences. We are dealing with high-powered rifles. For that reason, I cannot commend to the House an acceptance of the amendments, although they were moved with great skill and lucidity.

Amendment (a) to the Lords amendment negatived.

Lords amendment No. 11 agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 12 to 27 agreed to, some with special entry.

Broadcasting and Terrorism

Mr. Speaker: I have to tell the House that I have selected the amendment on the Order Paper.

6.47 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): I beg to move.

That this House approves the Home Secretary's action in giving directions to the BBC and IBA to restrict the broadcasting of statements by Northern Ireland terrorist organisations and their apologists.

On 19 October I told the House that I had issued directions to the BBC and the IBA requiring them to refrain from broadcasting statements by Northern Ireland terrorist organisations and their apologists. The imposition of any restrictions on broadcasting, however well justified, is a serious step. This step was taken only after long and careful consideration by the Government. It is because of the seriousness of the matter that I emphasised, when I made my statement, that the House should be given an early opportunity to debate, and I hope endorse, the action that we have taken.

Those who live by the bomb and the gun and those who support them cannot in all circumstances be accorded the same rights as the rest of the population. This is a principle that the House has accepted many times when passing legislation to give the police and the courts certain carefully limited but exceptional powers for the prevention of terrorism. The principle is contested by the Opposition, but I believe that it is accepted by the majority of our constituents. It is common sense. We shall soon be putting to Parliament new and stronger proposals that will bear particularly on the funds of terrorist organisations.

Those who practise and support terrorism and violence should not be allowed direct access to our radios and television screens. In a nutshell, that is what the Government's action is all about. The same conclusion was reached long ago by the Republic of Ireland, which imposed similiar restrictions.

One essential point about the effect of the notices that I issued deserves repeating. The notices do not restrict the secondhand reporting of events. Comparisons with the extensive reporting restrictions in countries such as South Africa are misleading, especially when they are made by members of the South African Government. The notices restrict only the direct access of members of these organisations and their supporters to the air waves. Their activities and the words they utter can still be reported, as they are, in the press, but we are denying them the ability to appear on television and thereby obtain a spurious authority and respectability. In the words of last week's Irish Independent,

"Sinn Fein are not being silenced . . . merely put in their place."

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I fail to understand why it is all right for someone's words to be reported by another individual but not for them to speak for themselves, unless the Government are frightened that Sinn Fein or Ulster Defence Association persons speaking for themselves would be more appealing and attractive than the Government want them to be. I cannot understand the logic of allowing the words to be reported but not allowing the originator of the words to use them in public.

Mr. Hurd: In that case, the hon. Lady will not agree with the notice, because it is based on the distinction between the reporting of events and words and the direct access of members of proscribed organisations, or those uttering words in support of them, to people's television screens in their living rooms. There is a clear distinction in reality, and I shall return to that point before I conclude.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): In view of my right hon. Friend's understandable comments about South Africa, and in the light of reports that other countries are queueing up at the doors of Her Majesty's Government to remove from our television screens people whom they regard as terrorists, would it not be appropriate at some stage for the Government to separate terrorist groups such as the IRA and ETA—which have access to the ballot, the freedom to live where they want in their own land and to stand for election—from legitimate freedom fighters who oppose state terrorism, such as the Palestine Liberation Organisation or the African National Congress, which have offices in London?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is trying to draw me on to ground on which I do not intend to tread today, although it is very interesting. These notices are and will remain confined to Northern Ireland organisations.

As the House knows, the notices that I have issued contain two exemptions—one for parliamentary proceedings and the other for statements made during an election. We were concerned not to take measures that might trench on parliamentary privilege. We must remember the position of broadcasters in relation to parliamentary matters. Under the licence and agreement, the BBC is charged with providing an impartial account, day by day, of proceedings in both Houses. It might be difficult for the corporation to carry out this requirement—especially with regard to debates on Northern Ireland—if restrictions were to apply to our proceedings.

A similar point applies to elections. Under the Broadcasting Act 1981, the IBA has a statutory duty to treat impartially matters of political or industrial controversy or current public policy. In the annex to its licence and agreement, the BBC has undertaken to fulfil a similar responsibility. We believe that it will be possible to carry out this requirement fully in everyday circumstances as the notices will not prevent the broadcasters from reporting indirectly the activities of the organisations concerned.

An election period is different. The ability of candidates and their supporters to make a personal appearance on radio or television is crucial to balancing the interests of political parties in obtaining access to the electorate. That, after all, is the basis of the broadcasting requirements under the Representation of the People Act 1983. The application of the restrictions during an election period would face the broadcasters with an insurmountable conflict between their legal duty to implement the notice and the legal requirements of impartial treatment of political controversy. Such a position would raise significant legal difficulties.

For those reasons, we decided that a candidate representing one of the organisations concerned and his supporters should be free to make personal appearances on radio and television during election time, provided—this is important—that their statements are made in support of the candidate and his constituency contest.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): I listen with amazement to what my right hon. Friend is saying. It is perfectly obvious that one tries to gain the support of a community for election to office over many weeks and months, not over a three-week election period. Does it not instantly put one party at a disadvantage to another, and is that a fair system?

Mr. Hurd: I do not agree with my hon. Friend. There are, as the law provides, special circumstances surrounding an election period. We are trying to prevent the broadcasting authorities being put in a position where they cannot carry out their responsibilities, as defined, during that period. In everyday circumstances—between elections—the notices will not prevent them from carrying out their duties.

In statements made soon after my announcement, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) seemed to beckon to Sinn Fein to take advantage of the exemption, which I have just mentioned, to make its case to the British people at the forthcoming Govan by-election. Indeed, he talked in the House about the near certainty of its doing so. In the event, it decided to ignore the right hon. Gentleman's invitation.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook) indicated dissent.

Mr. Hurd: The words "near certainty" were used.

Mr. Hattersley: The word to which I take exception is "invitation", not "near certainty". The idea that I was inviting Sinn Fein to do that is no doubt how the Home Secretary will conduct this debate—an alternative to argument being abuse.

Mr. Hurd: There is no abuse. The right hon. Gentleman dangled the prospect before Sinn Fein. That is precisely what he did, and his reaction following my announcement was to talk about "near certainty." It was widely reported in the press. If the right hon. Gentleman does not like the word "invitation," I shall substitute that he dangled the prospect before it, which is precisely what he did.

Sinn Fein decided to ignore that prospect. If press reports are right, it thought hard about it and decided against. Perhaps it was wise to do so. The same legal requirements that ensure an even-handed treatment of candidates by broadcasters at election time could not have given Sinn Fein the great publicity bonanza that the right hon. Gentleman might have envisaged. The same rules that make necessary the exemption would prevent it from gaining much advantage.

The right hon. Gentleman's prediction was not the only one that has so far proved false.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): Does the Secretary of State agree that the battle with those who espouse terrorism in the north of Ireland must be fought not in Govan, in this country or in the Republic of Ireland, but on the streets of Belfast and on the roads of places such as south Armagh, where I live? We can judge the restriction that the right hon. Gentleman has introduced only by the effect that it will have there, not by the effect that it will have anywhere else. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that this restriction is furthering, rather than restricting, the propaganda weapon that is used?

Mr. Hurd: I am coming to the hon. Gentleman's point, which is the core of the argument. Before doing that I was trying to deal with the points that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, rightly or wrongly, raised when he commented on my announcement.

All sorts of predictions have been made, not only the one made by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook. We read on good authority that the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) would be taking his seat, as if there were no requirement of an oath of affirmation or allegiance. We read that the "Any Questions" programme, on which the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) appeared in Antrim last week, would be disrupted, but she will confirm that that did not happen either.

To be fair, it is natural that there should be some anxiety and controversy at the start of such an arrangement—as there is, from time to time, in the Republic. There are some who, for reasons of their own, prefer to remain permanently confused about the scope of the notices. However, I believe that my announcement and the terms of the notices were as clear as we could make them.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I am worried about the way in which the right hon. Gentleman is presenting his argument. The point that he is missing, which is the core of the argument and forms the basis of our accusations against him, is that he is allowing the paramilitary groups in Northern Ireland to set the political agenda. Every discussion and every headline during the past few weeks has been about the paramilitaries. It is not a question of Govan or of Mr. Adams taking his seat. The point is that the right hon. Gentleman has allowed the paramilitaries to set the political agenda. That is why they have made the headlines, day in, day out, for the past two weeks.

Mr. Hurd: I agree that that is part of the core of the argument. I am trying to clear away points that have been raised and predictions that have been made—which, incidentally, have turned out to be quite false—before I deal with the core of the argument. I am trying to deal with detailed matters, and I shall then return to the principal concern, on which I feel just as strongly as the hon. Gentleman.

There will, of course, be occasions when the broadcasters, as now, have to use their judgment in deciding whether to include particular material in a programme. One such issue concerns the question whether a person is representing a named organisation at the time he appears on a programme. It is true that a member of an organisation cannot be held to represent it in all his daily activities. The key to the issue is the word "represent." When a councillor is speaking in Northern Ireland, it is not the subject about which he is talking that will decide whether his speech can be broadcast directly, but whether he is talking on behalf of one of the named organisations. —[Interruption.] I am trying to clarify a point that I think is now clear to all, other than to those who wish to remain permanently confused.

As the director of Radio 4 made clear this morning—although he did not like it—a Sinn Fein councillor speaking about council matters on behalf of his group will not be allowed direct access. There will be borderline cases where that distinction will require careful judgment, just as the broadcasters had to exercise careful judgment under the previous arrangement. However, in practice I do not believe that the decision will be too difficult in the vast majority of cases.

In the reactions during the days——

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The Home Secretary, in his statement on 19 October, said that he had no criticism as such of the broadcasting authorities. If he does not believe that they have gone out of their way to interview spokesmen for those who argue for and justify terrorism, why does he not leave these matters to their editorial judgment?

Mr. Hurd: We did, of course, consider that, but we thought it more sensible and honest for the Government to bring forward and to take responsibility for this measure. That is what we have done. I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman. If we had simply said to the broadcasters, "We want you to exercise your judgment, albeit very difficult" and had not brought the matter before the House, would that have been a better way to achieve the objective? It would not. The way in which we are handling the matter —including this debate, during which various views will be expressed, and not all of them in support of the Government—is a much more straightforward way of setting about matters.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I apologise for not being in the Chamber for the first few minutes of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. He mentioned borderline cases and how comparatively easy it would be to solve them. Did the Government consider introducing a change in the law to deal with these matters? The passing of this motion will have no effect on the law in Ireland or anywhere else. The Government have sought to deal with these matters by Home Secretary edict, backed by a motion that will have no binding effect in the courts. Did the Government not think that the appropriate method would be to change the law of the land to deal with such a departure from free rights and free speech?

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman is contradicting his hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), who suggested that we should have handled the matter in a roundabout way and relied on the broadcasters to use their judgement to achieve the same effect. I carefully read what Lord Scarman said, as, no doubt, did the right hon. Gentleman. I do not believe that there is a serious question about the legal basis of the notices. That being so, it would have been deeply quixotic to have proceeded in any other way. There is precedent and there is the law.

Mr. Mallon rose——

Mr. Hurd: I have already given way once to the hon. Gentleman. I should like to continue my speech.

In the reactions during the days following my announcement, there were some who felt, as the Opposition do, that the Government had gone too far, and there were others who felt that we had not gone far enough. Opposition Members continue to claim that this is a major incursion upon the right of freedom of expression. As I have made clear tonight, that cannot be so because broadcasters remain free to report the activities of those organisations and the actual words used by their representatives. Some of my hon. Friends and Members on the Unionist Benches have argued that the right even to report statements by those organisations should be restricted. That would be going too far. There is the obvious case of the aftermath of a terrorist outrage when it is essential, as a matter of public information, that any admission of responsibility by a terrorist group be fully reported.

Some of my hon. Friends and Unionist Members would like the Government to proscribe Sinn Fein. As they know, we believe that proscription is a fitting measure only for organisations that are actively and primarily involved in terrorism. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has frequently pointed out, the status of Sinn Fein and the UDA is kept carefully under review by the Government. There has been criticism, and it will continue, from those two extremes—one saying that we have gone too far and the other that we have not gone far enough. I believe that, both inside and outside the House, the balance that we have struck will achieve wide general support.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): My right hon. Friend is obviously aware that his announcement received a very bad press in America. Does he agree that it is imperative to stress that the Republic of Ireland has had such restrictions since 1960?

Mr. Hurd: I was about to make that point.

I wish to pick up something that I heard the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) say before I made my announcement, but following press reports of what it was thought I would say. He put the greatest stress on the need for even-handedness. He criticised our proposal mainly because he thought that it did not include the UDA and the UVF. I cannot say that we took his advice because it had always been absolutely clear to us that the proposal would have to be even-handed. It is, and I hope that when he replies to the debate he will be fair enough to temper his views accordingly.

Always on these occasions—as has happened with interruptions this evening—the argument is that by depriving the IRA of one weapon we are actually giving it another and bigger one——

Mr. Winnick: Precisely.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman confirms that point. It is argued that we are giving the IRA a propaganda advantage across the world that will outweigh the disadvantage of being shut out of our own television screens. That argument deserves rather closer dissection than it usually gets. An Irish-American or an Irish-Australian who is already sympathetic to the IRA will not have his opinions changed, one way or the other, by this proposal. An Irish-American or an Irish-Australian, who is naturally, temperamentally and intellectually sympathetic to the Fianna Fail or Fine Gael parties in the Republic, will not go through some great anti-British convulsion because we are practising what the Governments of both those parties have practised in the Republic for many years past. I suggest that he is more likely simply to be surprised to learn that we have not, for years past, been doing the same as the Dublin Government.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): What will the Irish-American citizen say when he reads that the British Government are abandoning the first amendment to the American constitution?

Mr. Hurd: I have never supposed that we were subject to the first amendment to the American constitution. The hon. Gentleman has not begun to answer my point, which was a clear answer to many of the criticisms that have been made.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hurd: I shall conclude my remarks soon, but I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Alton: I welcome what the right hon. Gentleman has said this evening. It is proper that we should bring our law into line with that of the Irish Republic. Does he agree that security and justice run hand in hand? While we are right to bring our security laws into line with those of the Irish Republic, our laws concerning justice and the way in which we administer it in Northern Ireland through the Diplock courts should also be brought into line with the law of the Irish Republic by replacing those courts with three sitting judges.

Mr. Hurd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has constantly kept the matter under review, as, of course, I did, but from time to time he has given his decisions and beliefs on that point. I had hoped that the hon. Gentleman would say what he did say in the first part of his intervention, and I am grateful for the support from the Opposition parties that it conveyed.

I refer now to what I regard as the core of the matter. Particularly since the outrage at Enniskillen a year ago and the renewed intensity of the terrorist campaign, I have several times thought how difficult it is for us in this House to understand not the facts, which are clear enough, but the emotions produced by such events in that part of our country. Right hon. and hon. Members who represent Northern Ireland do what they can from their different viewpoints to enlighten us, but they would be the first to admit that there is a barrier to overcome. The words they use, the way they put things, and their occasional intense preoccupation with ancient rivalries may sometimes lead us on this side of the water to forget how real and intense are the anxieties that they are seeking to convey to us. But we must not allow ourselves that luxury of forgetfulness.

It seems to me that, in recent months, two such anxieties have come to the fore with a new intensity. The first is the anxiety that so many guilty terrorists escape conviction or, if convicted, spend too little time in prison. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is, of course, fully aware of these concerns. His proposal to allow courts to draw certain inferences from an accused who insists on remaining silent makes clear his understanding of that point. I do not want to go further into that matter, because it is his business, not mine.

The second anxiety is the one that we are discussing today. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) will recognise this point from his time in the Army. When there is a terrorist attack and television screens carry to mourning people pictures of tears and bloodshed, it is hard for us on this side of the water to understand the outrage that is felt when, soon afterwards, there can appear on the same screens, particularly in Northern Ireland, people who, just keeping on the right side of the law, justify and glory in what has been done and threaten more of it. That is the difference between direct access and the report. It is not surprising that a member of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, a member of the UDR, or any law-abiding citizen of the Province finds it hard to understand how we can be wholly serious in our efforts against terrorism if that kind of triumphalism is acceptable.

But there is more to it than that. It is not simply that people are affronted—we can live with affront—by the direct access of men of violence and supporters of violence to television and radio. That direct access gives those who use it an air and appearance of authority which spreads further outwards the ripple of fear that terrorist acts create in the community. The terrorist act creates the fear and the direct broadcast spreads it. The men of violence and their supporters have used this access with skill. They hope not to persuade—this is where we get into the cosy luxury of discussion which is unreal—but to frighten. So far from being outlaws hunted by the forces of law and order and pursued by the courts, they calmly appear on the screen and, thus, in the homes of their victims and the friends and neighbours of their victims. We are dealing not just with statements that are offensive, but with the use of the media to deliver indirect threats. We owe the people of Northern Ireland the effort of imagination that enables us to understand what that experience is like and to understand how the fight against terrorism is hindered by it.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Does the right hon. Gentleman's argument not presuppose that the case of the IRA is so powerful, that people's attachment to democracy is so weak and that our abhorrence of violence is so inadequate that such an argument being put forward on television can bring us all to our knees? If that is the case, why did the right hon. Gentleman not do something about it over these last 10 years?

Mr. Hurd: There speaks the English broadcaster. There speaks the person who thinks that broadcasting and television are just a matter of whether or not one persuades. We are not talking about that; we are talking about fear and the creation of fear. The hon. Gentleman may disagree with the argument, but he clearly was not listening to it. His intervention was unreal.

All those who know Northern Ireland, whatever their opinions, respect the integrity and wisdom—as I learnt to do—of Dr. Robin Eames, Archbishop and Primate of the Church of Ireland. On the evening of my announcement, Dr. Eames said:

> "Sinn Fein have made no secret of the fact that they are in favour of the armed struggle. I have to represent at times those who are the objects of that armed struggle and I know what they've suffered. We know where they—the terrorists—stand. Is any good going to come from people who've suffered so much being subjected to more of their propaganda?"

I hope that no one in this House will scorn or neglect that expression of feeling.

Of course, this decision will not by itself solve the problem or defeat the terrorist. If that is a criticism, it is something that we accept. As my right hon. Friend has constantly made clear, no single measure is going to defeat the Provisional IRA or, indeed, the Protestant paramilitaries. We are deliberately not announcing a package of measures, but reaching and implementing decisions one by one, as we review the whole range of issues and possibilities that can further help protect a free democratic society from the evil of terrorism and its associates. This is a serious decision, and we shall keep its operation under careful review, but I am satisfied that it is needed, and I have no hesitation in commending the motion to the House.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): I beg to move, to leave out from 'House' to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

'reaffirming its determination to defeat terrorism in Northern Ireland, refuses to support the Government's restrictions on broadcasting and broadcasters, believing those restrictions to be incompatible with a free society and likely to assist rather than frustrate the terrorists by providing them with the opportunity to argue that the Government will not allow the wide expression of opinion which is essential to democratic debate and peaceful change.'.

I am not in the least surprised that the Home Secretary should have made the accusation about the Opposition in general and about me in particular encouraging Sinn Fein to participate in English by-elections. Such allegations are an alternative to thought and argument and an option that is far easier than defending what the Government propose on its dubious merits. That sort of allegation is typical also of the Government's dangerous arrogance. One of the Government's least attractive characteristics is their belief that, in all matters affecting security, anyone who disagrees with their judgment or criticises their record is acting against the national interest.

Let me make it clear at the beginning of the debate that I and my right hon. and hon. Friends do not propose to take any lessons in standing out against terrorism from the Government who gave free passage out of this country to the murderers of WPC Fletcher, rather than risk a row with Libya; nor do we propose to take lectures on defeating terrorism on the premise that what the Home Secretary now proposes will make the smallest contribution to the destruction of terrorism and the defeat of terrorists in Northern Ireland.

The argument is not about whether something that will help in a mutually accepted cause will work and whether it should be applied, but about the merits of it, even on the basis of what the Home Secretary said.

Anyone who for a moment believed that the IRA might even be inconvenienced by the broadcasting ban which the Home Secretary now proposes must have been absolutely disillusioned by the demonstration of the results of that ban on "The Media Programme" on Channel 4 on Sunday. I remind the Home Secretary what happened. A Sinn Fein councillor was interviewed on the effects of the ban. There was some understandable disagreement among lawyers whether the interview could be legally broadcast since the proscription is so imprecise that the Government cannot define its boundaries. In the end, the IBA advised against the interview being broadcast and the programme makers, perfectly legally, showed pictures of the interview without the original sound and dubbed the Sinn Fein councillor's voice with the voice of a commentator or actress. To the casual viewer, the interview was in no way different from one where the actual voice was employed. Anyone turning on the broadcast two seconds after it had begun would have assumed that he was seeing the literal interview. I cannot see what damage is done to terrorism and terrorists in Northern Ireland by the Government making themselves look ridiculous by imposing that sort of meaningless and pointless restriction on broadcasters.

Apologists for this restriction attempt to justify it with two assertions which originally appeared in the Home Secretary's statement and which I shall quote exactly as he made them. First, broadcasts by representatives and supporters of terrorist organisations cause "widespread offence to listeners and viewers."

Secondly, terrorists

"draw support and sustenance from access to radio and television."—[Official Report, 19 October 1988; Vol. 138, c. 885.]

Those two distinct arguments are not incompatible, but they are separate claims and must be justified separately. Too often—the Home Secretary did it again today—the allegations that the IRA and UDA will be helped rather than harmed by the ban is countered with arguments about causing public offence. Concern about banning broadcasts because they cause offence is greeted with claims that at least it will defeat the IRA. I propose to examine individually the two distinct reasons given for limiting broadcasters' freedom—public offence and the defeat of terrorism.

I do not doubt for a moment that the sight of a supporter of the IRA justifying a bomb outrage is offensive to most British people. It is offensive to me. The bogus apologies and hypocritical statements of regret are more offensive still. But the question we must answer is not whether that causes offence—undoubtedly it does—but whether in a free society causing gross and justifiable offence is sufficient reason for limiting the broadcasters' right to broadcast.

If the Home Secretary has any doubts about how steep and slippery is the slope at the top of which he stands, he has only to ask the BBC for transcripts of the phone-in programmes of the past 10 days about his restrictions. His many supporters were virtually unanimous on one point: they found IRA spokesmen offensive and did not wish to see or hear them. But that was only the beginning. They went on to list other individuals and organisations which they found equally offensive and which they believed should also be proscribed and prohibited. If the Home Secretary has not been given the information about these supporters of his, for who, I suspect, he has little time, and who no doubt cause him a great deal of embarrassment, he has only to consider the question asked by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley). I do not know whether his question, which received no answer, was asking for an extension or pointing to the logic of the Home Secretary's position, but either way he was saying that, once such a ban is started, there is no way of knowing how far it will go or where it will lead.

The criterion of causing widespread offence to viewers and listeners is dangerously subjective. It is only necessary to ask some questions which follow from its application to see how great a contagion it can cause. Is anything which causes widespread offence to be banned? If not, who decides within that category what widespread offence should be banned and what should not be banned? How is widespread offence to be measured? Widespread offence is a meaningless concept. It is one of those catch-all omnibus, all-embracing criteria which suit the convenience of authoritarian Governments. It is the sort of criterion which should not be used in a free society. I have no doubt that in Eastern Europe and South America there are all sorts of prohibitions on broadcasters, broadcasts and newspapers because widespread offence would be caused. Widespread offence, although I feel it in this particular, is not an adequate excuse for censorship in a free society.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to explain why, early in 1977, the then Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, at a dinner in Stormont, called for a ban on terrorist interviews and went so far as to say that the BBC's treatment of Northern Ireland news was sometimes ill advised to the point of disloyalty? How does he square his comments with those of that Labour Secretary of State for Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hattersley: In two ways. First, in that particular, my right hon. and noble Friend to whom the hon. Gentleman referred was simply wrong. More important, he was so wrong that he did not put it to the Cabinet, of which he, some hon. Friends and I were members. If he had, he would have received the same sort of reaction from the overwhelming majority that I am trying to describe this evening—that banning the expression of a view because it causes widespread offence should not be acceptable in a free society, no matter how genuine the offence or how much offence is caused.

In a free society, limitations should be imposed on broadcasts and broadcasters when, and only when—[Interruption.] I see that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is congratulating his hon. Friend on making that point. He said, "Well done." [Interruption.] He was just having a little chat. Perhaps he would like to consider the next point.

In a free society, limitations should be imposed on broadcasts and broadcasters when, and only when, it can be conclusively demonstrated that real and desperate damage would be done to members of that society if the restriction were not imposed. We can all think of occasions when prohibitions might be necessary. Usually in such circumstances—a recent kidnapping case is an example—broadcasters apply self-restraint. But a ban should be imposed only when damage to society is substantial and certain and can be demonstrated. Certainly no such case can be made for what the Government now intend. The evidence suggests that the ban will help rather than harm the terrorists' cause.

During the whole of this year, independent television has broadcast four minutes of interviews with supporters and associates of Sinn Fein. Some three minutes 59 seconds of those interviews were highly critical, in that the interviewer demanded to know of Sinn Fein how it could even attempt to justify the horrors and enormities for which the IRA was responsible. The total amount of interviewing time was less than four minutes. Some of the material might have been screened twice—on both the early news and ten o'clock news, but four minutes of new material was the total in a year. How much assistance does the Home Secretary think those four minutes gave the IRA? If he thinks that it might be significant, he will be appalled to learn that, thanks to the ban which he introduced two weeks ago, three or four times as much broadcasting time on Independent Television News has been devoted to discussing and describing the IRA and sometimes even defending it. That is a direct result of what the Home Secretary has introduced.

Naturally, that has been broadcast in reported speech. The Home Secretary seems to believe that there is something peculiarly attractive to potential IRA recruits in seeing the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) speak straight into the camera. I find that impossible to believe. The overwhelming probability is that his restrictions will make Sinn Fein more attractive to the weak-minded viewers than it was two weeks ago. Its ghastly, fawning apologies and its craven justifications will not be broadcast directly, so television interviewers will not be able to challenge it. However, from time to time, when there is a bomb outrage, its hideous sentiments will be quoted in reported speech. I have no doubt that its opinions will be insinuated into broadcasts through surrogates, denying Sinn Fein membership but expressing the views of Sinn Fein.

The potential gain—even for those who accept the implication of the Prime Minister's cliché about the oxygen of publicity—is miniscule. The potential loss is enormous. I ask the Home Secretary this directly: does he believe that Noraid has missed the opportunity to tell Irish Americans that the president of NBC News said on British television and radio last week that Britain is now the only Western democracy with broadcasting censorship? Does he believe that broadcasting that opinion, right or wrong, in the United States will help or hinder Noraid?

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): What about Ireland?

Mr. Hattersley: If the hon. Gentleman wants to shout, "What about Ireland?", it is for him to answer the point, but he will struggle to understand it if I repeat it to him. The fact is that it is the president of NBC News who made that point.

I ask the Home Secretary again: does he not believe that Noraid is even now flooding Irish-American areas of America with the NBC president's judgment that we have introduced censorship? Does he believe that that has been enormously helpful to his cause?

I ask the Home Secretary a second question: does he not believe that the republican areas in Northern Ireland will be equally flooded with leaflets quoting Mr. P. W. Botha's endorsement of the Government's new controls over broadcasting, and emphasising the South African president's opinion that the Home Secretary's suppression of press freedom in Britain justifies the suppression of press freedom in South Africa? Does he think that Mr. Botha's views are being spread in republican areas, and, if so, is that helping our fight against the IRA or hindering it?

The important point is not the damage caused to Britain's international reputation, great though that is, or the harm that the Government's justification of the prohibition has done to our standing in the world, but the help that their action has provided to the terrorists, who are able to exploit in every possible way the pointless action that was taken two weeks ago. They have been presented with the opportunity to argue that the weapons of political debate and democratic success have been denied them; in consequence, they have been offered the opportunity to argue that what they choose to call the armed struggle is the only way in which they can advance their cause. The damage that the Government are doing to the fight against terrorism must not be obscured by the clear absurdity of their actions. All the analyses of how this ban will work show that prohibition is a joke—but it is a bad and dangerous joke, and one which will damage the cause that the Home Secretary pretends to be pursuing.

The extent of the absurdity can be measured by the confusion about what can and cannot be broadcast. I remind the Home Secretary of the procedure used to notify the broadcasters of the true position. Quite properly, the BBC was told of the Home Secretary's proposals the night before he announced them to the House. I understand that they became effective at the moment of his announcement, and the BBC and the IBA had to prepare themselves for their instant application. The BBC was told the previous night, and it took legal advice. Two independent sources agreed on the areas which the proposals covered. In his statement, the Home Secretary interpreted his order far more liberally than the BBC's lawyers—one house lawyer and one independent lawyer—believed to be the case.

The BBC's lawyers were again consulted. They reminded the BBC that the law is not what the Home Secretary announced in the House of Commons, but what the courts decide. They had no doubt that the order was a great deal more repressive, shall I say, and comprehensive than the Home Secretary had made out. Meetings were held between the Home Office and the BBC. The BBC continued to argue that the Home Secretary's representation of the law was more liberal than the law allowed.

After a further meeting, the Government agreed to send out a further document, which amended the scope of the original words and ensured that the law would be applied in the way in which the Home Secretary had apparently believed was already embodied in the words. That document contains this paragraph:

"Whether at any particular instance he"— in his letters and regulations, the Home Secretary does not consider the possibility that women may be involved in such matters—

"is representing the organisation concerned will depend upon the nature of the words spoken and the particular context. Where he is speaking in a personal capacity or purely in his capacity as a member of an organisation which does not fall under the Notice (for example, an elected Council), it follows, from that interpretation, that paragraph 1(a)"— that is the prohibiting paragraph—

"will not apply."

As a result of that clarification, the BBC now believes that Sinn Fein councillors can broadcast as councillors, as distinct from being members of Sinn Fein. It is therefore possible for them to give interviews on exclusively local authority matters. In short, the fears of the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) are justified. Sinn Fein will be allowed to represent itself as the caring guardian of local interests, but it will not be cross-examined on its support for terrorism.

Notwithstanding that, and the helpful Home Office advice concerning Sinn Fein broadcasts about butterfly collecting, the IBA and the BBC still regard the order as so imprecise that they are not sure what can and cannot be broadcast over wide areas. As I understand it, they are known in the trade as grey areas. I have no doubt that, sooner or later, the BBC or IBA will be forced to test those grey areas in court.

Mr. Mallon: The right hon. Gentleman has done a service to the House by highlighting that anomaly. It is one of the confusions that the Secretaryof State has referred to. If, on a Tuesday, Sean Bloggs makes a statement as a member of Armagh council, that, in effect, in law can be covered by TV and radio. If on a Thursday, as a spokesman for Sinn Fein, Sean Bloggs makes the same statement, it cannot be broadcast. Is that not the essence of the confusion and ambiguity that exists?

Mr. Hattersley: The hon. Gentleman's point is obviously, and dangerously, right.

I discussed with the BBC some of the possible ambiguities. It gave me an example yesterday of a great fire occurring in the centre of Belfast in which a number of people were killed. An eye witness to the fire was a councillor, who was also a Sinn Fein councillor. That eye witness account could be broadcast if the fire had not been caused by the IRA. It certainly could not be broadcast if it were caused by the IRA. The BBC does not know how it would proceed if no one knew how the fire had been caused. There is no way that one can describe this situation without realising the nonsense of the Home Secretary's position and the disrepute into which he brings the Government.

Mr. Hurd indicated dissent.

Mr. Hattersley: Although the Home Secretary now shakes his head, the Government concede that the guidelines are confused and contradictory. I believe that they know that, sooner or later, they will be tested in court, because I had the pleasure of watching the Minister of State being asked on television last Sunday what broadcasters should do when they are confronted with those so-called grey areas.

Of course, the Minister of State's answer was fatuous, but it was also terrifyingly revealing about the Government's view of press and broadcasting in a free society. He said that, before broadcasting a programme on Northern Ireland, directors and producers should telephone the Home Office and ask, "Is this covered by your restriction, or not?" No free broadcaster in a free society, in preparing a broadcast, would or should want to phone the Ministry of the Interior and ask whether the item was acceptable for transmission to the general public. I am assured that broadcasters, from both independent television and the BBC, simply will not accept such a regime.

The idea that broadcasters should have to ask the Government's permission before they transmit news and current affairs programmes is unacceptable in a free society. It is what we always believed happened in countries that do not enjoy our traditional liberties. Broadcasters must make their own decisions about what is right under the law. Under such a Government as this, the Home Office cannot be trusted to interpret the law, especially since, on the evidence of its advice on classification and further reclassification, it has no idea how far the law extends and what it covers.

Any accurate account of what the Government propose —a restriction on free broadcasting, which is confused and ill defined, which cannot harm the terrorists and probably will help them, which enables Mr. P. W. Botha to compare his regime to our democracy and which would not be constitutionally acceptable in other democracies—leaves unanswered a crucial question: what are the Government's real motives in pursuing so indefensible a policy? Why do they humiliate themselves and damage the interests of the country for no tangible gain? I believe that the folly has two causes.

The first cause is the Prime Minister's authoritarian instinct—the mindless reflex that automatically wishes to suppress and extinguish those views that she finds objectionable, whatever the real cost. We all recall the careful leaks that described the Prime Minister's outrage at a specific broadcast. Whether it was wise and right to retaliate is not the sort of consideration on which the Prime Minister spends much time. The IRA is assisted and our liberties are damaged because the Prime Minister was offended by the broadcasters' judgment over a single programme. On such an occasion as that, the Prime Minister is almost as contemptuous of our liberties as she is of her Cabinet colleagues.

The second reason why we are presented with this example of the authoritarian and the absurd combining in a single policy is the Government's hope to create the illusion of activity. Part of the tragedy of Northern Ireland is that there is no quick, easy or certain solution. One of the burdens borne by every Government, certainly by this Government, is the demand, especially from the less responsible newspapers, for them to take new initiatives. The call to do something is rarely accompanied by descriptions of what that something should be. That was the unthinking response by some newspapers to the horrors perpetrated in the summer. Of course, the Government responded with promises that something would be done when they were not sure what that something would be.

For a Government faced with the agonising responsibilities of Northern Ireland, which I in no way diminish, there are only two possibilities. One is capitulation, which is as unacceptable to the Opposition as it is to the Government. The other is holding fast and steering a steady course—defeating terrorism under the law, refusing absolutely to copy the conduct of the terrorists and carefully avoiding any risk of being represented as the enemy of the liberty that the Government aim to defend. That steady course must be built on a real determination to understand and rectify real grievances. It will not be helped by the suppression of free broadcasting, and it will not be helped by gimmicks.

The suppression of free broadcasing will not even placate the Government's mindless critics, the people who demand tough action without even considering its morality or its real effects. Meanwhile, the terrorists will see the Government thrashing about and will take pleasure and comfort from the absurdity of the Government's position.

We regret that the Government have behaved so foolishly. We shall not endorse their foolishness. We shall vote for our amendment.

7.44 pm

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) seriously misrepresented what the Government are seeking to do. He suggested that a form of censorship is to be imposed on the reporting of what the terrorist organisations in Northern Ireland do merely because they are to be denied the ability to appear on television or to have their words broadcast. I do not remember which way the right hon. Gentleman voted when we debated whether proceedings in the House should be televised——

Mr. Hattersley: For.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: That makes my point for me. One of the arguments that first persuaded us to let the broadcasters into the Chamber, and subsequently to make it possible in the near future to have the televisers, was the argument that simply to report the House of Commons was to deny it the place that it should have in the centre of our society, and that only by bringing the cameras into the Chamber could one give it an immediacy and impact on the country overall that would return to it that pride of place that all of us seem to believe it should have. If one holds that argument about this place, I do not see how it is possible to argue, as the right hon. Gentleman did, that to deny broadcasting and television to the terrorist will not inevitably reduce his ability to have an impact on the audience that he would wish to persuade.

I should like to jog back a few years, to an evening when, in one of the television rooms in the House, I was watching a programme about Northern Ireland, its politics and the terrorism that has beset it. Sitting beside me was Mr. Don Concannon, the former Member for Mansfield, who was a distinguished Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office. The programme started with a long shot over a derelict part of Belfast and, taken with the commentary, gave the impression that the dereliction had been the result of IRA bombing, so much so that Concannon exclaimed, "Why do they do it?" and I found myself in complete agreement with his sentiment.

The pictures that we had been watching and the commentary that we had been listening to gave the impression that that dereliction was the result of the IRA's activities, when in fact it was the result of the bulldozers clearing away some of the bad housing that has beset Belfast for so long to make way for new. But those who did not know Belfast as well as I do would not have been able to make that judgment. They would have concluded from that shot and that commentary that the dereliction showed the death and destruction on a gigantic scale that the IRA had been able to wreak in the capital of Northern Ireland.

Ms. Short: The hon. Gentleman's story is extremely worrying. He is talking not about a representative of the UDA of Sinn Fein speaking on television, but about what he claims was a misrepresentation of a scene of dereliction, as if that too should be banned. Is that his logic, and does he intend to control all programmes that are made about Northern Ireland?

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: With the greatest respect to the hon. Lady, I have just started my speech. I am sure that she would like me to encompass everything that I have to say in 30 seconds so that she can make her speech, but I am afraid that she must bear with me, as I want to develop the point that I am making.

I was referring to the reaction of a former Minister with responsibility for Northern Ireland and my own reaction as someone who has taken an interest in the affairs of that troubled Province. Our reaction was, "Why do they do it?" Why do the television people think that they can put on a programme of that kind and expect their audience to understand what had caused that dereliction? Or had they some other purpose? No doubt the companies concerned would say that they used the shot merely as a means of tracking in at the beginning of their film. But that shot, like so much else, raises yet again the question, "Why do they do it?" Why, in 1979, did the BBC make a film featuring a supposed IRA roadblock at Carrickmore? Fortunately, that film was never shown because its existence became known before it could be put out, but why did people at the BBC even think it worth creating such a film? Why did they think that their audience was longing to see the programme, "Real Lives—the Edge of the Union", which gave Martin McGuinness and the IRA such a good opportunity for television coverage? Having seen the programme, was anyone any clearer about the problems of Northern Ireland? Did it help our understanding in any way?

Ms. Short: Yes.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: I am glad that the hon. Lady can say that she gained something from that programme, because I certainly did not.

When the then Home Secretary suggested that the programme should not be shown because of its propaganda value to the IRA and the governors of the BBC agreed with that view, there was a walkout—presumably to prove that neither the Government's concern nor the wishes of the board of governors cut much ice with the news staff. Like my earlier examples, that again prompts the question, "Why do they do it?" If one believed in a conspiracy theory, one might suggest that there are those in the media who are politically prejudiced in favour of the goals that the IRA claims to have set for itself—a united, extreme Socialist Ireland by way of the bullet and the ballot box. But I acquit them of that charge —I do not think that that is the real reason.

I believe that the television and broadcasting people, like the media generally, have a blind belief in what is called the freedom of the press, and that ideal transcends any other consideration. It also colours the Opposition amendment today. To the media, the concept of the freedom of the press represents an absolute right to report or interview whomsoever they wish, regardless of the values that that person may hold and be known to hold. Because they allow that ideal to dominate their thoughts, they refuse to recognise the validity of any arguments that suggest that they should limit their reporting operations. Their defence is the argument that anything that prevents full media coverage is by definition a threat to democracy. As a former journalist, that is where I part company from them.

At the end of the day, a journalist, no more or less than any other citizen, enjoys his or her freedom to work because the Government of the day maintain the laws without which a free society cannot protect the rights of its people. If the media think that they can be equivocal about supporting parliamentary democracy and the rule of law, they deceive themselves, and probably their viewers and readers as well. The IRA has made no secret of its belief in the Armalite and the ballot box. It has placed itself outside the law with its campaign of murder, shootings, bombings and violence and its willingness to admit who the latest victim is. It uses every opportunity provided by an over-willing press to show off, whether it be the volley at the graveside, the funeral oration by the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams), or the flowers left to mark the place where members of the active service unit lost their lives in Gibraltar. The IRA has used the media with a flare for public relations that must make professional PR men green with envy.

Mr. Marlow: The media would have us believe that their concern is to give us as much information as possible, but what they are really about is providing entertainment, and when they use the concept of freedom of speech in pursuit of their activities they are really concerned about improving their ratings. Sadly, when they are chasing an audience they have no concern whatever for the propaganda benefits to the IRA and the suffering so callously caused to the victims and their relations. Is that not the root of the problem? The media say one thing, but the reality is totally different.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: The paradox of that list of opportunities that the IRA have exploited is the same media's coverage of the remembrance day explosion at Enniskillen or the death of the young light infantrymen in their bus. The media will be there to show us pictures of the latest victims of terrorism, their funerals, the sobbing widow and the mourners and to report the words of the minister or priest at the end of the service. They see nothing incongruous in their open-mindedness and their unwillingness to make any difference between those who openly flout the law and those who have lost their lives trying to uphold it.

Mr. Mallon: The hon. Gentleman mentioned Enniskillen. Apart from the statements of Gordon Wilson and the sentiments that he expressed, which none of us will ever forget, surely the most effective thing at that time was the way in which good journalism took apart the chairman of Fermanagh council, the spokesman for Sinn Fein, laying bare its whole philosophy and approach. That was the most destructive element for Sinn Fein, but it could not have happened if that man had not been allowed to present his views on television and subject himself to good television journalism, which can achieve more than a thousand words spoken here.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is right, but I do not remember that interview, although the words of Marie Wilson will remain in many of our minds for a long time to come.

Those who run the media argue that they are impartial observers reporting events in Northern Ireland as they happen, but can a free press in a parliamentary democracy be impartial as between the forces of law and order defending that democracy and the terrorists who have rejected the parliamentary process in favour of the gun to win support for their cause? Despite the proposed restrictions, if the hon. Member for Belfast, West chose to take his place in the Chamber today, he could take part in this debate and his words would be broadcast throughout the country, but he has turned his back on this the Mother of Parliaments, and on this democracy because he wishes to pull it down. It is no use arguing that what he stands for and what our parliamentary democracy stands for are the same thing. If the media claim to be impartial in the way that they believe they can, are they not in reality giving licence to the terrorist and a spurious respectability to the dreadful and lawless means that the terrorist has chosen to achieve his ends?

That is why I welcome the limitation, mild though it is, that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has imposed on interviews and live coverage of the IRA, the UDA and the UVF. It comes not a moment too soon and provokes the following thought. Instead of railing against it, should not those responsible for the BBC and IBA be asking themselves why they did not voluntarily impose some restraint along the same lines? I questioned the chairman of the BBC, Marmaduke Hussey, in a letter about the recent programme "Spotlight" dealing with the killings in Gibraltar before the inquest was held there and asked why it had been shown only in Northern Ireland. He replied on 3 June 1988 as follows:

"The BBC's motives in making the 'Spotlight' programme were straightforward. The aim was not to influence public opinion but to inform it."

He continued:

"And far from being insensitive to the audience in Northern Ireland, the showing of the 'Spotlight' programme was in fact a response to the considerable interest shown in the Province in the Gibraltar events."

I was sufficiently interested in his reply to write to the controller of the BBC in Northern Ireland about the response to the killings in Gibraltar. On 21 June, 18 days after the chairman's letter, Dr. Colin Morris wrote:

"We had 70 telephone calls before the programme protesting; the majority of which were hostile to the programme's intention. About 10 per cent. were in favour of the programme being shown. We had eight letters from viewers. Seven against the programme and one in its favour."

I have to conclude from those letters that Mr. Hussey was wrongly informed by whoever drafted his letter for him, but this underlines the BBC's blindness to anything but its judgment on these matters.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend agree that this saga goes way back—back even to the late 1960s? Does he agree also that the basis on which the letter was written probably has a great deal to do with the principles that were enunciated by Mr. Richard Francis, who had responsibility for current affairs before he left the BBC recently? Does my hon. Friend agree that the essential point that lies at the root of what my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has done, and what is right, is that we must ensure that the basis on which these matters are dealt with now is not the same as the basis on which the BBC has been running these things for the past 20 years?

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: I agree with my hon. Friend.

I wrote also to Lord Thomson of Monifieth, chairman of the Independent Broadcasting Authority, about the programme "Death on the Rock" which inspired so much controversy about the killings in Gibraltar. I asked him why the programme had been broadcast before the inquest. In his reply on 25 May 1988, he wrote:

"The issues as we see them relate to free speech and free enquiry which underpin individual liberty and the rule of law in a democracy. The right of broadcasters and the press to examine events of major public concern is well established and should be preserved."

He continued:

"The Thames programme uncovered new evidence and potential witnesses who might otherwise have been unavailable to the inquest. This must surely be a contribution to the cause of justice and the rule of law."

We now know that "Death on the Rock", which cast doubt on the activities of the security forces and the SAS, raised questions about whether there was a "shoot to kill" policy and generally inflamed passions, was shot full of inaccuracies, so much so that the IBA has set up an inquiry into how the programme was made and how those statements were put out.

I am glad that an inquiry has been set up. The letters from Mr. Hussey, the controller of the BBC in Northern Ireland and Lord Thomson highlight the blunders which the BBC and IBA have made just this year. After all the violence in Northern Ireland, which has lasted for 20 years, it is time that they considered the way in which they cover events in the Province, whether they are informing the democracy about the true problems of Northern Ireland and the causes of dissension between its people, or whether, as has been suggested, they focus too much on the acts of violence, which catch the headlines, but deep down have not tried hard to persuade or to educate our population about the difficulties through which Ulster has gone.

One reason for that, I suggest, is that their concentration on every incident of violence seems to exclude anything else. But there is one other factor. Until my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary gave directions to the BBC and the IBA, and despite the small support enjoyed by Sinn Fein, with probably even less enjoyed by the IRA, people such as the hon. Member for Belfast, West were given the same coverage as those who represent law-abiding parliamentary parties in Northern Ireland. That was a monstrous over-representation, and I welcome these directions, which should redress the imbalance.

8.5 pm

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Like the hon. Member for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson), I speak on this subject not only as a Member of Parliament but as a journalist for a number of years. One aspect about which the House should be deeply concerned is how journalists are to be able to conduct their business, not only in Northern Ireland but in the rest of the United Kingdom, under the kind of edict which the Home Secretary issued a week or two ago.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) put the case in classic terms. Of course that is the right way for Opposition Members and other hon. Members to protect this country's liberties. My right hon. Friend's case was conclusive and those who examine it in the future will see how conclusive it was. The House should have been persuaded by it.

I will give some credit to the Home Secretary. Perhaps, some months ago, he would have been persuaded by my right hon. Friend's case. We all know the pressures which the Home Secretary must endure, both in the House and at Conservative party conferences. In some respects he stands up to them, and in others he does not. This question has come persistently from his right hon. Friends: why did he leave this decision for so long? I should like to pay the Home Secretary, and perhaps the Home Office, the compliment of thinking that they left this decision for so long because they knew that it was impossible to introduce such an edict without infringing the liberties of broadcasters and journalists.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): The right hon. Gentleman has asserted that it will be difficult, if not impossible, for journalists to ply their trade. If that is so, how do Radio Telefis Eireann, The Irish Times and The Cork Examiner carry out their functions under a more restrictive edict?

Mr. Foot: It is wonderful to see the whole Conservative party, without exception, Front and Back Benchers, taking shelter behind the laws of the Government of the Republic. I shall come to the hon. Gentleman's point. That is a diversion. It is extraordinary for anyone who has been a Member as long as I have to hear the whole Conservative party saying, "Please, we must follow the example of the Republic of Ireland. That is the way that we should approach our affairs."

I give credit to the Home Secretary. He was slow in reaching this decision, for good reasons. He wanted to be careful. He said, "I must be careful that there are no infringements." If that was the right hon. Gentleman's reason—it is the most creditable reason why he should have acted with such restraint over such a period—surely when he decided to go ahead he should have carefully considered the way in which he introduced the measure. He might even have looked at what is done in the Irish Republic. That Parliament introduced a law which changed the position. The Home Secretary's proposals are so far-reaching in interfering with the rights of free speech and free publication that he should have considered them more carefully. His advisers should have said, "This is such an important matter that we must go to the House of Commons with a change in the law."

The Home Secretary has taken a different course. In his statement a fortnight or so ago, he said that he would introduce some changes in the law to deal with IRA funds. That would be a very good measure. However, if that matter has to be dealt with by a change in the law of the land, I should have thought that these restrictions should have been dealt with in the same way. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook proved, the border territory is large, amorphous and indeterminate under the general edict from the Home Office, which we have instead of a change in the law. Until the matter is taken to the courts, nobody will know how the Home Secretary's edict is to operate.

The motion does not add anything to the power and majesty of the law and does not affect the law of the land. If hon. Members representing Northern Irish constituencies have any doubts about that, they should consult the former hon. Member for South Down. His views on such matters could not be challenged. As he said, one cannot and should not attempt to change the law by ministerial edict. If one tries, one will find that it does not work and that will happen in this case. Either the journalists will be so intimidated by the Home Secretary's edit that they will refrain from carrying out their proper responsibility to report what is happening or the matter will go to the courts and the courts will have to decide what it is permissible to report in Northern Ireland under these restrictions—which have been rushed in.

The matter will have to be settled in the courts. The Home Secretary should have considered introducing a law in which the issues were properly considered. If he had done that, he would have followed—at least in that respect—the example of the Government of the Irish Republic.

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman has spoken for about 10 minutes and in every sentence he has given the impression that he believes that the notices affect reporting. They do not.

Mr. Foot: They affect the way in which events in Northern Ireland are put across to the general public. That is reporting. If that is not considered to be reporting, the Home Secretary is basing his case on the most ridiculous quibble that I have heard—even from this Government. Broadcasting is part of the reporting process and that is why the Government—or at least the Prime Minister—believe that they must interfere with the way in which it is done.

The Home Secretary should have given the House the chance to examine the proposal in detail. We should, of course, have opposed it, because it restricts freedom. However, at least the borders would have been defined in a way that the courts could interpret.

Mr. Hurd indicated dissent.

Mr. Foot: It is no good the Home Secretary shaking his head. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook has explained, there is already complete confusion in the BBC and IBA, as well as elsewhere, about what can and cannot be reported. If they ask how to resolve the confusion, the absurd answer is that they must apply to the Government.

Mr. Cash: The right hon. Gentleman has referred to his desire to see a change in the law. He surely accepts that, within the terms of the BBC's charter and the Broadcasting Act 1981 under which the directions are given, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is acting within the law. There is no question about that. I do not understand what the right hon. Gentleman is talking about.

Mr. Foot: If the hon. Member is unable to understand already, no surgical operation on my part will assist in making him understand in future.

Speeches from Labour and Conservative Members—and the reticence of the Home Secretary—have underlined the fact that they understand that the directions are a major departure from previous practice, whatever right to introduce them the Home Secretary may have. To introduce such measures by edict is a shocking way to proceed.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak) rose——

Mr. Foot: I shall not give way.

The Home Secretary should have gone about the matter differently. I prophesy that the Government will have to introduce a law that deals with the matter because of the appalling confusion that has been created. Proper reporting of events in Northern Ireland has been gravely injured by what the Government have done. As the confusion continues in the coming months, the Home Secretary will have to consider carefully why it has arisen.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Foot: No. I have already given way twice.

The Home Secretary should have realised that the proper way of dealing with the problem was through the House. The Home Secretary should have used the House of Commons to deal with this major change in the way in which events in this country can be reported. Other speeches, in particular that of the hon. Member for Newbury, show how dangerous the Home Secretary's action is.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The right hon. Gentleman promised that he would answer the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash). That was about 10 minutes ago. We are still waiting. Can you do anything to help us, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I call Mr. Michael Foot.

Mr. Foot: It is strange that hon. Members who do not understand free speech in the House should pretend to understand it elsewhere.

The Government have introduced grave confusion into the way in which matters are reported. Far from making a contribution to solving the problem, the Home Secretary has created confusion. Those who believe in the right to free speech and in the power of free debate to solve problems will consider the measure an insult to the people of the United Kingdom, as well as the people of Northern Ireland, because it means that they cannot judge for themselves about the programmes that they see. If argument continues and the possibility of putting a case remains, we have the strongest benefit and safeguard for the country.

The Home Secretary is a little more reticent than some of his colleagues in these affairs. The right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), among others, sought to intimidate broadcasters by one means or another. It is to the credit of the BBC and others that they generally stood up to that intimidation, and I hope that they will stand up to this measure too.

We all know how deep and difficult the problems of Northern Ireland are. The solution to those problems will come only as a reward for the process of debate and not as a reward for enforced diktats from the Home Office, which may not believe in its own edicts.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A number of hon. Members wish to speak on the matter and some will be disappointed if we do not have short speeches. I appeal to hon. Members for brief speeches.

8.18 pm

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): I have listened carefully to the arguments weighed by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary in his opening address to the House. It was extraordinary that his compelling arguments for issuing the directives to the IBA and to the governors of the BBC were not weighed against the importance of free speech to our society. We in the House must hold dear our ability to express freely our views about matters that concern every one of our citizens. Without that ability, we do not have democracy. Bentham uttered the adage that, without publicity, no good can endure, and, with publicity, no evil can survive. Publicity is an essential ingredient in our ability to judge these important matters.

The Government's measure is inconsistent even with the arguments that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary advanced. Sinn Fein is a lawful and legitimate party, no matter what one may think of it. How can we restrict the access to free speech that a lawful and legitimate party has in the United Kingdom? I could understand it if the Government were saying that Sinn Fein was an unlawful, prohibited terrorist organisation, but they do not say that. They continue to allow Sinn Fein to present its views to the electorate during elections. They go so far as to say that, in the narrow window of the electoral process, supporters of Sinn Fein may be interviewed. If they speak in the House, their remarks may be reported direct on the air waves. If we regard this place as a crucible for the ideas of a free, open, confident democracy, how can we designate the remarks of a lawful political party and say that a spokesman for that party may not broadcast directly? That is my right hon. Friend's instruction to the directors of the BBC and the IBA. There is an enormous flaw in the argument.

Let us weigh the importance of free speech in a democracy. If evil cannot endure where there is publicity, the instruction will not be denying freedom to Sinn Fein as much as it denies freedom to our fellow citizens on the mainland of Britain. Surely in a democracy the presentation of arguments is the very first basis on which we judge the integrity or intentions of those who spout their beliefs.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary knows that I am a fervent Unionist. I believe passionately in the Union. I greatly regret the fact that many of the actions of the Government whom I support have contributed to undermining the integrity of that Union. I say that positively for one reason. I appeal to my right hon. and hon. Friends and to the Opposition that we do not put up political candidates to enjoin fellow members of the United Kingdom into the political comity that we all enjoy when arguing for the interests of our electorate. Education, welfare, health and infrastructure are all essential ingredients of the political dialogue for those who live in England or Scotland. In Northern Ireland, the one issue is the continuance of the Union. Confidence should enable us to assert that we can stand and make our case.

In weighing great issues, free speech is vital to us. I agreed with the observation of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) about the assertion by my hon. Friend the Minister of State on Sunday that the reference point should be the Home Office. That smacks of all the Ministers of the Interior of other societies and other generations which have felt that the advice of such Ministers on such matters was essential for the management of their community. We are a confident and strong democracy and we can face and outface evil with argument. We can win that way; not with measures such as this.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You gave the impression that the debate was time barred. As I understand it, the voice of the House must be heard until any hour. You gave the impression that any hon. Member who spoke for more than two minutes would be out of order. Is that the rule of the House, or is it your interpretation?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think that the hon. Gentleman is putting an interpretation on my remarks. I do not think that hon. Members should have to stay here until the small hours of the morning to deliver speeches that they have been nursing all evening. I think that it would be for the convenience of the House and the appreciation of other hon. Members if speeches could be made at a reasonable hour.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): Whatever the rules of order may say, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall endeavour to respond to your injunction.

The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) merits the admiration of the House because he has gone to the heart of the matter. I hope that he will forgive me if I defer taking up his argument until a little later in my speech.

I fear that the Government have once again made themselves ridiculous. I find no pleasure in recording that fact, partly because I respect the Home Secretary and I suspect that he may be defending a measure which is not his own proposal. Secondly, I do not believe that any hon. Member would like to see the paramilitaries succeed in their objectives or to hear of anything that would encourage support for them. Yet that is the effect of what the Government are doing. They have allowed themselves to be manoeuvred into what the paramilitaries and their supporters can represent as repression. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said, the directive is bound to be reported in America and wherever the paramilitaries go for financial and other support, and the terrorists will be portrayed as freedom fighters resisting censorship and repression. The Government have left themselves with the worst of all worlds. They have incurred the opprobrium for which the paramilitaries have been hoping and praying and they have done so without achieving anything practical.

I am still not quite clear what the Home Secretary was trying to say. At first, he seemed to be saying that we needed to do something and that we were now doing something effective. Then he seemed to say that we did not have to worry because the measure would make no difference anyway. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook said, we have all witnessed the absurdity of an interview being carried up to the point at which it cannot lawfully be continued, and then a shot of the interviewee is accompanied by the announcer saying "This is what he or she is saying."

Mr. Barry Porter: Is not the problem that the Government have at last realised that it is proper to use a basically illiberal method to fight someone who is trying to destroy liberal democracy? Because they do not like to use that illiberal method they try to liberalise it. In doing so, I fear they have got the worst of both worlds.

Mr. Archer: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman and I start from the same point, but I am sure that we have reached the same conclusion: that the Government have been ineffectual in what they are trying to do, so all the fuss is pointless.

I am not even sure that the Government have not failed to find the correct form of words to achieve what they seek to achieve. They have placed an embargo on the supporters of Sinn Fein. Suppose that someone says, "I do not support Sinn Fein. I totally disagree with Sinn Fein because it is too moderate and compassionate." That would not come within the terms of the embargo.

The measure is a classic example of an unimaginative and leaden-footed Government being manoeuvred into looking silly. It is what I call the Austerlitz strategy. At Austerlitz, Napoleon was confronted with superior numbers. He asked himself, "What would I most like my opponents to do if they were totally to take leave of their senses?" Having answered that question, he set about getting the enemy to do it. That is what the paramilitaries have achieved. I do not propose to delay the House further with that theme.

I intervene to restate the simple case for toleration. That thesis is not that anyone is entitled to put a point of view, but that the public are entitled to hear any point of view which anyone seeks to propound and to hear it from its own advocates. The public are entitled to hear a view from those who advocate it and make up their own minds on the validity of that view.

Mr. Marlow: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has just said that he feels that anybody is entitled to propagate his point of view and that the public are entitled to hear it. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman believe that if somebody wants to propagate racial hatred, racial disharmony or racialism, he should be entitled to propagate that view? Does he feel that it is right to propagate the point of view of terrorism, murder, mayhem, mutilation and killing?

Mr. Archer: As the hon. Gentleman asks, I shall make my position clear. I have always thought that people are entitled to express views like that. If they do so in such a way as to undo the work of patient reconciliation in a community, that is a different matter. But I would not stop even the hon. Gentleman propounding his views. I want the public to judge their validity. I am not afraid of them; I would like them to be exposed to the light of day.

Of course, for security reasons, or for some of the other reasons given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook, the Government may have to prevent some information from being broadcast. That is not in question today. No one has suggested that security is a consideration in this embargo. The only justification that could be advanced is that the public may hear opinions which are unacceptable to the Government, to the public and to this House, and that those opinions are distasteful, wicked and offensive. I can well understand that. But that is the very test of a tolerant society. The test of tolerance does not come when we contemplate opinions that we share or when we hear points of view with which we agree. George Bernard Shaw pointed out that tolerance and freedom have no meaning except in relation to opinions that we consider damnable, pernicious and disgusting. We do not tolerate the opinions of our friends and of those who agree with us. Toleration arises only when we hear an opinion that we consider so wicked that we are tempted to say that the public should not be permitted to hear it. If we do not tolerate opinions such as that, the paramilitaries have achieved their objective of destroying free society.

I can understand Conservative Members saying that there must be a line somewhere—that some opinions are too deplorable to tolerate. That was the argument used by the Spanish Inquisition, by the Gestapo and by the KGB; it has been the argument used by repressors and torturers throughout the ages. It is based on a fundamental fallacy. Surely the more obviously wrong an opinion is, the more certainly truth will triumph in open debate.

I am aware of the distinctions which the Home Secretary mentioned between what is going on in South Africa and what is happening here. There is nothing to be gained from overstating the case. But I am sure that people in South Africa will say that they will not be lectured by the British, because we are doing the same as they are. It would be a great tragedy if, in the international community, the voices of British people speaking out for human rights met that reaction.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): I wonder what General Jaruzelski will say to the Prime Minister in Poland if the same point is raised with her.

Mr. Archer: Indeed. We may be able to draw distinctions between our country and others and say that they have not got it right, but this will mute the voice of those of us who are trying to speak out for human rights abroad.

This country has a long tradition of toleration for all opinions, right and wrong, good and wicked, because we believe that opinions should compete in a free market and that in the testing environment of daylight truth will flourish and falsehood will be exposed for what it is. That tradition takes longer to build than to destroy—but no gun can destroy it, no terrorist can destroy it: only the Government can destroy it. That is what this debate is about.

8.33 pm

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): I readily confess that I am worried about this motion and about the notice that the Home Secretary has issued to the chairmen of the BBC and IBA, so I welcome this opportunity to debate the subject again and to reconsider some of the points raised on 19 October.

At that time, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) declared the Labour party's unequivocal opposition to terrorism. I am prepared to accept that as a sincere statement on behalf of Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen. I noted, however, that on the same day as his declaration the Labour-controlled council in Haringey lent its buildings to an exhibition of photography extolling the virtues of the IRA. So Opposition Members must know that, although I am prepared to accept their assurances, it seems that some of their camp followers do not put that declaration into practice.

The case for the action by the Secretary of State is stronger than has been acknowledged by Opposition Members. It is absolutely right in a free and democratic society that the Home Secretary should have at his disposal the powers that are given to him by clause 13(4) of the licence and agreement of the BBC and section 29(3) of the Broadcasting Act 1981. After all, the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) used those powers when he was Paymaster General. It is right that they should exist.

One can argue that this action has shown the high priority that the Government give to combating terrorism, and that such a demonstration is right. We can go further and illustrate the weakness of Opposition Members' arguments by examining the Irish experience with section 31 of their Broadcasting Act. If, as I believe they do, the Government of the Irish Republic find that their section 31 is an effective way of minimising the growth of extremism, it is legitimate for us to examine their experience to see what we can learn from it on an experimental basis.

Mr. Mallon: This is the second time that the same point has been made in the debate. For 51 weeks of the year I am told in this Chamber that the Republic of Ireland is a haven for terrorism, that it is full of bombs and that it is the place from which the IRA operates, so I find it hard to understand why, for the convenience of this debate, the Irish Government's section 31 has helped cause all these problems to evaporate. Conservative Members cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Hunter: That is not an intervention: it is a speech. It is entirely irrelevant to the point that I am making. A serious attempt has been made in the Republic of Ireland with section 31, and it is worth seeing whether we can learn from it.

Another point that supports the Home Secretary's actions is the reaction from the people against whom the measure is directed. It is clear that they do not like it. From that we may reasonably argue that the measure will be effective and will disrupt those opponents' activities.

Again, we often use the line about terrorism thriving on publicity, calling it the lifeblood or oxygen of terrorism. This provision will limit the access of the opponents of democracy and freedom to the media, and it is worth giving it a try.

On the other hand, Opposition Members may now discover that our attitudes have something in common. I am profoundly worried by two aspects of this policy.

Ultimately, terrorism can be defeated only by the people's rejection of it. It must be seen to be an option that is not worth following. For that to happen, we want to incorporate the potential supporters of terrorist causes into the democratic process. We want to bring them into the full play and process of the democratic system. This measure nips all that in the bud. This is very worrying.

The second thing that worries me is the maxim that publicity is the lifeblood of terrorism. In some circumstances it is, but in others it is not. It is demonstrably provable that television coverage of acts of terrorism encourages other acts of terrorism. Pictures of the hijacking of an airliner or of stone-throwing by rioters in the streets encourage comparable actions. However, I do not think that the intellectual political argument or interview encourages terrorism.

My hon. Friend and near neighbour the hon. Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates) complained on 19 October, when this matter was discussed, that a television company had suggested giving Gerry Adams two hours of viewing time. That would be incredibly boring, but I can think of nothing better than Gerry Adams being on television and those who try to defend violence being thus exposed. As I say, I fear that we may not be following the right course.

Ms. Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): In view of the hon. Gentleman's argument, I assume that he will join us in the Lobby. His only argument against this action is his worry about section 31 in the Republic of Ireland. If he talks to media people in the Republic, he will discover that they find the provision difficult to operate and that they have serious doubts about its viability.

Mr. Hunter: That is one point of view, but there is evidence to suggest that it is not the exclusive point of view. However, I note what the hon. Lady has said.

There is another dimension to my anxiety about the debate. Too often, in the aftermath of a horrific terrorist outrage, we express our genuine concern and talk about developing a strategy to deal with terrorism. However, the Government, who I greatly support in other respects, are open to the charge that if they had devoted as much energy to fighting terrorism as they did to defeating Galtieri and Scargill, we would not now be in this position.

At a speech to the police college at Bramshill in 1985 the Home Secretary said that "terrorism knows no frontiers". He spoke about the international dimension of terrorism. He said that if it is to be dealt with effectively there must be a greater degree of international co-operation. He would have us believe that the appearance of Gerry Adams on our television screens is against national interests. If he believes that terrorism knows no frontiers, is it not just as much against national interests that African National Congress executive member Ronnie Kasrils walks the streets of London recruiting terrorists, at least one of whom has come from the ranks of extreme Irish republicans? In his flat in Tufnell Park, Timothy Jenkins is using the expertise that he has obtained from the IRA partially to assemble bombs which are then sent to Lusaka and on to South Africa to maim and kill innocent people. From her flat in Golders Green, Ronnie Kasrils's wife Eleanor orchestrates terrorist activity in South Africa. If terrorism knows no frontiers, surely we must address ourselves to London being used in that way.

8.43 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I agree more with what the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) said in the earlier part of his speech than with what he said at the end of it. If he has evidence to support what he said, no doubt he will forward it to the proper quarters.

When he announced the measures that we are considering, the Home Secretary had the grace to say that they were extremely serious matters. It has taken 19 years of the Northern Ireland troubles to bring about this curtailment of freedom of expression. Some people have argued that it should have happened before, but other Home Secretaries and other Secretaries of State for Northern Ireland have not thought it appropriate.

Freedom of expression is a fundamental right guaranteed by the European convention on human rights, and the House guards it with special vigilance. When it is abridged, Parliament wants to know the reasons why. Of course, it is not an absolute right and may be qualified by circumstances—including, for example, a perceived threat to national security which would entitle a Government to curtail it. The European convention acknowledges those circumstances. I do not quarrel with or question the Home Secretary's decision on legal grounds. I and my colleagues look for more compelling political justification than the Home Secretary has deployed in this debate or when he announced these measures.

Like others who have had experience of Northern Ireland, the Home Secretary will no doubt suffer from a sense of frustration that there is so little progress there towards normality. Like others before him, he no doubt feels the need not only constantly to review policy but from time to time to announce a new initiative. Unfortunately, these initiatives too often merely exacerbate the tensions and violence and fail to restore security and constitutional normality.

In announcing this new initiative, the Home Secretary rested his case for banning television appearances by terrorists and their supporters on two propositions. As the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) has said, both those propositions need careful consideration. First, the Home Secretary claims that such appearances draw support for the terrorists from the public at large since the terrorists can address the public more directly through television than they can through the newspapers. Secondly, he says that these appearances cause grave offence, most grave in Northern Ireland.

There seems to be a certain inconsistency between the Home Secretary's two arguments. He is right to recognise that such broadcasts on television cause grave offence. It takes a strong stomach to observe people in human guise advancing their vile sophistries to justify their evil inhumanity. If the Home Secretary's gorge rises at the sight of a terrorist on television, I do not see why he should assume that the British public react any differently. If the people of Northern Ireland are even more angered by these appearances, terrorists will draw little sustenance from their direct access to the public. There is no evidence that 19 years of exposure on television has added a featherweight of support to the terrorist cause.

It should be remembered that, in the politics of Northern Ireland, myth is a very potent force. Myth is most powerfully debunked by seeing and hearing the evil banalities of the supporters of terrorism. The Home Secretary's judgment underrates the perceptiveness of the viewers and their ability to spot a moral cretin when they see one. Television powerfully exposes the character and motives of those upon whom it focuses.

The broadcasting authorities have had a difficult task in deciding, sometimes on the spur of the moment, what to transmit. On the whole, they have discharged their task with caution and responsibility. In this context, I agree with the hon. Member for Basingstoke: if Mr. Gerry Adams were to be subjected to even half an hour of questioning by, say, Mr. Brian Walden or Sir Robin Day, I doubt whether he would have many admirers left. These terrorists are not supermen. They are like rats in the sewers, out of the daylight, which would only expose their vulnerability.

The Home Secretary is right to say that self-justifying appearances give widespread offence, but he is wrong if he believes that such appearances succeed in their objectives. I doubt whether the Home Secretary really believes that, by turning off the sound when the terrorists speak, he will diminish the frightfulness of what is happening in Northern Ireland. However, sometimes it seems that it is Government policy to emphasise the ordinariness of Northern Ireland, in the hope that the image will become the reality. That will not do. The troubles in Northern Ireland are not nice. For 20 years, our fellow citizens there have borne the brunt of these horrors. Their relatives have had their joints smashed, their skins burnt and their brains blown out. These deeds are offensive and their perpetrators are offensive, but the British public are neither so squeamish nor so inured to these horrors that they require censorship to protect them from the sight and sound of terrorism.

One of the stranger assertions that the Home Secretary made, in the debate tonight and when he made his announcement, was that by issuing his direction to broadcasters he had simplified their job and that by the terms of the direction he had removed broadcasters' discretion to judge whether to transmit. The reality is that his hurriedly announced measure has given rise to a series of subsequent attempts by the Home Office to give authoritive interpretation to the terms of his direction. It remains unclear what the legal validity of the clarifications is. I would submit that there is none. However, it is clear beyond doubt that the clarifications have not removed the doubts and difficulties of the broadcasters.

The question whether an individual represents a terrorist organisation and whether his words support such an organisation are not easily decided. Apparently, it is the conjunction of the words and image of the person that is banned. We can see the terrorist, his words can be repeated by someone else—either a reporter or an actor—unless the terrorist is standing for Parliament. The anomalies of the direction and its subsequent interpretation are legion. We shall be able to hear speeches from Sinn Fein candidates during an election, but not, apparently, their comments upon its result. It may be that their very presence will lead to the censoring of all live post-election comment.

One of the most sinister consequences of the direction has been the Home Office statement that there is no exemption from the terms of the notice for historical documentaries or for recordings of persons who are now dead. Thus, for example, an excellent historical programme commissioned by Mr. Jeremy Isaacs for Channel 4, which I understand it was intended to show again, would require excision of all appearances by the late Eamon de Valera, who for television purposes in Britain will become a non-person.

The international consequences of this ill-thought-out direction are beginning to emerge only now. How will the Home Secretary respond to representations from foreign Governments calling on Her Majesty's Government to prevent the World Service and other media from transmitting words by those whom those Governments deem to be terrorists? The moral position of the Government has been eroded by this action. Perhaps the Home Secretary will tell us how he proposes to prevent members of Sinn Fein from broadcasting direct to this country by satellite. Indeed, the effectiveness of this measure is bound to be called into question as technology develops.

This country has not lost the freedoms that the House cherishes by subversion, revolution or war. If we lose our freedoms, it will be by carelessness. In the Government's dealings with the broadcasting authorities, what looks like a pattern of carelessness is emerging. The Home Secretary should withdraw his direction, not to clarify its obscurities but because it is an unnecessary and repugnant curb on our freedom.

8.54 pm

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): While I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me to take part in the debate, I freely confess it is a debate to which I would rather not be contributing. I say that not because I think that the standard of the debate has been low. On the contrary, the debate has stirred up differences and given rise to strong feelings on both sides of the House. Together with my hon. Friends the Members for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) and for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter), I feel like one of those barnacled whales in a hole in the ice, with the ice closing in and with my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench not about to bring in an ice breaker to get me free.

When this proposal was first announced, and Conservative Members received little warning, my natural reaction was that it was a misguided measure which was the result of a desperate need to be seen to be doing something rather than a proposal that had been through the Whitehall machinery to have every "i" dotted and every "t" crossed. When I glance through the press cuttings of the follow-ups to the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and learn of the growing number of muddles and disputes that have grown from the original statement, I can only say to myself that I was right to be sceptical in the first place.

Right hon. and hon. Members on both the Government and Opposition Front Benches have a tendency to exaggerate. I do not think that this measure is either as good as my right hon. and hon. Friends have said, or as bad in its damage to the individual liberties of our citizens as right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite suggest. My hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson) seemed to see it as part of the vendetta against the BBC—the Government's vengeance for being let down by the BBC. Clearly, it is nothing of the sort if one examines it in detail.

I am also aware that this is a popular measure, and that if I walked down the Broadway in Bexleyheath tonight 80 per cent. of my constituents would tell me that it is a marvellous idea, being tough on terrorists. However, hon. Members, particularly Conservative Members, have a duty to probe, to question, almost to have a committee debate to peer behind the curtain to examine what the Government have brought before the House of Commons this evening.

Yes, it is good in parts. I came into the House in 1974 and that year David O'Connell, the so-called chief of staff of the IRA, appeared on BBC television. I remember writing angry letters to the chairman of the BBC because I think that it is wrong for members of the IRA to appear on television. I would also think it wrong if a bank robber appeared on television or if a rapist appeared on television after a particularly sordid rape. There must be some discretion. A line should be drawn.

I welcome the measure because it is even-handed, and it would be deplorable if that were not so. I am a strong supporter of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, so there is a superficial attraction in Britain coming into line with the Irish Republic. But when I probed that further, I got the impression that the Irish Republic did not ask for that particular proposal. The phrase in the papers was that they did not actually object to what had emerged from the Home Office.

The comparisons between North and South are a little false. I am told that Sinn Fein represents about 1·9 per cent. of the total vote in the South, while in the North it represents some 30 per cent. of the nationalist vote. An editorial in The Times on 20 October, talking about southern Ireland, stated:

> "There are frequent and well-publicised rows about borderline cases. It remains unpopular with journalists. It probably contributed to the fall of the Fine Gael-Labour coalition which amended the Act in 1976."

I suggest that by any stretch of the imagination it has not been plain sailing in the South. Frankly, with due respect to Dublin, it is not a world centre of communications, as we have the privilege of being here in London.

I am only too well aware that broadcasting the views of Sinn Fein spokesmen gives enormous offence to my constituents. For the relations of those who have been killed or injured in Northern Ireland, of course there is a feeling of outrage. But we must ask ourselves this evening whether it is our duty as Members of Parliament to shield our constituents from that sense of outrage.

I bet that in the United States people were outraged by the broadcasts about Vietnam. They would rather have not seen what was happening in Vietnam. But who in the House could say how wrong it was that the citizens of the United States were outraged by what they saw in Vietnam? People had to face the facts, and certain political consequences flowed from that.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): My hon. Friend suggests that the measure which my right hon. Friend has brought to the House will restrict the reporting of events. There is no comparison between the measure brought forward by my right hon. Friend and the remarks that my hon. Friend is making about the Vietnam war.

Mr. Townsend: I was saying simply that the impact of the film coverage from Vietnam played a major part in the public discussion about the future of that war. If one considers Sinn Fein—and I totally deplore all that it stands for—one has to recognise that it is a force in the North. It has 59 locally elected councillors, it has a Member of Parliament and it has support from the public in Northern Ireland that we all wish it did not have. That is the reality. Had the Government of the day brought forward such a measure before Sinn Fein had gained that stronghold in Northern Ireland in electoral terms, it is possible that the position would be very different, but to attempt to ban the broadcasting of Sinn Fein now, when it is running a local council in Northern Ireland, seems extraordinarily confused and misguided.

I put it to my hon. Friends who totally disagree with what I am saying that, unlike the IRA, members of Sinn Fein have names and faces. They are prepared to stand up in public places and argue their cause, just like every hon. Member. They are not crouching in the studio in the dark with blankets over their heads. They are standing for election in our country. Therefore, I draw a distinction between a member of a political organisation which I totally deplore and a terrorist organisation such as the IRA, while of course understanding the links that exist between the two.

Mr. Harold McCusker (Upper Bann): Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that members of Sinn Fein are subject to the IRA and that Sinn Fein is an extension of the IRA? In the words of a former hon. Member representing West Belfast, they are daylight politicians. Does he not accept that Sinn Fein is an extension of a terrorist movement and as a consequence its members should be treated as terrorists?

Mr. Townsend: The hon. Gentleman got up before I had sat down. I said that there were very clear links between the two, and I fully understand what he says.

If the Government were looking for firmer ground to stand on, of course the proscription of the organisation was a possibility. I have to say that if I was consulted as to whether that was a good idea, I think I would say that it was not. I know that this is very unpalatable to some of my hon. Friends, but in certain circumstances Sinn Fein can act as a safety valve and provides an option which is marginally different from direct support of terrorism; those who have far greater experience of Northern Ireland tell me that is so.

I raised with the Home Secretary the question of elections. I find the Government's position naive in the extreme. I was adopted as the Conservative candidate for Bexleyheath a good year before the election. It is common for a parliamentary candidate to be adopted several years before an election. That candidate or Member of Parliament works flat out to gain publicity, to get on local radio or television and improve his position in his constituency. For the Government to say solemnly that there is only the official three-week election period flies in the face of the evidence that is well known on both sides of the House.

Whatever the Government may gain in Belfast—I am uncertain about that gain—they will lose in Boston. They must face that fact. Like many other hon. Members, I talk to American students from time to time and the question of the IRA comes up. I say, "Look, members of the IRA have no grounds for taking the path of terrorism. They live in a democracy, they take part in elections and Sinn Fein is treated the same as any other political party." I cannot say that now.

I know that some of my hon. Friends think that it is marvellous that we are discriminating in that way. However, I hope that they will recognise that we are cold-bloodedly discriminating against a political party in part of our kingdom. What is to stop another Government being outraged by a speech from a spokesman for the National Front or some of my hon. Friends being outraged by some Left-wing organisation demanding the sacking of the monarchy, the removal of all the judges and the dismissal of all the admirals, generals or air marshals and feeling that the moment had come to ban that extreme group from taking part in a broadcast?

The Government had to draw a line if they were to bring forward a measure of this nature. They have drawn a wobbly line between broadcasters and journalists. In the real world, a broadcaster is frequently a journalist. I am open to correction if I am wrong but, as I understand it, a member of Sinn Fein can write an article in The Daily Telegraph in London tomorrow, he can have a letter in the column of The Times and can be interviewed in The Independent; yet he will not be able to be cross-examined on his local radio station in Ulster about what has been written and no one will be able to ask him about his views or what he is trying to achieve. I cannot go back to Bexleyheath tonight and say that that is a sensible proposal, the sort of proposal I expect from a Conservative Government.

There has already been reference to the precedent that we have created. Some of my hon. Friends may not mind the fact that we are being quoted in South Africa as the way forward. Suppose that, in six months, there is a particularly nasty episode in Transylvania, where the Romanian authorities are bulldozing villages of a thousand years' standing and, when the world's press tries to find out what is happening, the Romanian authorities quote what the Conservative Government have been doing in Northern Ireland. What happens then? What happens if there is further trouble in Latvia, Estonia or Lithuania, and once again we are told, "We are following the example of the United Kingdom"?

The way to proceed is to bring public pressure to bear on the broadcasting authorities. I do not think it is true that the BBC or the IBA instantly opens the studio door to any member of Sinn Fein who comes along. On the contrary, they understand that Sinn Fein is in favour of violence and they try to exercise their discretion. We are all entitled to say that they get it wrong, but the man in Whitehall also gets it wrong from time to time. The way to proceed is to try to influence the authorities—the Government appoint half the officials who control the authorities—rather than in this way.

I have reached the conclusion that this is a measure of censorship. It is an illiberal act from a Home Secretary who, when Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, completely opposed it. I have been an hon. Member since 1974 and when the topic of banning Sinn Fein from television has arisen, as it has regularly, I have been told by Ministers of both parties that it would not work and was not practical. I fear that the Government, in their haste, have come forward with a measure that will damage the Conservative party and our country. Therefore, I shall not be supporting them tonight.

9.10 pm

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): In this part of the 20th century it is inevitable that any discussion about press censorship will contain many tensions. Circumstances have changed with the development of the electronic media, and tension is an inevitable part of life. That tension should, and must, be creative. It must be to the advantage of those in the media, and to the advantage of those of us who are involved in making laws and politics. For that reason, this is an important debate. That creative tension is not releasing itself into decisions, but paranoias are developing, which is dangerous, not only for these directions, but for the relationship between the Government, the people and the media that serve them.

This measure would not have been introduced but for the notion within the Government that somehow they must be protected from freedom of speech. We have seen that notion with Zircon, "Spycatcher" and on a number of other occasions, but we are now seeing it under a more self-righteous guise—a guise that is creating an umbrella that it does not merit. In many ways, the Government are unfairly taking this opportunity to do a Wapping on the press.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that in southern Ireland there are equivalent provisions under section 1 of the Broadcasting Authority Act 1960? How can he square the position that he is adopting in attacking the Government for restraining people from making speeches with saying that it is acceptable in southern Ireland?

Mr. Mallon: The hon. Gentleman makes an entirely wrong assumption. I have always opposed section 31 of the Broadcasting Authority Act, for the same reasons as I oppose this measure. I have done so publicly since it was introduced, and will continue to do so as long as it exists in the Republic of Ireland. I want it to be removed as quickly as I want this measure to be removed.

The debate is important because a free and vibrant press is essential to the life that we lead. It is essential in a peaceful, stable country such as this. It is essential in a country that has not been torn apart or invaded for centuries, and the stability and peace inherent within which is the envy of other nations. How much more important is a free press to the north of Ireland, which is torn apart by strife, where a political process is not operating and where everyone is living against a background of emergency legislation, a high security operation, substantial police powers and a substantial security service involvement, as we saw during the summer in various incidents, not least during those that took place in Gibraltar?

Against that backdrop, it is essential to have the protection of a free press to ensure the rights of the individual when, in effect, the Government are taking away the rights of the individual. We must have the protection of a free press when, in effect, the Government are lowering the legal and political standards that apply to the north of Ireland. For that reason, it is doubly important for us to have a free press. The Government are taking these measures in the misguided notion that somehow or other one can take the integrity of the law and the highest practices and diminish them to defeat terrorism. The law was never created to defeat terrorism, and that will certainly not be achieved by bending the law. It will simply add to the nature of the problem.

The motion gives us some idea of how the Government view the issue. The hon. Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) referred to the United States of America. In 1941, as it was about to enter a world war and face enormous world pressure, Franklin Roosevelt said:

> "In the future days which we seek to make secure we look forward to a world founded on four essential human freedoms. The first is freedom of speech—and expression—everywhere in the world."

The others were freedom to worship, freedom from want and freedom from fear. He made those remarks in the face of a world war.

This Government, after so many years of experience, are making the most fundamental mistake that they have made for some considerable time. I read the Secretary of State's speech when he presented the measure to the House on 19 October. I looked closely, but I did not see one reason for introducing it, except when he said:

> "Such appearances have caused widespread offence to viewers and listeners throughout the United Kingdom, particularly just after a terrorist outrage."—[Official Report, 19 October 1988; Vol. 138, c. 885.]

I accept that. Any human being witnessing the bottomless pit of suffering in Northern Ireland would sympathise with that and understand it. We especially understand the feelings of the bereaved when they look at a television screen and see an apologist for those who carried out the murder speaking in the most sophisticated terms. It is an admirable sentiment, and one with which I have no doubt everyone would sympathise, but it is not a basis on which to make law and from which to take political decisions. It is a mixture of three things. First, it is a gesture towards people in this country who find it aesthetically unacceptable to look at people on television whom they quite simply do not like. That is one of the luxuries of living in a stable society. The measure is a gesture to that.

Secondly, in many ways it is a sop—and a rather offensive sop—to people in the north of Ireland who have rightly complained about the killing of their constituents and the way in which the murder campaign has continued. It is almost an insulting sop to them. Thirdly, it is a smokescreen for the Government, who are trying to give the impression that they are doing something. It is, in effect, confusing activity with action.

The measure will not achieve what the Government want. Indeed, it will be dangerously counter-productive. There is only one way in which it can be judged, only one criterion on which we can base our judgment: will it affect the standing, support and political effectiveness of the IRA, Sinn Fein and other organisations? That is the only question. Will the measure help to create peace? Will it help to end the violence? I suggest that it will not.

At a time when the IRA, despite what it would call its murder publicity stunts during the summer, is at a very low political ebb, the Government have given it a straight issue that will help it to garner votes in the European and district council elections. It will help the IRA in its propaganda in the United States. The IRA will turn it into propaganda in Boston, Chicago and New York. It will turn it into dollars. It will translate it into news in Northern Ireland, because it will exploit the confused mess that the Secretary of State has created.

How will it do that? I have here a copy of yesterday's edition of a newspaper from this side of the Channel. That is what the Provisional IRA got yesterday. The Secretary of State says that certain activities will taper off. They will not, because there will be election campaigns in May and June and there will be exploitation at a rate of knots by members of the IRA.

How will they do it? We have already put our finger on one inconsistency. As I said, a district council member may speak on a socio-economic issue as a member of a district council, but he cannot speak on behalf of the organisation to which he belongs. What will he do? He will become a member of a tenants' association, and then he may speak every day of the week. He will become a member of a parent-teachers' association, and he may pontificate on education matters to his heart's content on television and radio. He can present himself as a concerned person with a social conscience who is dealing with the problems of ordinary people in the north of Ireland. Instead, he should be presented as someone who schemes to murder his fellow countrymen. The place for him to defend his murderous actions is on the screen.

The most effective piece of television journalism that I have seen for a long time occurred after the Enniskillen massacre, when the chairman of Fermanagh council was stripped and torn apart by the journalist in such a way that it has changed the face of Fermanagh district council and, perhaps, in the long term will change the political posts in that troubled area.

The measure will not be successful for the additional important reason that it provides an escape hatch for those who do not want to appear on television. Because of the immediacy of the problem in Northern Ireland, it is almost a daily demand. How nice it is to have the Government deciding that, in circumstances in which it is difficult to defend a point of view, one cannot defend it. When the phone rings I should love to say, "Sorry, the Government have decided that I cannot take part in your interview."

Sinn Fein, the IRA and other organisations now have the luxury of an escape hatch which they could not invent for themselves. During their debates about going political, the hard men of such organisations did not want it. For what reason? It was because it would break their secrecy cover. Who is giving them back their secrecy cover, taking them out of the public limelight, and giving them anonymity in the community? The Secretary of State is doing so with this measure. I regret that. The measure will not be able to do what it suggests, and it will be counter-productive.

Let us consider the other anomaly. When all those who are involved in the electoral process need the oxygen of publicity most—that is during the run-up to an election—will this measure keep them off the airwaves? Not at all. It will provide the exception. They will be able to take part in programmes during the run-up to an election, when they most need the oxygen of publicity. They will be able to sit in studios, puff their pipes and pontificate like theologians about the political process. People will not be aware of the scars and the dead bodies lying outside.

There is another electoral luxury, and we have seen it many times. They know that, in certain circumstances, they cannot win their arguments, so they opt out of appearing. Under the representation of the people legislation, every other candidate's involvement is wiped out also. They call the tune, not only when they involve themselves, but when they eliminate themselves from embarrassing situations. This measure was misjudged when it was born. It was a silly misjudgment then, and it has developed into a stupid, counter-productive piece of confusion that suits the purposes of the people at whom it is aimed.

This will not take the IRA and Sinn Fein off the stage. To put it differently, this will take them off the stage and put them into the wings, but it will also take the spotlight off the stage and put it into the wings with them. In other words, it will transfer the context in which they get their publicity.

This must be judged from different perspectives. No doubt I shall say things in relation to section 31 of the broadcasting legislation of the Irish Republic which people will not want to hear. It is incredible that for 51 weeks of the year I am told that the Republic of Ireland is a haven for terrorism, where outrages are plotted, bombs are hidden and guns are held, and then all of a sudden, because it suits the argument, I am told that section 31 has been effective. I do not believe that. It has been a smokescreen in the Republic of Ireland, just as it will be in the north. Why? Because BBC Northern Ireland, BBC London, ITV, UTV, Channel 4 and Welsh Television, which I do not get, go to the Republic and broadcast everything from the north of Ireland and here. In other words, it is a smokescreen there as I believe it will be in the north.

There is a much more fundamental point, on which the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) touched. Two per cent. of the people in the Republic of Ireland support electorally some of these organisations. These organisations are not part of the political landscape in the Republic of Ireland, but are marginal to it because they have been rejected at the polls by the people and marginalised. In the north of Ireland, 35 per cent. of the Nationalist community support Sinn Fein electorally. That is not a margin or a fringe, but a substantial part of the community. Surely the challenge is not to marginalise those people further into the hands of Sinn Fein and the IRA, but to bring them into the political process and constructive, peaceful politics such as we can and do create.

That is one fatal mistake in the argument for the restriction, and it is a crucial point. We simply cannot close our eyes to the attitude of 35 per cent. of the community. If we do, we shall embark on a process which we cannot end. We shall be on a slippery slope. Where does that slippery slope go? Perhaps we should ask where it started. It started with internment without trial, progressed through repressive legislation, the emergency provisions legislation, the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984, the Public Order Acts, the supergrass system, to the shoot-to-kill incidents. All those aberrations, all those bendings of the law and movements from the normal to the abnormal, which the PIRA and Sinn Fein want, are derogations from the highest standards. It is a duty of the House and of everybody in politics to ensure that we retain those high standards as far as possible, because once they start to slip it will take many years to bring them back.

On 19 October the Secretary of State referred to this as part of the strengthening pattern of action against terrorism. I call it part of the rake's progress that began in the 1970s, based on the cardinal error that somehow we can make the law defeat terrorism. We cannot. The law is there to administer justice, not to defeat terrorism. That is a cardinal error. The rake's progress has brought us down the slippery slope.

If one can govern a part of Britain only by suspending laws, creating emergency legislation, introducing measures such as the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Acts, the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984, and the Public Order Acts, by having troops, soldiers, policemen, the UDR and the SAS all over the place, as well by having, as I have in my constituency, armed Army camps for every 400 of the population, is there not a fundamental question to be asked about the British position in Northern Ireland?

Is not the fundamental question to be asked after 20 years of such events: are we on the right track? The Provisional IRA and Sinn Fein have led the Government by the nose down the road along which the Government did not decide to go, but where the Provisional IRA and Sinn Fein led them. The question that must be faced sooner or later is how far we should go down that road and when should we stop. When a Secretary of State, who is known for his liberal views, has to introduce this sort of measure, where will we go if it does not work? And it will not work, just as abandoning the right of silence, tampering with the franchise and the electoral process that we will soon have will not work, in the same way as supergrass systems and all the other things have not worked.

It is time that we considered the fundamental elements of the debate and questioned the continuing British presence in the north of Ireland. If we continue for another 20 to 30 years with what we have, it will be no use to the Nationalist party or those in the Unionist community. It cannot and will not give us peace, economic well-being, self-respect or all the things to which we are entitled. That is the fundamental problem posed by the measure.

I suggest that we have reached the point where, perhaps, this measure has crystallised some of the questions that we should not only ask, but should answer. This measure is the tip of the iceberg. It is of no help to the British people, who had to look at the people and horses blown up in Hyde park. The British people must watch while their own laws are tampered with—laws which they treasure and wish to protect. Their relationship with their nearest neighbour, Northern Ireland, has soured, not just in the past 20 years, but for far longer, and that is causing international problems for this country. The hon. Member for Bexleyheath told us of his experiences. We know what has been said to the Prime Minister by South Africa and to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in Russia, and that is doing no good to this country internationally.

I suggest that it is time to ask those fundamental questions because if, after 20 years and the extent of the problem, all that the Government can think of is censorship, not only are we back to square one, but we are many miles from a solution.

9.33 pm

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) refered to normality. He seemed to imply that the press, and especially the broadcasters, have no responsibility for that normality. I have an interest as a journalist and as a member of the television branch of the National Union of Journalists; and, as a producer and a director, I am a member of the Association of Cinematograph, Television and Allied Technicians. I have spent some years as a current affairs producer and as a freelance reporter. While I would not presume to suggest that I know Northern Ireland anything like as well as the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh, I have made programmes and filmed in Northern Ireland.

For most of the time that I was with the BBC, there was a clear code of practice. One simply did not give air time to terrorists or convicted criminals. There was no question about it; it just did not happen.

Sir Huw Wheldon, writing in 1967, said:

"Detailed control over subject matter is exercised on specific production by a director and a producer with both artistic and public responsibilities. This is the least form of control. In case of any doubt the matter is referred to a departmental head or programme controller."

When Sir Huw wrote that, he was speaking about drama, but he went on to say:

"This holds true of all television programmes."

There was a clear and safe system of upward referral. If one was in doubt, one asked. I spent two and a half years on a current affairs programme on which the editor was a Marxist, the deputy editor was a Liverpudlian Socialist and the two producers, of whom I was one, were Conservatives. It was our proud boast, and still is, that in those two and a half years our politics did not influence our editorial judgment. I do not recall any of us being faced with any problems over the difficult decisions relating not only to terrorism in Northern Ireland but to terrorism worldwide that we were required to take.

That system of upward referral, self-denial and editorial responsibility began to break down. Unfortunately, the guidelines from the editor-in-chief became blurred. In autumn 1985 we had the "Real Lives" programme, with the IRA activist Martin McGuinness. Alan Protheroe, who at that time was the BBC's assistant director-general, justifying what the BBC had then permitted, said:

"The public is entitled to know what and why terrorists are doing what they are doing."

The justification was extended to giving in-vision air time, which had never been done before, to people connected with crime—and that is what we are talking about.

At a BBC seminar on 2 December 1987, Ron Neil, deputy director and editor of BBC news, said:

[Mr. Roger Gale]

"It is not simply what you show that can make news coverage voyeuristic but how often you repeat what is, in itself, a valid image".

What Mr. Neil said ignores the cumulative effect that allows a listening or viewing audience to become gradually inured to violence so that it is possible for the BBC to broadcast items beginning with the words, "Last night another soldier . . . ", to which nobody pays much attention.

Ms. Short: I watched "Real Lives". We saw extremists from both sides explaining their position and why they held those beliefs. People in this country constantly say, "Why do they do it?" They deplore the violence and do not understand its origin. The programme was useful and interesting, particularly the views of the Loyalist extremist, because I had not heard that case put before. It did not attract me to it, but I want to understand why people in Northern Ireland are willing to engage in such violence. I trust that the British people have as big and intelligent a judgment as I do over those matters.

Mr. Gale: The case that I seek and will continue to seek to make is that there was a quite clear editorial understanding that one did not give in-vison air time to terrorists or criminals or to those who gave them succour. That is what this programme did, and, perhaps more important than that, it started to erode the guidelines so that nobody knew any more what was all right.

The BBC tried again in 1987. It issued production staff guidelines. The news guidelines said:

"There is increasing public awareness and concern about violence in the news and increasing sensitivity about the plight of those who suffer—whether in Britain or abroad . . . Beware of the use of action footage for its own sake . . . Does the perpetrator appear to be enjoying the violence?"

We have allowed people to be put on the screen who appeared to enjoy the violence that those whom they support have created. This appears to be a tirade against the BBC. It is not. The IBA is just as guilty.

Mr. Hattersley: This is a diatribe against both the BBC and the IBA.

Mr. Gale: The right hon. Gentleman has scarcely listened to the debate. I should be grateful if he paid a little attention to what I have to say. In the autumn edition of "Airwaves", Lord Thomson of Monifieth says:

"I don't think the amount of problem programmes has changed at all. I think that the political concern about it has changed and become more of a political issue than it was."

So that is all right: it is the fault of the politicians, not the broadcasters.

Back in 1983, after the Harrods bomb, Danny Morrison, then deputy chief of Sinn Fein, was allowed to say on TV-am that he believed that the IRA was in tune with Sinn Fein. So the rot had set in at the IBA quite a long time earlier, and it was that weakened, emasculated, feeble IBA that allowed Thames Television to transmit "Death on the Rock" before the inquest had been held. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) is no longer present. I asked earlier whether he was prepared to put his reputation on the record and say that he believed that after the inquiry it would be found that "Death on the Rock" was an honest programme.

Ms. Short: One can make honest mistakes.

Mr. Gale: Before the system was eroded by those who tore away the guidelines, the IBA television programme guidelines said:

"The IBA is required to satisfy itself that, so far as possible, 'nothing is included in the programmes which offends against good taste or decency or is likely to encourage or incite to crime or to lead to disorder or to be offensive to public feeling'. Interviews with criminals are likely to run the risk of infringing this section of the Broadcasting Act, and there needs always to be careful consideration whether or not such an interview is justified in the public interest."

Ms. Short: That has nothing to do with the debate.

Mr. Gale: Referring specifically to Northern Ireland, which certainly has something to do with the debate, the guidelines said:

"Any plans for a programme item which explores and exposes the views of people who within the British Isles use or advocate violence or other criminal measures for the achievement of political ends must be referred to the IBA before any arrangements for filming or videotaping are made. A producer should therefore not plan to interview members of proscribed organisations, for example members of the Provisional IRA or other para-military organisations, without previous discussion with his/her company's top management. The management, if they think the item may be justified, will then consult the IBA."

That consultative process has broken down completely.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle): The hon. Gentleman seems to think that the order will undermine the men of violence in Northern Ireland and those who support them. Can he explain the nonsense that, under the order, a Sinn Fein councillor who unequivocally supports the armed struggle —it is in the election manifesto—can be interviewed about community matters, social security matters, housing or unemployment, but when his paramilitary mates blow up a factory he cannot be asked to explain the contradiction? The Government are giving such people exactly what they want—they can be interviewed about the nice things but not about the atrocities.

Mr. Gale: The hon. Gentleman says that such people can be interviewed about nice things, but there is nothing to say that they must be interviewed about anything at all. Until the guidelines broke down, the situation was quite clear. One did not give air time, in-vision or radio appearance, succour or help to criminals of any kind at all. There was no argument about it—one simply did not do it. It did not take a genius to work out what one did or did not do.

Mr. Marlow: Further to the intervention of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), was Dr. Goebbels wrong, or is there a value in propaganda? If there is, why should we allow it on our public screens for men of violence in the IRA?

Mr. Gale: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I shall come to the propaganda element. I have seen quite a lot of it. I have spent too many hours, perhaps too late and too long, in video editing sections looking at the carnage on the screen in front of me. I have seen more of that than most hon. Members.

Ms. Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): The hon. Gentleman worked in children's television.

Mr. Gale: The hon. Lady said that I worked in children's television. I knew that if I went on long enough some mug would raise that. For six months, in a career of nearly 20 years in broadcasting in one form or another, I was proud and privileged to direct "Blue Peter." I also had a hand in "John Craven's News Round," which is made in close collaboration with the BBC Television newsroom. If the same care and attention were given to the general programming on the BBC and ITV that is given to children's programmes, we would not be discussing many of these problems.

Ms. Abbott: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that I have nothing but respect for high quality children's television, such as "John Craven's News Round" and "Blue Peter." Could the hon. Gentleman spare us the histrionics about years spent editing footage of IRA atrocities when, in fact, his background in the media is somewhat different?

Mr. Gale: My background in the media was mainly in current affairs. I spent many hours making news and other current affairs programmes and many others reporting, and the children's television was just a part of that. I am sure that we can arrange to have some of this footage shown to the hon. Lady, if she wishes. Perhaps she would like to see the kind of carnage that is created and the kind of actions with which journalists deal day by day. I have respect for journalists.

These programmes offend the public. A MORI poll, carried out between 27 and 31 May 1988, interviewed 2,007 people in more than 150 constituencies—a fairly representative sample. The majority said that they did not wish to see terrorists on the screen in any circumstances. When pressed further, they said that they believed that screen appearances strengthened the status of terrorists.

Some hon. Members may know of Professor Paul Wilkinson, who works at Aberdeen university and who has carried out a study of terrorism which was published this year. He said:

"If you allow a terrorist a platform he can too easily present his case with lies and obfuscation."

He continued:

"I believe terrorist murderers and their apologists are the ultimate representatives of the pornography of violence."

I believe that, too, and so apparently does the new deputy director-general of the BBC. In the Fleming memorial lecture on 6 April this year, John Birt said:

"The ethical foundation of British journalism is not firm. Craft standards are slipping. Moreover, British media operate under a system of law which undervalues our legitimate role. Worse still, the institutions we report on, and particularly the state, are too secretive."

I am sure that some Opposition Members agree.

"All told, British journalism is not in a healthy condition, and is neither capable of serving nor allowed to serve society as it should. Until we in the media put our own house in order we shall not win the argument for a freer flow of information. If we do not put our house in order, more restrictions are likely, and we risk a spiral of decline . . .impartiality in broadcast journalism is a withering plant in need of some sustaining care and attention. And many broadcasters certainly need to have a keener sense of fairness towards their contributors. . .

The media, if they chose, could put their own house in order. They should work towards a greater sense of integrity, reliability and fairness, all for its own sake. We should have decent media."

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that if, over the years, the media had sought to give a balanced account of all views, including the most extreme, rather than going for sensational matter designed to attract audiences, we might not be debating this measure?

Mr. Gale: I agree with my hon. Friend. Had the very fair systems of internal editorial control not been allowed to break down by those who were supposed to have been their guardians, we should not be discussing this measure. The question would be academic. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has had to bring the proposals before the House because those who were charged with that responsibility have failed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson) mentioned those who had canvassed for the televising of the proceedings of the House. I do not wish to go down that blind alley, except to say that members of the Select Committee on Televising of Proceedings of the House went to view the Canadian Parliament. This may be of interest to you, Mr. Speaker, if to nobody else. When asked what the effect had been, the Speaker of the Canadian Parliament said that it rewarded outrageousness. The media are faced with escalating violence—the kind of thing that Ron Neil was talking about—the fact that because today's story is violent, tomorrow's story must be more violent if it is to be used at all. Tomorrow's stories have to be worse than today's if they are to make air time. That has happened in the Canadian Parliament, and it has happened in Northern Ireland.

We, the journalists, have given credibility to IRA funerals. We see masked men firing volleys over coffins —giving some kind of false dignity to the murderers. That dignity is not granted in southern Ireland, which has had such controls for 10 years. Last week I took part in a debate at Trinity college, Dublin, on a completely different subject. I was privileged to have the opportunity to discuss a number of matters with some members of the community who have held, and still hold, offices far more senior than any Labour Member has held. Every person said, "We have had this law in southern Ireland for 10 years"—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where is southern Ireland?"] Hon. Members are right. They said, "We have had the law here for 10 years." To answer the point made by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh, those people said, "We cannot understand why those to whom we seek to deny publicity can go to Ulster and appear on television programmes which are then rebroadcast and received on our own screens."

To me, the only surprise is that we did not do years ago what we are doing tonight. As a Member of Parliament, journalist and television director, I believe that the Government are right to lead where the IBA and the BBC have failed to lead. I question whether national measures will ever go far enough. Perhaps we need to reach international agreements that deny air time to terrorists if we are to have any hope of preventing the continual promotion of murder, hijack and all manner of violent crime. I hope that the BBC and independent television companies will take the reins back into their hands, where they used to be, and deny to terrorists who commit crimes of murder the drug that they crave—publicity. I do not think that that is censorship; I think it is common sense.

9.54 pm

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): I feel very unlucky to have to follow that speech. So far, we have had a serious debate dealing with serious issues in a serious way. The hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) has dragged down that very necessary tone. He has also blown the gaff about what Conservative Members feel about the issue. He turned it from a serious debate about a real problem—the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) conducted it in that way—into an attack on public service broadcasting in general. His experience of broadcasting, about which he told us so much, has taught him nothing about the real merits of public service broadcasting.

The hon. Member for Thanet, North was right to complain about some of the things that have been happening recently in broadcasting and the rest of the media—they are serious and worrying. No man is an island, and nor is any country. If we diminish liberty in Northern Ireland, we diminish it here. Faced with the most secretive Government among Western democracies —and they are becoming increasingly so—our media are being browbeaten.

The problem with Britain is that we have an Official Secrets Act but no freedom of information legislation. Our broadcasting is regulated to try to set standards and allow diversity of opinion; but next week measures will be brought in to deregulate it. From a secretive Government comes increasing pressure by way of an attack on the only safeguard that we have—the media.

I am sorry about this measure. Until now, we had regarded the Home Secretary as one of the few remaining liberals in the Cabinet. In this same week, the right hon. Gentleman will introduce massive deregulation to broadcasting. He will free it up eventually to commercial broadcasting—to the Maxwells, Murdochs and Stevenses who already control our mass media. At the same time, the Home Secretary is bringing in repressive measures. We shall be left with a mixture of pap and trash, and the repression of any attempt by decent broadcasters to penetrate the truth.

Some hon. Members have pointed out that the repression will not stop here, that this sort of measure begets others. That can be seen in the recent history of broadcasting. I saw "Real Lives". It was right to make the programme, which dealt with both sides of the divide in Northern Ireland. It dealt fairly and squarely with the green and the orange, and showed that people who were prepared to pick up guns had a motivation for doing so. It was important for us to know what that motivation was. This is not just a problem of a ruthless, callous or murderous instinct. The problem that has emerged can be traced to motivations and origins that we must understand, because we are responsible for their solution.

What happened next? In order to stop "Real Lives", the Home Secretary had to bring pressure to bear and to write to the governors. The broadcasters resisted the repression and oppression and forced the Government to interfere openly and publicly. That was followed by a year in which the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) launched a series of attacks on the BBC and on public broadcasting. At the end of all that, when the next issue arose the BBC intervened itself. The Government's war of attrition against broadcasting forced it to impose self-censorship at a lower level. Even that does not stop the repressors intervening; they merely intervene at a lower threshold.

This is what happened with "Zircon". The BBC resisted, but then intervened. "Zircon" was repressed, but that did not stop the Special Branch, controlled by the same Ministry that is supposed to safeguard the freedom of broadcasting—the Home Office—invading the BBC. A few weeks after that there was a series of exploratory programmes on a thing called "Spycatcher". That did not even get to the production stage because it was pulled out.

Censorship breeds self-censorship which is even more dangerous. As Bacon said, it is like the arrow that flies in the night. We never know what has been self-censored because it never sees the light of day. That is what is happening against the background of a total monopoly in the printed press. Three people control the popular press. We do not have a freedom of information Act but we have a secrecy Act which was introduced a few months ago with a great fanfare of trumpets.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Motion on Broadcasting and Terrorism in the name of the Prime Minister may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Fallon.]

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Buchan: That has made it even more difficult to arrive at the truth. The hon. Member for Thanet, North gave us a description of his history in broadcasting. The opportunities for freedom and openness of expression have been diminishing, not increasing. The most violent image that I have seen was that of a small child running down a road in Vietnam. The child was covered in napalm and burning. I do not know whether Rees-Mogg in his new job as the grand censor would have allowed that image to be shown, but it was among the images that stopped the war in Vietnam.

It is necessary to show some violence, because violence exists and should be seen. Virtually every interview that I have seen with an IRA spokesman has diminished IRA support and not increased it. Its support is increased if its members are exemplified as heroes against a repressive and censorious British Government.

This measure is not only repressive but stupid and self-defeating, and the Secretary of State knows it. He has been asked to act because Tory party conferences demand action and the Government take action that is repressive when the opposite is required. We need more openness about Northern Ireland. That is the answer. We are wrong if we think that, by ignoring the IRA, Ireland's problems will go away. The IRA will be with us until we get a political solution, and that requires understanding.

Censorship has increased and continues to increase. The Government intend to allow the monopolies of the commercial world to control our broadcasting. But the Government recognise the dangers of that and bring in a grand censor, Rees-Mogg, and give him a remit to deal with sex and violence. He is concerned not just with fictional sex or violence but also with current affairs and documentaries. That means that, for the first time, we have an internal censor dealing with standards which in themselves are beginning to affect the portrayal of truth, not through fiction but in documentaries. That is a dangerous step, from the most dangerous and repressive Government that we have known.

If I were to take a text to quote to the House I would take it from a good old-fashioned Protestant puritan John Milton. The Secretary of State in this philistine Cabinet should remember that, when the "Areopagitica" by Milton was written in praise of freedom, it argued the case for the enemy to be heard. Milton said that it was the false prelates who should be heard—no country or society was perfect, and the only way to deal with a problem was to allow wrongs to be made known and openly discussed. He said that the way forward was through freedom for those with whom we disagree.

I disagree profoundly with Sinn Fein, and I totally reject the IRA, but they are at the moment legal. If he had the courage of his convictions, the Home Secretary would have brought in a law to deal with this. He has failed to do so and has brought in a diktat. I am not sure how legal that diktat is. What will happen if the broadcasting authorities say that they will interview someone from the IRA? What will happen? What will be the legal basis? Are we sure that we have it right?

The relationship between the Government and the broadcasting authorities was good. We were the pride of the world, but the standards of British broadcasting have been eroded. The example of John Birt was quoted by the hon. Member for Thanet, North, but the Secretary of State is now introducing the American habit of checkers on broadcast programmes.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Hear, hear.

Mr. Buchan: "Hear, hear," he says.

We are no longer allowed the editorial independence which alone can bring the diversity that we require properly to survive. The moment that we have a central diktat, thought goes out of the window. What a foolish paradox that today her ladyship goes off to Poland to lecture the Poles about freedom. She is to tell them that the shipyard must be saved, while the Government are closing a factory in the neighbouring constituency to mine, that freedom of expression must be allowed and that writers must be allowed freedom.

Two years ago, I took part in a conference with a number of people from the Soviet Union, at the Edinburgh festival. They were rejoicing that they were beginning to speak more freely. They were asked why the works of Solzhenitsyn should not be published and they said, "He does not speak the truth." I asked, "Who knows what the truth is? What is truth suggesting? Who can tell? The task is to let it be published and let the various truths clash." One man cheered—Yevtushenko himself. Now, the Russians are to publish Solzhenitsyn. There is progress in many places, but we are moving backward into darkness.

10.6 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): The hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) spoke in an unnecessary and irrelevant manner about the visit by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to Poland. The position that my right hon. Friend will adopt when she speaks in Poland will be in defence of the values that the Conservative party supports. We want to ensure that violence, whether it is state-imposed violence or unlawful IRA violence, is not allowed to go unchallenged. On the bottom line, that is why we have made these proposals.

I pointed out in an earlier intervention that it is not only the Conservative party that has adopted this position at this time, for it was the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in a Labour Government who adopted a similar position, for sound reasons, in 1977. We need responsible broadcasting, but we also need to contain terrorism and not give it publicity. Many examples have been given of how terrorist activities have been given unnecessary broadcasting time, but we shall have to look more carefully at the basis on which the BBC and the IBA exercise their powers under their charters.

We are talking about standards and self-regulation. Professor Paul Wilkinson has already been referred to, and it may be helpful to refer to one of the points that he made in his book, "Internal Terrorism and the Liberal State." Although he is a passionate opponent of terrorism, he thinks that the Home Secretary should have used his powers under the Broadcasting Acts to ban a programme in which the IRA was a participant. That position was taken by someone who is an acknowledged authority on terrorism. Professor Wilkinson has an acknowledged reputation in his field and has spent many years studying and considering such questions.

In 1983, a book about televising terrorism was published. The authors drew the conclusion that because cumulative protests by the public during the previous 10 years—that is from 1973 to 1983—had effectively brought television interviews to an end, it appeared that no formal ban was required. Evidently, the whole basis of that argument has been undermined by the continuing attention that the broadcasting authorities have given to interviews that would be prohibited by the directions.

The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), whose argument was described as conclusive by the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), made derisory coments about my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Stewart). He said that it was absurd and fatuous for him to say that people should raise the matter with the Home Office. However, if one is considering the independence of the BBC, and if one concedes that in the charter and in the Act there should be a power—such a power is conceded by Opposition Members—to exercise such a ban by notice or direction, if it is self-evident that the BBC and the IBA and those on the upward reference through the system have not been complying with the powers that they have to ensure that a proper standard is being observed in matters of this kind, clearly the matter has to be dealt with at a higher level. Precisely those powers are contained in the charter and in the Independent Broadcasting Authority Act 1973.

Mr. Hattersley: The hon. Gentleman is terrifyingly ignorant. If the BBC or the IBA is failing to fulfil its obligations under the law, it is the law that must deal with it. The idea that the Government act as a court and that the IBA or BBC might ask the Government to say whether they are behaving illegally is in the nature of tyranny. It is a failure to distinguish between the courts and the Government. If the hon. Gentleman does not understand that, he understands nothing about what we are debating tonight.

Mr. Cash: I am delighted that the right hon. Gentleman has made such an absurd comment. He has demonstrated that he does not have the faintest idea of what a charter is. He should be more careful before he starts bandying words with people who have some understanding of these matters.

The ban has become necessary because the authorities have neglected to exercise self-regulation in the public interest. That is what the chartered body is all about, that is what the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook does not understand, and that is why I support the motion.

10.13 pm

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): I wanted to take part in this debate particularly because my constituency contains one of the most important pieces of broadcasting real estate—the headquarters of the BBC in Scotland in the leafy Queen Margaret drive.

In my first ever speech in the House I was compelled to address a recent celebrated clash between the Government and the broadcasters. It took the form of size 9 boots on the feet of the Strathclyde constabulary walking through the hallowed portals of the BBC in Scotland. The order for the swinging of those boots came, it is now clear, through however many prisms from a street in London not many yards from this building. The reason for the order was the hunt for the enemy within. The enemy was perceived to be within those hallowed portals. A distinguished constituent of mine, Brian Barr, the producer of "The Secret Society" series, was being described as one of the enemies within. The Government have a fetish about enemies within, whether they are explicitly named, such as the president of the National Union of Mineworkers and the miners who supported him, or implicitly smeared, as in the recent decision over trade union membership at GCHQ. The Government are constantly looking for scapegoats on whom to blame their real problems.

Some new enemies within have been named today. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) was accused by no less a personage than the Home Secretary of being an enemy within and encouraging Sinn Fein to stand in elections. He did no such thing. We had the even more outlandish suggestion by the hon. Member for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson) that the noble Lord Thomson—no raving Trotskyite or secret Provo—might also be an enemy within for failing in his statutory obligation to control the IBA companies that operate under his auspices.

Things would be different if I believed that the measure was a spontaneous reaction from a Government with a specific point of view on the Irish question—different from mine, but they are entitled to it and they are the governing party. If I believed it was a one-off, temporary measure which would be removed one day, if I believed that the Government were introducing it because, as I recognise, they have suffered intimately from terrorist violence, and if I believed that it was an honest response to a specific situation, I, having considered the details, would say that it was not the most draconian piece of legislation or the most totalitarian measure that has ever been before the House. I was able to study the details, thanks to the splendid services of our Library, and I suspect that more than one hon. Member took advantages of those services. If I believed that this was introduced in isolation, I would still oppose it but I would understand it.

I believe that it is not an aberration or a specific reaction, but part of an ongoing process, a process occurring sometimes, in the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) quoting Bacon, "like the arrow that flies in the night" through self-censorship, sometimes in response to a specific outrage when there is more heat about than light. It is steadily reducing us not to a totalitarian or authoritarian state, but to a shabby second or third-rate democracy with imperfect democratic institutions and steadily eroding civil liberties. Because we are involved in that process, I believe that we should oppose the measure fervently. It is a process that we have seen under this Government and, to be honest, under the previous Labour Government. One of my first political experiences was campaigning against the last Labour Government's deportation of Philip Agee and Mark Hosenball. Under both Governments we have experienced an erosion of freedom and liberty.

There has been a series of vindictive prosecutions, under the Official Secrets Act 1911, of people such as Tisdall and Ponting. Under the process of erosion, broadcasting companies have been harassed. In his witch-hunts, the former chairman of the Conservative party, the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), pursued broadcasters such as Kate Adie and harassed the BBC.

Downing street has cheerfully contrived and organised a torrent of abuse about Thames Television's documentary "Death on the Rock". In advance of the investigation and inquiry, I do not concede that "Death on the Rock" was the farrago of errors that some Conservative Members described. We do not know all the truth, and I do not think that the court or the jury in Gibraltar believed that we knew all the truth about the events there.

As the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) memorably said, the process of erosion is happening under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1974, with its invention, for the first time, of the concept of internal exile in this country. Under the Prevention of Terrorism Act, citizens of the United Kingdom can be told that they are in exile in a part of the United Kingdom and that they are not permitted to travel to another part of it.

In the Diplock courts people have been tried before one judge, with no jury, and received long sentences, often deservedly. Under the process of erosion, the Secretary of State intends to abolish the centuries-old right of silence of suspects, without that silence being held against them as evidence of their guilt, not only in Northern Ireland but England and Wales.

The process of erosion has apparently led to election candidates—including right hon. and hon. Members whose integrity and patriotism are without question—having to swear oaths before they can seek election to the House and re-endorsement from their constituents. The process is slowly diminishing us not to totalitarianism but to a shabby, third-rate democracy, which increasingly compares badly with our partners in the European Community.

At the heart of most of the process of erosion is the Irish question. This is not the time or place to try to set to right the Irish question, which is not 20 years but centuries old. I am clear in my opinion that the Irish question is of such seriousness that there should be far more debate in the House. Almost as a knee-jerk reaction we deal with each atrocity and have a discussion about number plates or the carnage on our television screens. Neither hon. Members nor any of the major political party conferences give serious analysis or attention to the Irish question.

I am clear in my mind that it is time for Britain to leave Ireland. Partition is the original sin in Ireland. We are already paying too high a price for maintaining our presence in Ireland—in the lives of our young soldiers, many of whom are teenagers, and in the expenditure of treasure from our national Exchequer, which is needed for many other things. Increasingly, our presence is leading to a deterioration in our international reputation.

It is not necessary for hon. Members to agree with me that partition is the original sin. Surely we can all agree that Britain has a serious problem in Ireland. A serious and bloody problem requires more serious measures than the pathetic and laughable contribution that the Government are making with this measure.

I cannot believe that someone of the intellectual weight of the Home Secretary really believes that a political movement such as Sinn Fein will be diminished by the order. It has a centuries-old tradition. It has mass support —35 per cent. of the nationalist community in the north of Ireland is mass support. With respect to the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), 100,000 people cannot all be sewer rats; they cannot all be murderers. Those 100,000 people vote for Sinn Fein. In some parts of Northern Ireland it is the major party. If the age at which people can vote were reduced from 18 to 16, Sinn Fein would sweep to power in many more areas. Whatever anyone in this Chamber might think of Sinn Fein, it is a movement with mass support. Does any hon. Member really believe that that support will be diminished if people can only look at a still photograph of Gerry Adams while an actor enunciates his words? If so, he cannot be a serious politician and he cannot be addressing seriously the critical question of Ireland.

To some extent my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South has stolen my thunder. It is a supreme and dismal irony that we are discussing this measure on the day that the Prime Minister has touched down in Warsaw. She has gone to Poland for some strange reason. Notwithstanding her meeting with Lech Walesa, I presume that it is not to discuss trade union freedom. The sacking of the trade unionists at GCHQ in Cheltenham surely makes that redundant. No Prime Minister of Britain could be such a hypocrite as to discuss trade union freedom in Poland, given what the right hon. Lady has done in this country.

According to an editorial in one Tory newspaper this morning, the Prime Minister has gone to Poland to talk about just one issue—freedom. If she has gone to Warsaw to talk to General Jaruzelski about freedom, I hope that she has the grace to be embarrassed when he, as he will, gives her a transcript of this debate as she prattles about censorship.

At a time when the winds of change, reform and, yes, liberalism are blowing throughout eastern Europe, it is a dismal irony that our Prime Minister should be going to Poland from a country where the winds are blowing in the opposite direction.

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): During the parliamentary recess, my constituency was plunged into tremendous sorrow at the death of eight young soldiers. It was in my Mid-Ulster constituency that those young lads were brutally done to death by the IRA, which has no regret for what it has done. In fact, it was delighted to gloat over those murders.

The other day I walked to yet another graveside, that of a young 20-year-old reserve constable who was murdered in County Fermanagh as he was doing his duty in defence of freedom. He was brutally done to death by the terrorists. There were few Members of this House at his funeral. I stood by his open grave. Hon. Members do not know the reality of the deep sorrow felt by those who have gone through 20 years of murder and destruction.

Opposition Members must make up their minds. One Labour Member said that every interview with the IRA on television diminishes support for that organisation. There have been interviews with IRA members for 20 years. If every interview over the past 20 years represented diminishing support, one would expect them to have no support now, but that is not true. It sounds good, it is a nice argument to present, but it is not factual.

A moment ago, the hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway) said that 100,000 people vote in support of Sinn Fein under the same label as that of the IRA. He went further than that. He said that, instead of interviews causing diminishing support for the IRA and if the voting age were lowered to 16—Hansard will confirm this—the IRA would sweep the board.

Mr. Galloway: Sinn Fein.

Rev. William McCrea: Yes, Sinn Fein. We must realise that Sinn Fein is the political voice of the IRA and is under the instructions of the military wing of the IRA. The hon. Gentleman said that, instead of receiving diminishing support, the IRA would sweep the board. One Opposition Member said that keeping IRA members from the media will lead to diminishing support, but the next Opposition voice said that it will increase support.

It is possible for some people to pretend that they can have it both ways, but Her Majesty's Opposition must make up their minds about what case they will present on this serious matter. It affects the lives of people not only in Northern Ireland—they are a part of the United Kingdom —but in the whole United Kingdom.

Listening to the debate, one would think that we were talking about a mothers' union and not about murderers. We must get away from the farcical idea that we are talking about a little mothers' group, sitting in the corner of a nice little room discussing the next cake that they will bake. We are talking about the representatives and spokesmen of cold-blooded murderers. That is the issue, and the House should recognise it.

I have listened carefully to the debate. I have not heard much said on behalf of the victims who must watch IRA members appear on television and gloat over what they have done. I am sure that that is hurtful. In the Strangers' Gallery is a young man whose young fiancee was murdered by the IRA. The IRA fired 46 bullets into her body. That was not a little picnic or party. I assure hon. Members that someone should not gloat over or romanticise the activities of the IRA. We are talking about sadistic murderers who have carried out some of the most brutal crimes.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Why does the hon. Gentleman not tell us about the UDA?

Rev. William McCrea: The hon. Gentleman is shouting from his usual position.

I shall vote for this measure in the Lobby tonight, bearing in mind what has been recommended by the Home Secretary, and that includes more than the IRA.

It must be clearly stated in the House that there has been a campaign of murder in Northern Ireland, and people are trying to romanticise it. The House should realise that it is dealing with callous, cold-blooded murderers and, equally, cold-blooded spokesmen for murderers.

The restrictions should have been forthcoming from the media. The media must carry a certain amount of the responsibility for this measure. Has the House any idea of the revulsion, resentment and hurt that media coverage causes the suffering families throughout the United Kingdom? They are not confined to Northern Ireland. Those eight young British soldier laddies belonged to and lived in this part of the United Kingdom. Their families suffer equally. If one listened to the interview with the father of one of them, one would understand his deep hurt at a spokesman for a terrorist organisation gloating over, smiling and cheering at what was done on that Ballygawley road. It was barbaric. Anyone who looked at that carnage could not say that the spokesman had any right to be heard on the media and air waves of the United Kingdom.

When the terrorists murdered that young girl, not only did they gloat, but they gave the sickening excuse that they thought that she and her young lad were connected with the security forces, but had made a mistake. "Sorry; we made a mistake." That is sickening. If hon. Members could only feel what it is like. One cannot understand unless it happens to oneself. One cannot know what a family goes through unless one is there or is part of the family. It is easy to pontificate about how one should react. Some may suggest that one should kiss the murderer for slaying one's son or daughter. It is about time proper action was taken to stop the long carnage and murder campaign in our beloved Province and throughout the United Kingdom.

This may be a small step, but I encourage the Government on behalf of the people of Northern Ireland to take further steps. As the Prime Minister said in her statement on the Province, we should not be satisfied until we eradicate terrorism. That should be our goal. The measures already announced will not solve terrorism. This is a small step and I will not cast it aside, as if it should be rejected.

The Government should take the further step of proscribing Sinn Fein. It is not a political party or part of the democratic process. Let no one try to justify its sickening deeds under the name of democracy. I do not care whether we are talking about housing—the IRA has blown more houses out of existence than anyone else—or jobs—the IRA has blown up jobs, leaving people jobless. Let not their apologists come on the box and tell us how sad they are about bread-and-butter issues, because they are the cancer in our midst that should be torn out and destroyed to allow the good people of Northern Ireland, from whatever section they come—and they come from all sections—to live in peace and stability.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): Does the hon. Gentleman understand that this measure will allow Sinn Fein to debate housing, health and education issues and will not allow anyone to criticise its heinous atrocities of the previous night? That is the fallacy of the proposal.

Rev. William McCrea: If the hon. Gentleman was listening carefully, he would understand that that is why I suggested that Sinn Fein should be proscribed. It would remove completely the facade of democracy. Sinn Fein should be robbed of that facade and should not sit on district councils.

I say to the hon. Gentleman that I found it interesting that his hon. Friend was talking about the media stripping apart the Sinn Fein chairman of Fermanagh. I would accept that as a genuine statement—I would be glad to give way on this point—if the members of the SDLP had not voted Sinn Fein into the chairmanship of Strabane district council. In fact, in June it was the votes of the SDLP that gave the chairmanship of Strabane district council to Sinn Fein. That is not romantic nonsense; it is a fact.

Mr. McGrady: I shall refer to instances when the hon. Gentleman's party and the Official Unionist party made pacts with Sinn Fein in the council chambers of Newry and Mourne, represented by the hon. Gentleman, and Down district for the same purposes.

Rev. William McCrea: I say clearly that if the hon. Gentleman could produce—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer".] I shall answer, have no fear of that. If the House can be told tonight what Sinn Fein chairman or councillor was elected by the votes of the Ulster Unionists and the Democratic Unionists, I shall be glad to give away. The hon. Gentleman's last statement was nonsense, because the facts stand. The books can be displayed so that everyone can see that the SDLP voted Sinn Fein into the high office of chairman of Strabane district council, as it did two years ago in Omagh district council and as it did three years ago in Fermanagh district council. They have walked hand in hand in the council chambers. It has also voted for the past four years to elect the Sinn Fein vice-chairman of Magherafelt district council. However, that is taking us away from the issue. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the questions".] The statement made by the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) is completely untrue. We have made no arrangement with Sinn Fein. I have put forward facts, which I would be delighted to hear challenged. I shall be glad to bring to the House our voting record. I would be delighted if the hon. Gentleman would also bring his party's voting records.

After the Gibraltar incident, the media in Northern Ireland told us first that the coffins were being taken from Gibraltar and moved to Dublin, then that the coffins were moved near the border, then that they were going over the border, and then that the coffins of these IRA persons were going to west Belfast. We were treated to this IRA propaganda hour after hour. I ask any hon. Member to find out how much time was given last week by the media to reserve constable McCrone's funeral. His funeral was in the afternoon and was not mentioned on BBC radio that morning. He was not worthy of a mention. He only happened to be a reserve constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and a member of the security forces—that does not make a good enough story.

I shall mention one other incident that caused me concern. In Aughnacloy there was a serious incident where a young soldier discharged his weapon and a person was killed—Mr. McAnespie. Immediately, the media took the statements and conveyed it across the world that McAnespie was shot in the back by a deliberate discharge of a weapon by a soldier. Not only that young soldier, but also his colleagues were put into great danger. It was proved that he did not murder Mr. McAnespie at all. An inquiry was carried out by the Government of the south of Ireland to back that up. We have yet to hear the findings, because his body was exhumed to find out whether the claims were true.

No one came back to apologise to the young soldier. His name was spread across the world as a cold-blooded murderer. He was put in great danger, and now his life will always be in danger because of what the media did. That applies to his colleagues as well.

It is easy for people to spread those stories. It is one thing to drop feathers on the ground, but when the wind comes it is hard to pick them up again. It is one thing to spread a story against that young soldier and our young lads, whether they be in the Army, the UDR or the RUC. It is easy to come out with a story about "shoot to kill", but it is different when people are proved innocent.

Those lads and lasses are in grave danger. They have fought honourably to defend all the citizens of the United Kingdom. The House should give them as much backing as possible, and I shall do so tonight.

10.45 pm

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): We should all have more respect for the denunciations of violence by the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea) if it was not for the fact that he and members of his party have such close entanglements with loyalist paramilitaries who engage in sectarian assassination——

Rev. William McCrea: Name one.

Ms. Short: The hon. Gentleman knows that that is true.

Rev. William McCrea: I challenge the hon. Lady to name one.

Ms. Short: The motion that we are discussing——

Rev. William McCrea: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. A serious charge has been made against an honourable Member of the House. I ask the hon. Lady to name one murderer with whom I have been associated, and I should prefer it if she did it outside——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that no breach of our Standing Orders has been committed. That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Ms. Short: Everyone in Northern Ireland knows that the leader of the hon. Gentleman's party has been photographed marching along the streets with masked loyalist paramilitaries.

Rev. William McCrea: Say it outside.

Ms. Short: I shall happily say it outside, and have done so already.

[Ms. Short]

The motion that we are debating is deeply undemocratic and very insidious. On the word of one letter from the Home Secretary, the views that are voted for by as many as 42 per cent. of the nationalist population in Northern Ireland can no longer be reported on our broadcasting media.

Conservative Members have talked as if their denunciations of the violence of the IRA—they talked exclusively about that, not about loyalist paramilitary violence—will remove it from the face of the earth If only it were so. The problem that I should like to put to the ex-producer of "Blue Peter", the hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), is that 42 per cent. of the nationalist population in Northern Ireland are willing to vote for Sinn Fein——

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): Disgraceful.

Ms. Short: The hon. Gentleman says, "Disgraceful." What are we supposed to do when a significant part of the population of the United Kingdom holds those views? Should we try to understand why? Should we allow the British people to try to do so? What an extraordinary thing it is that such a large number of people who are religious, who care for and love their children and elderly relatives and who are good people in every way that we assess other human beings are willing to vote in that way. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) does not like it, but it is a fact.

What should we do? Should we remove that from our broadcasting? Should we not allow the British people to know it? Should we not allow them to hear why people are willing to vote in that way? That is what we are doing now. It will not remove the support for such violence or voting, but we are trying to prevent the British people from understanding why people in Northern Ireland are willing to vote in that way.

That is to talk only of the nationalist community. We know that in the loyalist community there is deep ambivalence when it comes to support for illegal activity. At times it supports it and associates itself with it and at other times it pretends that it is not prepared to do so.

The tragedy of Northern Ireland was born of the threat of revolution and mutiny in the British armed forces. Violence has been used by those on all sides of the argument ever since Ireland was partitioned. That is part of the reality that we must face. The British people are entitled to know that the Government want to lessen their ability to understand the facts.

In what way do the Government lessen the ability of the British people to understand? They say that anything that is said by those who defend or support the use of violence in Northern Ireland can be reported in our newspapers. It can be reported by others who quote their words. We can see pictures of those who speak in support of this view, and an actor can produce a voice-over. That is laid down in a Home Office letter. That is not an interpretation of the ruling by lawyers at the BBC and the IBA. That sort of reporting is allowed, but the people are not allowed to speak for themselves.

There is something deeply wrong with that. One advantage of the broadcasting media—television and radio—is that people can see for themselves the individuals who espouse a cause and advance an argument. The public can make an assessment of such individuals, and that embraces their rationality, sincerity, attractiveness or ugliness.

It is notable that, on the "Call Nick Ross" programme, during which members of the public were telephoning to express support for the ban that was to be imposed on the broadcasting of those who support terrorism, there was reference to the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley), the leader of the Democratic Unionist party. The general understanding of many who phoned in to the programme was that the hon. Gentleman would no longer be able to broadcast on the media. That was extremely interesting.

Where are we now? The views of those who defend and support terrorism can be broadcast but the people are not to be allowed to judge for themselves what they think of those who hold that view. And the Conservative party told us that it was opposed to the nanny state. It seems that they do not trust the British people to make their own judgment. They find it necessary to intervene to prevent the British public from hearing why people in Northern Ireland are willing to kill one another in the course of their political disagreements.

Few Conservative Members have opposed the Government's policy, and the speeches in favour of it have gone much further than the ban that we are discussing. The speeches of many Conservative Members advocate complete censorship across the broadcasting media and the press. As it is inevitable that the ban will not work, it is inevitable that it will not reduce the level of violence. Indeed, it is likely to help to increase it.

I have no doubt that the demands of certain Conservative Members will be met in a few months' time. There will then be a further tightening of the screw and it will not be possible to produce a voice-over. A reporter will not be able to say why those who engage in violence seek to explain their involvement in it, and the ban will be extended to the press. That is the road that we are going down, and it is an extremely dangerous one.

We already have too much censorship of the broadcasting media in their coverage of Northern Ireland. It is vital that British people should understand why so many in Northern Ireland are willing to defend the use of violence in the advocacy of their political views.

Not long ago I watched a television programme that dealt with the father of a young British soldier who had been killed in Northern Ireland. The father went to Northern Ireland and he was filmed as he met representatives of the communities. He met an old man —he was sitting in his front room—whose son was imprisoned for having been involved in a paramilitary murder. The old man said that he was proud of his son. He said that he supported him. He thought his son was right and that the action in which he had engaged was necessary to achieve Irish freedom.

The father of the British soldier talked also with those in the other communities. When he returned, he said that he was glad that he made the journey and that he understood more about Ireland as a result of making it.

That was a useful television programme, but it would be illegal to make such a programme under the ban. The father of the British soldier would not be able to make the journey in an effort to understand affairs as they are in Northern Ireland.

We have to understand what is happening in Northern Ireland so that we can begin to attempt to put things right.

The House is outrageous in its neglect of the problems in Northern Ireland. Most hon. Members take no interest in Northern Ireland and do not visit it. It is treated like a colony. As long as the violence is contained over there, hon. Members hardly care. Because my father and others in my family come from Northern Ireland, I take a lot of trouble to visit it frequently. I take great care to try to meet representatives of both communities. I have had endless discussions with people in both communities who support the use of violence about why it happens. I want to understand the reasons and to remove the causes and the violence.

What do Conservative Members want to do? They want to contain the violence in Northern Ireland, allow it to continue and put a smokescreen over it and pretend that it is not happening. They do not want to allow the British people to understand why it is happening so that they can engage in the search for a solution to the problems. That is dangerous.

There has been much talk about the "oxygen of publicity" for terrorism. It is not the words of those who support the bullets and the bomb that get the publicity; the bullets and the bomb lead to the publicity. To remove the publicity, will we not have to go one step further? Will we not have to say that it is an offence to report that the bullets and the bombs are used in Northern Ireland? In response to the ban, the IRA said, "There is only one thing they understand—the gun. We have a way of speaking to them if they ban us from speaking. We can use violence to get our message across."

Anyone who tries to follow events in Northern Ireland will be aware of the debate in Sinn Fein and the IRA about whether to reduce the amount of violence they use and to rely instead on the politics of Sinn Fein and the ballot box. It would have been desirable if those who say that they should follow the political route had won, and there had been less violence from the republican side in Northern Ireland.

What is now likely to be the conclusion? All those who said, "Britain will not listen to reason; Britain will not listen to us when we act politically; Britain will not listen to our words; the only things that Britain understands are the bullet and the bomb," will feel vindicated. They will say, "We told you. There are banning directions. How can you use political action instead of political violence? They won't listen to us." They will feel strengthened. This move will increase the violence in Northern Ireland.

Those who are not allowed to broadcast include not just the representatives of the IRA, UDA, Sinn Fein and UVF but those who support their views. We must ask: who is to say who supports their views? When we were first told about the directions, I thought that the Government would go only for the IRA, Sinn Fein and so on, and then in a year or so they would start to question politicians who question the status quo in Northern Ireland and who, like me, believe that there will not be a solution until we get rid of partition and the border. I thought that the Government would start to say, "Because you advocate the same end as Sinn Fein and the IRA, you are not allowed to speak either."

What happened? We heard about the directions. On Sunday, an article in The Observer suggested that, because I was going to Antrim to go on "Any Questions" and because I hold the kind of views I do, I should not be allowed to broadcast. Conservative Members may think that that is okay. Later, there was an article in The Times suggesting that I should not be allowed to broadcast. On that occasion, I was allowed to broadcast, but the hierarchy of the BBC went to Antrim to see whether there were any problems there. I wonder what will happen next time. Perhaps the broadcasters will stop inviting people like me to broadcast. That will be another form of censorship. This is the road down which we are going. That is the danger for our country.

I have a sense of foreboding. The Government are ripping out the strategies that lay behind the Anglo-Irish Agreement. The agreement said that we had to stop the advance of Sinn Fein—[Interruption.] Hon. Members may disagree, but that is my understanding of the strategy behind it. The British Government were so worried by the advance of Sinn Fein and by political support for Sinn Fein that they decided to deliver reform to the nationalist community in Northern Ireland. They promised association with Dublin, improvements in the criminal justice system, respect for the Irish language and so on. None of those reforms has been delivered. Instead, we see repression. In addition to this ban, the right to silence is to be ended and an oath is to be demanded from people standing for election.

It is rumoured that the Government are looking for further examples of measures from the Republic of Ireland. But what is wrong in the Republic of Ireland is wrong here. The fact that something happens in the Republic of Ireland does not make it right here. We shall certainly not be intimidated by the argument that we should look to the Republic of Ireland for examples. Divorce is not allowed in the Republic of Ireland. Are those who shout that we should imitate the Republic in favour of that? We are told that the Government are thinking of proposing that in future someone may be accused of being a member of a paramilitary organisation on the say-so of one policemen and will have no defence.

The Government are getting rid of reform and going for repression. Under a smokescreen of censorship, the violence may be let rip. The British people will not be allowed to understand it, and the real danger is that bloodshed and death on the present scale will continue indefinitely in Northern Ireland. That is a real prospect, and the action of the Secretary of State makes it more rather than less likely.

11.3 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): When the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) goes back to Northern Ireland, perhaps she will take with her a straight message from the House. There will, indeed, be repression. There will be repression against men of violence who use the bomb, the car bomb and the bullet to maim and injure innocent people. Opposition Members may have some doubts about the introduction of measures to deal with terrorism, but there is no doubt about Conservative Members' resolve to do so. Conservative Members do not vote against renewing the prevention of terrorism orders, whereas Labour Members repeatedly do.

Although the hon. Member for Ladywood introduced a certain divisive note into our proceedings, we have had a good debate. I start by reminding the House of Voltaire's saying:

> "I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it."

That is an adage to which most hon. Members would subscribe, even if there is a degree of intolerance among

[Mr. Gerald Howarth]

Labour Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) made that point, and we fully respect his views on the matter. Voltaire did not, however, say, "I disapprove of what you do, but I will defend to the death your right to do it." While we may be prepared to defend someone's right to say something, we do not defend their right to perpetrate certain acts.

Parliament is well advised to discuss carefully a measure that is introducing a degree of limitation on freedom of expression and to a certain extent restricting the rights of broadcasters. It is absolutely right that we should have had the opportunity of such a long debate.

I do not think that simple concern with freedom of expression should inhibit us from taking action where it is necessary and justified. A compelling case has been presented to us by the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea), who told us what hon. Members from Ulster go through day in, day out, in their constituencies as they attend funerals and console the bereaved. The IRA and its supporters show no signs of letting up their unremitting, unspeakable programme of brutal killings, which are as calculated and cowardly as any committed anywhere in the world by repressive organisations.

We approach this debate against the background of what is happening in Northern Ireland. It affects us, as individual Members of Parliament. Some right hon. and hon. Members have to put up with onerous restraints on their day-to-day lives merely because the IRA continually threatens them and their families. They cannot behave like ordinary people, because they are always under threat from those cowardly and brutal people. The IRA and its supporters undoubtedly revel in the publicity and authority that broadcasting confers on them. Broadcasting, particularly by television, is a far more potent medium than the printed word, which is why my right hon. Friend was right to make a distinction between broadcasting and the written word.

I agree with my hon. Friends who have suggested that the broadcasters have failed to comply with their own guidelines. Many examples of that, such as the programme "Real Lives", have been given in the debate. Had they observed those guidelines, we might not have been in this position today. The broadcasters cannot completely absolve themselves of any resposibility for what is going on in Northern Ireland, or for this measure.

Too often the need for balance is used by broadcasters as an excuse to give air time to terrorists. There can be no balance between law-abiding citizens who seek to bring about change by peacefully persuading their fellow citizens of the need for it, and terrorists. I do not see why terrorists and their apologists should enjoy the same benefits of a civilised society as are enjoyed by the rest of the people, who forswear the gun and the bomb.

Some broadcasters are so arrogant that they do not believe they are part of this country. That was the problem during the Falklands campaign, when our troops were referred to as the British troops. There can be no excuse, either, for the Thames Television programme "Death on the Rock". I and most of my hon. Friends thought it an outrageous attempt to scour the Rock to find someone to say something to undermine the SAS. To judge from my post—perhaps other hon. Members have read different views in theirs—most British people completely supported the noble efforts of the SAS to prevent bloodshed and mayhem in Gibraltar.

Some hon. Members have suggested that the Government are heading down a slippery slope. I am surprised at that view. They have all paid tribute to the liberal nature of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and to suggest that he would be party to sliding down such a slope would be to misunderstand his character. I see no slippery slope. We are waging war against terrorism——

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howarth: I would rather not; time is short.

This war is being waged throughout the United Kingdom. We accept certain restrictions as a result. Northern Ireland has the Diplock courts and the presence of armed soldiers, although I may say that on my four-day visit there I saw only two armed soldiers. We accept these restrictions, sad though it is that we must impose them. This further restriction should be accepted, too.

We are at war with the IRA and it is right to use appropriate measures. During the second world war nobody said that we should not have internment or any of the other draconian measures that were brought in to deal with the situation.

The man who represents Sinn Fein and who got himself elected to this House spoke on Radio Ulster on the day that Sir Kenneth Bloomfield's house was bombed. I was in Northern Ireland on that day. On that programme he warned civil servants of the risks that they were running in working for the security services. He said that the IRA was giving them a chance to resign. As the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster so rightly said, that explicitly illustrates that Sinn Fein is but the mouthpiece of the IRA.

There is a remedy for those in Sinn Fein who do not like what the Government are doing. They can renounce violence. If they do that the House might take a different view of them, but as long as Sinn Fein has representatives such as Gerry Adams saying what he does, the House is right to take its present view of Sinn Fein.

The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) is not in the Chamber. He suggested that the Home Secretary was under pressure to bring this motion before the House. There is no doubt about that. However, the pressure did not come simply from Conservative Members, because some of my hon. Friends oppose the motion. The pressure comes from the British people, who want something to be done. We must be careful to resist pressure to do the wrong thing. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary acknowledged that this measure would not in itself stop terrorism. However, it is a more constructive approach than the one adopted by some Opposition Members who meet members of Sinn Fein and invite them to attend Labour party gatherings.

This measure is constructive. It is designed to try to help, and it attempts to respond to the legitimate concerns of our people. Hon. Members are entitled to respond to those concerns. The measure does not restrict the reporting of opinions, but deprives those who are the front men for the perpetrators of violence of the authority that television confers upon them. This step is supported by the great majority of the British people. One of my hon. Friends mentioned a MORI poll reported in a recent edition of the Reader's Digest. That showed that 69 per cent. of people interviewed believed that terrorist organisations should not be allowed, under any circumstance to express their views on television. Sixty-six per cent. felt that the reporting on television of terrorist activities enhanced the status of terrorists.

Quite clearly, this measure enjoys the support of the people. If the high percentage of people supporting the measure are all Tories, that demonstrates the low level to which the Labour party has sunk in public opinion. Similar measures have already been taken in the Republic of Ireland, and the British broadcasting authorities are able to reach most of the people in the Republic. I hope that Governor Dukakis will be told that the Republic of Ireland has more draconian measures than those being introduced by our Government. These measures demonstrate the commitment of the Government to deal with the men of violence. That is why I support the motion.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Parts of the speech by the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) justify Opposition apprehensions about the motion. Conservative Members have made much of the level of terrorism and the atrocities. No Opposition Member in any way justifies the terrorism and the atrocities carried out by the Provisional IRA or by sectarian killers on the other side in Northern Ireland. We are all opposed to terrorism and violence. I have always taken the view that, even if the campaign that has been waged over 18 years brought the IRA success in its objective, a united Ireland brought about by killing and terrorism would not be viable and would not be able to survive. That is all the more reason to be against not only terrorism and violence, from whichever side in Northern Ireland it comes, but the methods of the IRA.

I do not deny that I want a united Ireland, but I want an Ireland united through consent and negotiation—certainly negotiation involving the people of Northern Ireland and of the Republic. Above all else, there must be consensus, or such a unitary state could not survive.

Mr. Hunter: Will the hon. Gentleman include in the thesis that he is propounding a direct explanation of why and how, a fortnight ago, Haringey borough council had on its premises an exhibition extolling the virtues of the IRA?

Mr. Winnick: I will give the hon. Gentleman some satisfaction when I express my view as a Member of Parliament. I was not in favour of the exhibition, and I did not know about it until I read about it in a London paper. I know that, once he was notified, the leader of the council made sure that the exhibition received no funding from the council. What purpose is served by raking up all these matters when we are concerned, as a House of Commons, to oppose terrorism and try to make progress? Such interventions do not help the victims or the potential victims of the IRA.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): The hon. Gentleman is condemning terrorism in a most forceful way. Would he include in that condemnation the African National Congress?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That is straying rather far from the motion.

Mr. Winnick: It is difficult to imagine a more stupidly irrelevant question than one which linked the position in southern Africa with that in Northern Ireland. I had always assumed that Northern Ireland was part of the United Kingdom, that democracy existed in Northern Ireland, and that everyone there, no matter how nationalist or republican, could vote. That is why we have my hon. Friends the Members for Foyle (Mr. Hume) and for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon), who take a nationalist point of view. They have not been deprived of the right to vote. The situation in southern Africa is totally different.

Are we to take it that, as a result of the Government's ban, there will be any reduction in violence? Will a single life be saved from terrorism in Northern Ireland or on the mainland? The Home Secretary has not suggested that one would. He has not argued that the motion will reduce the level of violence.

Much has been said about the votes for Sinn Fein. I believe—I may be as wrong as any other person—that though the leaders of Sinn Fein have links with the IRA—and I would not wish to deny that—not all those who vote for Sinn Fein in Northern Ireland necessarily support the terrorist campaign. They vote that way, or a large number do, for all kinds of reasons—deprivation and economic and housing misery. Therefore, it would not be right to conclude that all voters for Sinn Fein are necessarily supporters of terrorism.

I take the view that, at most, the leaders of Sinn Fein look on the ban as a mild irritation, although they may say different things publicly and give the impression that they view this as a great setback. Some Tory Members may say that even if it is only a mild irritation, it is better than nothing. We should compare that with the unfavourable propaganda that this country suffers abroad, particularly in the United States. The supporters of the Provisional IRA in the United States—Noraid, the hard-core supporters of terrorism living there—want to persuade the majority of Americans of Irish origin that Britain is totally in the wrong and that the struggle waged by the Provisional IRA is justified. That is not my view, as I have already explained to the House. I believe that the ban provides further ammunition for the propaganda of the supporters of Noraid and the supporters of the Provisional IRA in various European countries who want to portray this country as waging a colonial war in Northern Ireland. They will say that the British Government are so terrified of the representatives of the Provisional Sinn Fein appearing on television that they have to take this step.

Have the broadcasting authorities abused their power? Is it being argued today that the supporters and leaders of Provisional Sinn Fein have been interviewed constantly? Like most hon. Members, I do not watch television all that often, but in the television news that I have seen I have not seen the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) interviewed so often. I have certainly seen him interviewed when there has been a particular atrocity that has embarrassed the Provisional IRA and Provisional Sinn Fein. I have seen the hon. Gentleman trying to explain and rationalise something which simply cannot be explained away. Surely it is right and proper for the broadcasting authorities to interview someone like the hon. Member for Belfast, West when some atrocity has been carried out and civilians have been killed so that millions of people can see the hon. Gentleman trying to explain that atrocity. Is there any evidence that people are persuaded by what the hon.

[Mr. Winnick]

Member for Belfast, West has to say? Do they listen to him or to any of his colleagues when they are interviewed and say, "That is a rational argument"? There is no evidence whatsoever of that. Therefore, I do not accept that the broadcasting authorities have abused their power.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Winnick: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I shall not give way as time is getting on.

In his statement on 19 October the Home Secretary said:

"Broadcasters have a dangerous and unenviable task in reporting events in Northern Ireland. This step is no criticism of them."—[Official Report, 19 October 1988; Vol. 138, c. 885.]

So the Home Secretary is not suggesting for one moment that the broadcasting authorities are wrong.

I believe that the ban is a panic reaction on the part of the Prime Minister. I blame the Prime Minister far more than the Home Secretary. I believe that when the Prime Minister heard about the further atrocities carried out by the Provisional IRA during the summer recess, she came to the conclusion that something had to be done and therefore the ban was imposed. My criticism of the Home Secretary is that he should have resisted the Prime Minister. He should have told the Prime Minister that this is not the way to go about it; that this will not help. Instead, the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland went along with the Prime Minister.

My final point has already been echoed by my hon. Friends. I believe that the Government have an authoritarian streak. In many ways, the Government have tried to undermine some of our liberties. I believe, for instance, that there has been a vendetta against the broadcasting authorities, first and foremost by the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), when he was the chairman of the Tory party, who put totally unfair and unjustified pressure on the broadcasting authorities, and particularly on the BBC. If we are faced with a Government with an authoritarian streak, as the Opposition we should be all the more on our guard to ensure that no steps are taken which further undermine any of our traditional liberties.

Of course, we shall lose the vote tonight. I am pleased that one or two Conservative Members have understood our concern and, whether or not they vote with us, realise what is at stake. I believe that the ban that has been imposed on the broadcasting authorities is wrong. It is not justified; it will not reduce the level of terrorism; and it will put us in the wrong internationally. That is why I shall vote against it.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) has suggested that if we in the House introduce what he would consider to be illiberal measures, it will increase the level of support for the IRA in the United States. The level of support for the IRA in the United States is dependent on one thing alone, and that is the number of people it kills. If we can introduce measures in the House that will cut back the carnage in Northern Ireland, we will cut back the support for the IRA in the United States.

We have had from the Opposition an emotional plea in favour of editorial freedom. We are all in favour of editorial freedom. What do they mean by "editorial freedom"? What is it that they are seeking to support? Is it the editorial freedom that is currently enjoyed by The Sun newspaper? If that is what they are trying to defend, it is a novel aspect from the Labour party. I wonder whether the Opposition appreciate the changing nature and the imperatives of today's media.

We heard an eloquent speech from my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale). Do they realise that the media today are not about informing the public; they are about entertaining and stimulating the public? The media today seek to shock and titillate rather than to sustain serious debate. I am a little surprised that the Opposition seek to justify the form of editorial freedom, the "anything goes", irresponsible editorial freedom, that has been abused so much so that it can be used and abused by the IRA in its perverted campaign.

The Opposition say that they have a passionate commitment to freedom of speech. Conservative Members have a passionate commitment to freedom of speech. I wonder whether they have. Is it consistent with the thought police of the Left wing of the Labour party that we have seen marching up and down and parading throughout our country over the past few years? Do they support the freedom of speech for anyone, however evil? Do they support it for racists, murderers and child molesters? Would they support giving freedom of speech to Adolf Hitler, or to anyone, whatever damage they cause or however intolerant or intolerable they may be?

I am a little worried that the Opposition do not understand, after all our history, the value and effect of propaganda. Was Dr. Goebbels wrong? Was he naive? Were all those hours he spent broadcasting on German radio wasted? Did he waste all that time he spent carefully crafting and orchestrating his perverted and dreadful message? Do they want to allow the IRA the same opportunities and the same access to the media so that it can build up its image and credibility? That is what it would seek to do if it could.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) said that she felt that it was useful and worthwhile to allow people to come on our media to defend the right to kill. Is that what she really meant—to "defend"—or was it to sell, justify and propagate their evil campaign?

We are all concerned for civil liberties, but is not the greatest civil liberty the right to life? Over 2,500 people in Northern Ireland have been killed in this murderous campaign. That is equivalent to 100,000 people in the United Kingdom as a whole. Does the IRA think that if we had been suffering that level of violence on the mainland of the United Kingdom we would tolerate for one moment what we have been tolerating to date? The terrorists will grab every opportunity to parade on our television screens, not because they want to extend the intellectual debate but because it helps their cause. The objective of the measure is to starve them of the oxygen of publicity. The Government are right, and I support them.

11.29 pm

Ms. Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): I have only three points to make, and I shall do so succinctly.

Conservative Members have challenged Labour Members to say whether they support the African National Congress. I tell them that I do, and I shall happily give way to the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) so that he can say why he supports the terrorist South African regime——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We have a narrow motion before us relating to Northern Ireland.

Ms. Abbott: The subject was introduced by the hon. Member for Gillingham; I was merely responding to it.

I have only two objections to the motion, one in practice and one in principle. My objection in practice is that, contrary to the hours and hours of speeches we heard from Conservative Members, the motion will do nothing to diminish the level of Northern Ireland's problems. The motion is propaganda, and the cynical politics of the gesture.

Conservative Members have spoken as if in a fundamental and essential way the IRA gains its political legitimacy from appearing on television, which is nonsense. The IRA's political legitimacy derives from the history of British involvement in Northern Ireland, from the abuses of power of the British occupying forces in Northern Ireland and, above all, from the fact that, contrary to what Conservative Members might like to think, the IRA has proved that it has the mass support of the Catholic electorate of Northern Ireland. Some 35 per cent. of the Catholic electorate vote for Sinn Fein. Labour Members believe that it is not the business of responsible politicians to try to pretend that Republican opinion does not exist and that it should be banished from the screen.

If the Government want to strike at the root of the IRA's political legitimacy, they must address the problems of history, the British Army and, above all, the fact that tens of thousands of people are happy to vote for Sinn Fein in a secret ballot. Nothing that Conservative Members have said has addressed those facts. My objection in practice to the motion is that it is cynical, it is the politics of the gesture and will not alter the number of killings in Northern Ireland by one.

My objection in principle is the attack that the motion makes on civil liberties. That argument has been well rehearsed so I shall not repeat it.

Nobody is saying that sombody should be allowed to go on television or radio and commit a crime or incite anyone to commit a criminal act. Merely because some Conservative Members or some members of the public find an individual or political party offensive, that is not a reason to ban them. If the Government wish to present a coherent position, they should ban Sinn Fein. Until it is a proscribed organisation, there is no intellectual consistency in allowing it to contest elections but not allowing its members to appear on television. In practice, the motion is wrong, in principle it is intellectually dishonest and Labour Members will vote against it.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): May I refute at the outset what the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) said? At no time did my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) defend the right of any person to kill. That was a foul calumny, and I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman uttered it.

Mr. Marlow: I said that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) defended the right of people to appear on television and defend the right to kill.

Mr. McNamara: My hon. Friend the Member for Ladywood did not say that.

Labour Members oppose this ban because we believe that it is wrong in principle and in expediency. It is an ill-considered measure that creates more problems than it solves and has nothing to do with the real difficulties that exist in Northern Ireland.

If it could be proved that the measure was justified in terms of expediency, there could be a case that the Opposition would have to consider more seriously. As it is, the broadcasting restrictions are so patently absurd that they should be dismissed out of hand.

In the ancient world, the messenger who brought bad news was liable to be silenced by a swift stroke of the sword. That is the sort of logic that underpins the order. Our ancestors eventually realised that bad news was better than no news, and put a stop to such practices. To pursue a sensible course of action, it is necessary to be well informed. In a democracy, that necessity extends to the citizens as a whole, because they have their part to play in the formation of policy.

It is clear that such limitations on the freedom of broadcasting were adopted hastily, without any serious thought about either their effect or their implementation. They are a panic response to the tragic and horrific events of this summer—a response inspired by the Prime Minister who, judging by her extraordinary interview in The Times, seems to be at variance with her Ministers about the temporary or permanent nature of the provisions. She referred to the suspension of civil liberties, but her Ministers have given no sign that the measures are not designed to be permanent. She said that the measures "have to suspend some of your civil liberties for a time." We are entitled to know whether they are meant to be permanent or temporary.

The Prime Minister's contempt for her Ministers was shown when she apparently did not tell the Home Secretary about her attitude before he made his statement in the House. The right hon. Gentleman's position is rather tragic. He is, in many ways, striking a pose, pretending to be resonant in his fight against the paramilitaries. Yet he knows from his experience in Northern Ireland and from the advice given by the Department—which his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has stood out against in the past—that in fact he is making a useless gesture.

It is a panic ban—that is quite clear from the developments since the original statement in the House. The truth is that the Government do not know what they are doing. They do not know what the ban is supposed to cover. They have already had to repeat and issue further clarifications to the broadcasting authorities.

That uncertainty pervades even the television companies. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said, there has been the ludicrous spectacle of a programme cleared by Channel 4 lawyers being prohibited by the laywers of IBA. The lawyers are now making the programmes, not the professional broadcasters.

The Government have not made it clear who or what is to be banned. The Government do not know and the broadcasting authorities are unclear. I shall cite some examples. Can Robert Kee's outstanding series on Irish history, "The Green Flag", now be repeated on television? Will there be the strange spectacle of Gerry Adams holding forth on election programmes while the Open university will be prevented from allowing the Taoiseach in the Republic to talk about his father-in-law, the former Taoiseach, because of his participation in the Easter rising?

Even the right to report court proceedings—an essential requirement if justice is to be seen to be done—is not included in the two specific exceptions that the Home Secretary mentioned. We are entitled to know whether, in fact, that protection still exists.

What about the problems of fiction, which is being examined carefully by the broadcasting authorities? What do we make of O'Casey's "The Shadow of the Gunman"? Can we see or hear that on our television or radio? What about songs and music—for example, "The Rising of the Moon", "Who fears to speak of 98" and "The Sash"? Can we hear all those songs, which, in their various ways, attempt to support men of violence?

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) rose——

Mr. McNamara: With the greatest respect to the hon. Gentleman, I do not wish to give way.

Some hon. Members from Northern Ireland, especially the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea), praised the Home Secretary's action. However, any rigorous and impartial enforcement of the restrictions could well affect some members of the Unionist parties in Northern Ireland. Of Northern Ireland parties, only the Social Democratic and Labour party and the Alliance party have never flirted with paramilitaries. We know what the SDLP says to Sinn Fein, becaue it told us and it has published it. What we do not know is what some Unionist politicians discuss when they hob-nob with the UDA.

For example, do Members of the House who dress in paramilitary garb and make scarcely veiled threats to employ their illegally held shotguns for political purposes fall under the non-person category that will not be allowed on television, except for reports of what they say in the House? Will the leader of an armed incursion into the Republic of Ireland be granted free access to television and radio? Yet, when the rumour that we shall have the matter before the House was first mooted, will he be the first to rush to the media to support the ban against men of violence?

I for one, and my hon. Friends, would be opposed to depriving the British public and the public of all these islands of their right to hear the views of hon. Members from Northern Ireland, whether they are Unionists of the sort that I have described or otherwise. If people are allowed to continue unimpeded—if the ban does not impinge upon them—they will once again be able to bring the British presence in Northern Ireland into disrepute. That is another example of the need to be even-handed, not just with the UDA, which I welcome if we are to have the resolution, but with all people who are associated with people of violence. They must all be included, even if they are Members of this House, and even if they take their seats in this House.

There is another consideration which reveals how the Government's surrender to apparent expediency is short-sighted and counter-productive. For decades, the Foreign Office has resisted all approaches from foreign Governments to interfere with broadcasting on the ground that broadcasters are independent of the state. Now, however, the Home Secretary has opened the floodgates, and the Foreign Office is being besieged by various Governments. I understand that the Indian Government are looking for restrictions on Sikh nationalists. Presumably the Government will give equal consideration to requests from the Nicaraguan and Afghan Governments to ban the contras and the Mujaheddin from the World Service.

I heard carefully what the Home Secretary said about the measure being limited specifically to the problems in Northern Ireland, but he knows as well as I do that every foreign Government will accuse him and the British Government of hypocrisy on this matter, and challenge our bona fides if we do not practise abroad what we preach at home. Again, it is abundantly clear that the Government do not appreciate the international dimensions of the issue.

The Home Secretary tried to draw a distinction between people who had recently gone to the United States and were supporters of Fine Gael and Fianna Fail and would understand the reason for the ban, and others who view it differently. He does not seem to have taken on board the very first amendment of the American constitution, which I put to him, which states:

> "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the Press".

People in the United States will say, "You are flying right against one of the most cherished parts of our constitution." That will provide Noraid with ammunition and ability.

Sir Giles Shaw (Pudsey): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McNamara: No.

That is quite apart from the Home Secretary's complete misunderstanding of the Irish-American context, where it is not just recent immigrants there who have found that happening. That view is found all the way through the Irish-American context.

Sir Giles Shaw rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has made it clear that he will not give way.

Mr. McNamara: It is apparent that, once again, the international community has reacted unfavourably to the terms of this order. Once again, Britain, which used to boast of its democratic traditions and exported them throughout the world, is now becoming a cause of concern because a certain group are making themselves ridiculous by their actions.

The Prime Minister will now make criminals of foreign broadcasters if they beam their programmes into Britain by satellite. When, in her famous interview in The Times, she was asked what she would do about satellite television broadcasting, she said:

> "The only thing we could do here is to make it an offence to beam such stuff into the country if need be."

Are we to have legislation to outlaw satellite television which extols the virtues of the IRA? She is talking rubbish and the Government are behaving in a rubbishy manner.

Those are only the practical difficulties of this problem. There are matters which are wrong, not for practical reasons but in principle. The term "McCarthyite" is bandied about in a way which diminishes the full horrors of that period, but this is a case where it applies. Not only are the paramilitaries and some of their political allies to be banned from the airways, but so is anyone whom the broadcasting authorities might possibly believe might possibly say something which might possibly appear to be supportive of their political stance. They, too, will be denied access to radio and television.

Given the sort of arguments that are often used in this House, such as that the Anglo-Irish Agreement gives succour to the paramilitaries, even people who support the Government's policy could be subject to vilification. That is not the nonsense that it appears at first sight. It is a problem of the Government's creation. They are damaging the credibility of the media and the democratic process. This is worse than anything that P.W. Botha ever dreamed up.

Sir Giles Shaw rose——

Mr. McNamara: At least in South Africa——

Sir Giles Shaw: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McNamara: No.

Bans are imposed on named individuals or groups, and reports are proceeded by a censorship warning. Will we have on our television screens, "This programme has been presented subject to the censorship rules of the British Government"? If it were to happen, what a terrible time it would be in the history of British broadcasting and of this Government.

What is worse, there will be no safeguards, even such as those that exist in South Africa. There will be secret blacklists, like those of the Economic League. People will be banned from the airwaves without their knowledge or any redress, and they will be unable to confront their accusers. Furthermore, the possibility of democratic and intelligent discussion of the conflict in Northern Ireland will disappear.

Sir Giles Shaw: Rubbish.

Mr. McNamara: The real problem is that I agree with everything that the hon. Gentleman is saying about these orders. I only wish that he had got up during the debate and said that they are rubbish.

Sir Giles Shaw rose——

Mr. McNamara: This is perhaps the worst——

Sir Giles Shaw rose——

Mr. McNamara: The hon. Gentleman may indeed be rubbish, but he was not the one who was saying it of the measure.

Mr. Couchman: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) to suggest that hon. Members on this side have been drinking all evening?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows that that is not a point of order for me. We are having a serious debate.

Mr. McNamara: Those who have been drinking are in a happy position. Some of us have been waiting here for five or six hours for an opportunity to get one down before we go home.

The worst feature of the ban is that it will hinder the growth of understanding of these issues on these islands. In recent years, there has been much greater and much more informed interest in the conflict. It would be damaging if this process were now to be reversed, which is exactly what the Government are intent upon doing. They make offensive and unsubstantiated claims about the irresponsibility of the media, when we know how cautious and self-restrained the broadcasting authorities have been.

I recall the fight that I had with BBC Northern Ireland to get a minute and a half to reply to the Secretary of State's outrageous statements about taking away the right of silence. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook said, it is not as though members of the IRA were on every programme every day and we had to avoid them. The figures that he produced showed how difficult it has been for the IRA to appear on the screens, and how difficult the broadcasting media had made it for its programme producers to get their programmes on to the air. Yet we have now reached a further stage in the Prime Minister's campaign to subjugate the media, to censor all criticism and to destroy free speech.

Too often Northern Ireland has been used as a test bed for repressive legislation. We are now entitled to ask whether similar restrictions will be imposed on coverage of social unrest on this island when that periodically breaks out in mainland cities. Is this the thin edge of the wedge for such situations? Nothing in the Government's record should rule out such fears. It is already far too difficult for the media to make programmes about Ireland. It will now have even greater hesitation to inform the public of the realities of the situation in the Province. The damage that will be inflicted will be not on the IRA or on the UDR, but on those who seek to expose the bankruptcy of the policies of the paramilitaries.

I object to the ban on the ground that one does not defeat paramilitaries by turning one's head away from them. The problems of Northern Ireland are too real and too immediate. The Government refuse to tackle the roots of violence, and resort to measures such as this. In the words of the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis)—with whose diagnosis of the problems of Northern Ireland, I would disagree, but with whose assessment of the value of the measure I would agree—the Government are merely tinkering with the periphery of the problem.

It is because the Labour party wants to stop the terrorism—not just to shut our ears to it—to regain the support of all sections of the community in Northern Ireland for the rule of law, and to have an impartial administration of justice that it opposes these provisions, which are counter-productive, dangerous for our civil liberties on this island, too, and succour for all those who are named in the measure.

11.52 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Tim Renton): Apart from the ludicrous remark of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) that the restrictions we are debating are more restrictive than anything ever introduced by P. W. Botha, this has been a serious and passionate debate.

I thank all my hon. Friends who have spoken in support of the motion, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson) for his powerful contribution, in which he spoke of the need for the media not to be equivocal in its approach to terrorism. That point was reinforced by the eloquent remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale). I should like to thank, too, my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) for his thoughtful speech in which he said that in a free society it was right that our right hon. Friend the Home Secretary should be given the powers that he has exercised in relation to the restriction on the broadcasting authorities. He also said that television coverage of terrorist acts can encourage other terrorist acts. I take note of the allegations that he made at the end of his remarks.

I am mindful, too, of the speeches at the end of the debate by my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth), who reminded us how much more potent a medium television is than the newspapers, and by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), with his passionate defence of free speech. That leads me to my first point in reply to the debate.

The House is rightly jealous of free speech. That applies to hon. Members on both sides of the House, but let us get the perspective right. What we are debating is not a restriction on the freedom of speech. It is not a restriction on the freedom of information in Northern Ireland. It is simply a targeted measure that we are undertaking to prevent terrorists and their supporters from exploiting the broadcasting media by direct access to them.

Why are we doing this? Why did the House vote by a majority recently to televise our proceedings? The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) agreed that he had voted for that. We are all agreed that television today is regarded as so powerful, so immediate, so vivid and so able to give respectability to those who appear on the screen that all politicians need it. All politicians take advantage of it. Whether or not we like the expression "the oxygen of publicity", we all experience it by appearing on television. Surely it is for that reason that at election time we have such strict rules on access to television—a complete ban on paid advertising, too. We have no such restrictions on newspapers at election time.

All the evidence suggests that the importance that Sinn Fein and the hon. Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams), whose name has been mentioned so much during the debate, attach to television is no less—in fact, rather more—than that of other politicians. Surely that is why camera crews are given access to paramilitary funerals in Northern Ireland. That is why Sinn Fein has given so many press conferences to television. That is why, after my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's restrictions were announced, the hon. Member for Belfast, West was reported as saying that they would disadvantage Sinn Fein.

In Northern Ireland and, to a more limited extent, in Great Britain——

Mr. Hume: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Renton: No. With the greatest respect to the hon. Gentleman, the time is late and I think that the House would like me to make rapid progress.

In Northern Ireland and in Great Britain we face a well-organised and determined terrorist conspiracy. Supported wholeheartedly by Sinn Fein—a point strongly made by the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea)—the IRA campaign is based on ending the democratic process by the use of violence, murder and death, a fact that no one knows better than my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. The IRA seeks to impose a united Ireland dominated by the IRA, with no mandate whatsoever from the electorate in Northern Ireland or in the Irish Republic. Its aim is to brush aside democracy, using whatever means are available.

Terrorism will continue to be opposed and resisted by the Government at every opportunity. We are determined to take every step possible to ensure that it does not succeed. We have no choice in that when faced with terrorism and violence, for they can never be allowed to triumph.

It is simply against that background that the Government, after long and careful consideration—certainly not as a panic reaction, as suggested by the hon. Members for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and for Kingston upon Hull, North—decided that they should not stand idly by and watch the apologists for terrorism exploit and manipulate the broadcasting media. That is the sort of issue that I hoped would unite the House in view of our determination to suppress terrorism. It was, therefore, with some dismay that I listened to the exaggerated contributions of, for example, the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) and the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot).

I repeat that we are not advocating any reduction in freedom of information. We are preventing in a limited manner, and only in the context of broadcasting, access to the media by those who use it to encourage support for terrorism. This is not a major departure for Ireland. Similar but tighter restrictions have applied in the Republic for many years.

Mr. Hume: Will the Minister confirm that under these measures members of Sinn Fein can be interviewed about any subject under the sun, except atrocities?

Mr. Renton: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman has raised that issue. I can tell him that that is not the case, and that is precisely the point to which I am coming.

As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said earlier, the broad effect of the directions is to prohibit direct speech over the air by a person representing one of the named organisations, or an oral statement by anyone who supports, or invites support, for one of the organisations. Thus, I say to the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook and the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) that all oral statements by Sinn Fein or UDA representatives would be caught, whether they were made at a public meeting, during an interview, or in a discussion programme, whatever the subject, if such statements were made by Sinn Fein or UDA representatives, or on behalf of those organisations. The restrictions do not prevent——

Mr. McNamara rose——

Mr. Renton: I shall finish this point. The restrictions do not prevent the second hand reporting of such an oral statement, for example, by a news journalist, as we are of the opinion that this does not cause the same degree of impact or public concern, for the reasons that I have already explained.

Mr. McNamara: Is the Minister saying that no member of Sinn Fein will be allowed to speak directly on the radio or on television on any subject whatsoever? That is what he has just said to the House. That is not what we have interpreted from the directions and it is not true. That is not what the BBC and the IBA are saying, but it is what the Minister has just said.

Mr. Renton: Unfortunately, the hon. Gentleman is not listening or concentrating. He did not listen to what my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said earlier this afternoon, and I shall repeat what he said in other words before I move on.

The restrictions apply to people who represent the organisations concerned. Elected councillors speaking on behalf of one of these organisations about council matters will be subject to the restrictions, whatever the actual subject under discussion. That is crystal clear——

Mr. Hattersley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Renton: No, I shall not give way to the right hon. Gentleman. I have repeated what my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said. I go on to say——

Mr. Hattersley rose——

Mr. Renton: I was talking about reporting. There is a public interest—[Interruption.] I am about to come to another point that the right hon. Gentleman——

Mr. Hattersley rose——

Mr. Renton: No. I shall make—[Interruption.] There is a public interest in reporting certain statements, for example——

Mr. Buchan: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. What protection can you give us when we have two Ministers from the same Department making two contradictory speeches? The Minister has contradicted the Home Secretary. Can we get the truth from one of them?

Madam Deputy Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Chair has no responsibility for the way in which Members or Ministers express themselves.

Mr. Renton rose——

Mr. Mallon: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The debate has continued for six and half hours, and I ask whether it is right that we should leave it without having cleared up the confusion that was created initially by the Home Secretary, which has been compounded by the Minister.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Renton: I believe that I have said precisely what my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said. I suggest that the hon. Members for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) and for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) study Hansard tomorrow and they will see that is so.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook told us that the notices have caused confusion. The intention behind the directions issued by my right hon. Friend has always been clear. Equally, the content of the notices has been as clear as we could make it. As my right hon. Friend said, there are some who have an interest in being permanently confused about these issues. I fear that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook falls precisely into that category.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook and the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) appeared to have the trouble of being unable to decide whether the notices that my right hon. Friend had issued either went too far or did not go far enough. In the end, the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, revelling in this apparent confusion of which he made so much, said that what we had undertaken was a pointless action. After my right hon. Friend's announcement, the right hon. Gentleman's old colleague, Lord Mason of Barnsley, who served in the same Government as the right hon. Gentleman in the 1970s as Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, said:

"it is defensible to stifle all outlets of those terrorist groups who are bent on undermining the authority of the state and intent upon smashing our democratic institutions . . . radio and television gives a degree of respectability to terrorist groups . . . It boosts their morale, aids their recruiting drives and helps to keep them in business. This measure is one step forward on the road to defeating terrorism and its propaganda."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 19 October 1988; Vol. 500, c. 1144.]

The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent said that he considered it—I hope that I do not paraphrase his words wrongly—an insult to the people of Britain——

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): He was wrong.

Mr. Renton: It is very helpful to have that comment from the Labour Front Bench. I think that he was wrong, too. I am glad to have that support.

The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent said that it was an insult to the people of Britain that they would not be able to continue to see programmes on which the hon. Member for Belfast, West and supporters of Sinn Fein appeared. I remind him of what my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood said. Is it really an insult to the people of Britain that they should no longer see the hon. Member for Belfast, West, as they saw him after the attempted murder of Sir Kenneth Bloomfield, head of the Northern Ireland Civil Service, appearing on Radio Ulster and saying that civil servants who advised the security forces "run the risks" and that the IRA was giving them the chance to resign their positions? That appearance was an insult to the people of Britain. The fact that that appearance will no longer be permitted will give great satisfaction to the majority of the people of Britain, including those in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Foot: I was saying that it was an insult to the people of Britain, and to the people of Northern Ireland, for the Government to say that the people of this country cannot judge for themselves.

Mr. Renton: I have my words showing what the right hon. Gentleman said. I shall read them in Hansard tomorrow, too.

Sir Giles Shaw rose——

Mr. Renton: With the greatest respect, I shall not give way.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) said that 19 years of appearance on television had added not a farthing to terrorist support. If that is his view, why is it so contradicted by, for example, Dr. Conor Cruise O'Brien, the former Minister for Posts and Telegraphs, who introduced the ban in the Republic and who, the day after my right hon. Friend's action, said:

"Sinn Fein desperately need the access to broadcasting which they have in Great Britain which 'respectabilises' them and helps them in many ways. If that is denied them, their effort will be hurt"?

I accept the experience of Dr. Conor Cruise O'Brien in preference to the judgment of the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland.

Finally, let us analyse what happens when the IRA commits one of its frequent outrages, which include the murder of ordinary people, and claims responsibility. The hon. Member for Mid-Ulster told us what happens. Within minutes of the report, a Sinn Fein spokesman appears on television explaining why it is necessary for the IRA to commit murders and encouraging support for his so-called cause. It would clearly be wrong if that were allowed to continue.

Nevertheless, democratic Governments need to consider long and hard before introducing measures of this kind, even when dealing with the enemies of democracy. We have done so and we have concluded that we can no longer justify giving terrorists and their apologists complete freedom of the airwaves to further their vile campaign and sow fear in the minds of ordinary viewers and listeners at home. We have therefore taken limited steps to limit that freedom, and in doing so we have received the unqualified support of the public in the United Kingdom.

On 19 October the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook said:

"the Labour party is dedicated to the defeat of terrorism" —[Official Report, 19 October 1988; Vol. 138, c.886.]

Those are fine words, but how is that dedication put into action? For six years now the Labour party has voted against the renewal of the Prevention of Terrorism Act. They deplore the announcements that courts may now draw inferences from the use of the right of silence, and tonight they will vote against these limited restrictions on direct access to the broadcasting media.

What, then, does the Labour party's dedication to the defeat of terrorism amount to? Words, words, words. Words have never defeated terrorism yet. Tough action, carefully targeted—unpalatable though it may be to some —is necessary, and that is what we recommend to the House tonight.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

PETITIONS

Housing Action Trusts

12.35 am

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): I beg to ask leave to present a petition on behalf of the residents of Downhill, Town End Farm, Hylton Castle and Red House estates in my constituency. It reads:

To the Honourable Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled. The humble petition of residents of the estates of Downhill, Town End Farm, Hylton Castle and Red House, Sunderland in the county of Tyne and Wear showeth That in considering the Housing Bill, brought from this Honourable House on 28 June 1988, the Right Honourable Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled have through their Committee amended Clauses 60 and 61 of the said Bill to the effect that the Secretary of State shall not designate an area as one where a housing action trust should be established unless he had made the arrangements for the conduct of a ballot of tenants affected and the majority of tenants eligible to vote have approved his proposal.

The right Honourable Secretary of State has notified us that he is considering designating the areas in which we live as areas where housing action trusts should be established and we would welcome the opportunity to make our views on the matter known by way of ballot and for the proposed designation not to proceed if the majority of those of us eligible to vote do not approve the proposed designation.

Wherefore, your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House do accept, in considering the said Bill, the amendments made to the said clauses 60 and 61 by the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray &c.

This is not a random petition. It is signed by 5,829 of the 6,632 tenants who could conceivably have signed it. It was taken from door to door, with only those tenants affected by the housing action trust proposal being asked to sign. A total of 87·9 per cent. of all those eligible have signed. They are not opposing the HAT in principle but are simply asking that the amendment made in another place be upheld when it returns to this place so that the tenants have the right to vote on whether they wish to see a housing action trust established.

I am proud to present the petition. It shows the overwhelming view of my constituents who are affected. I agree with them that it is appalling that the Secretary of State has told them that they should not be able to vote on their own future because they may be misinformed and vote the wrong way. That goes well beyond housing policy and threatens democracy in Britain. I see no difference in principle between a Government saying that tenants may not vote on their future and saying that people may not vote to elect Members to the House or to councils.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I must remind the hon. Gentleman that a petition is a petition, and that a long speech should not be attached to it. Perhaps he will now present the petition.

Mr. Clay: I shall bear in mind what you have said, Madam Deputy Speaker. I had almost concluded my remarks, and I shall now present the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Radioactive Waste

12.39 am

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): I rise to present a monster petition. It makes that presented by the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) look like a minnow.

The petition is signed by 48,326 constituents of mine, of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) and from surrounding constituencies. It was organised by the West Norfolk No to Nirex Campaign. The petition is headed "No to Nirex" and reads:

"We the undersigned are strongly opposed to the dumping of nuclear waste in Norfolk and the Wash. Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House will urge the Secretary of State for the Environment not to implement any such proposals. And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc."

West Norfolk is on a long list of sites. If Nirex locates an installation in or around this part of East Anglia, the consequences for the environment will be devastating. It is an area of outstanding natural beauty. An installation would meet tremendous local opposition and would have the most dreadful and appalling consequences for the environment. I am glad to present the petition. I gather that if one breaks the Mace——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The same rule applies to this petition as to the earlier one. I should make it clear that speeches should not be attached to petitions.

Mr. Bellingham: I am proud to present the petition, which is probably the biggest to come from East Anglia.

To lie upon the Table.

Fluidised Bed Experiment, Grimethorpe

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Alan Howarth.]

12.41 am

Mr. Terry Patchett (Barnsley, East): I do not intend to take up too much time on this subject. It is apparent from the lack of attendance that we are all tired.

I appeal to the Minister to reconsider the financing of the pressurised fluidised bed combustion project at Grimethorpe. I may have a strange ally in my appeal because the Prime Minister has been converted to the protection of the environment. She believes in nuclear energy, but the petition that has just been presented showed one of the problems with nuclear energy—nuclear waste. I appreciate that the Prime Minister is now concerned about acid rain and the ozone layer. The project at Grimethorpe has an answer to those problems.

An experiment has been under way for some years. It began as a joint project between West Germany and America. Each of those countries has gone its different way, but they are interested in financing further experiments. Sweden markets power stations that are suitable for the Third world and other countries. Britain leads in clean-burn technology, but we have a history of allowing good ideas to go abroad. It would be deeply regrettable if we were to allow this good idea to go abroad. My concern is shared by the chairman of British Coal, Sir Robert Haslam. In a letter to me, he said:

"The joint CEGB-British Coal project, with input from the US, has been particularly successful in solving a number of outstanding problems and PSBC design studies show that the technology produces lower cost electricity than other systems for power stations below 500 MW. However, the CEGB feel they must concentrate their resources on improving the technology for the larger sets of 900 MW. Although the emerging privatised distribution companies will certainly be more interested in a smaller higher efficiency unit with short delivery times, most of these will be gas-fired unless this scheme is proved.

There is at present no UK collaborator with money to invest in the next stage at Grimethorpe. We certainly cannot carry this project ourselves as we aim to break even this year and are required to produce a 10 per cent. return on capital within a highly competitive coal market. This is particularly frustrating since there now exists a potential to develop an even higher efficiency version of the PFBC called a topping cycle—a uniquely British invention. With this in mind we have an application with the Department of Energy to support a £38 million four-year programme to develop the technology."

We can all recognise, as the board does, the tremendous potential of the project. It is sad that the only response from the Secretary of State for Energy is that perhaps it is ready for private investment. Because of the confused picture on the privatisation of the electricity industry, we doubt whether private industry will show an interest at this stage.

As the Department of Energy has demanded that British Coal break even by a certain date, it has limited the finances that British Coal can invest. There is a two-edged sword hanging over the future of the fluidised bed combustion project. The Minister has had to rely on reports because he has not been to see the project. If he did, he would recognise its tremendous potential. I should be grateful if he would speak to the people working there, who will be very disappointed if the project cannot continue. Unless a funding package can be found the establishment will have to close by March 1989, with the loss of considerable expertise in advance coal combustion and the loss of the equipment and infrastructure, valued at £38 million, which support the development.

I do not think that anyone needs convincing of the tremendous potential of the project, so it is a shame that the Minister is prepared to hang back and allow the technology to go to other countries. Indeed, at some future date we might have to buy back that technology for use at power stations in this country. That is farcical.

Although we recognise the Minister's enthusiasm for nuclear energy, the amount of money required for the project is insignificant compared with that required to dispose of nuclear waste. With 200 years of coal reserves in Britain, it is farcical to proceed in such a way. We could have tremendously improved, efficient, clean-burn, coal-fired stations that could help to alleviate the problems of acid rain and damage to the ozone layer.

I ask the Minister to reconsider the matter and to find some way to fund the project—perhaps jointly between British Coal and the CEGB. For goodness sake, let us not lose this advanced technology to other countries, as has happened in the past.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): I wish to support what has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East (Mr. Patchett). Although the pressurised fluidised bed project is based in Grimethorpe, which is in my hon. Friend's constituency, it also affects my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay).

The project has been very successful. It is based on clean-burn technology for the burning of coal to produce electricity. The decision to withdraw funding from the project is somewhat shortsighted, not only because of the continued threat to jobs and the community in that area, but because of the mounting pressure both in Britain and throughout the world for more environmentally acceptable methods of burning fossil fuels and producing electricity. Grimethorpe has already suffered because of British Coal's past attitudes, particularly its rationalisation programme, which created job losses in the surrounding area. It is interesting that British Coal moved its Barnsley area headquarters out of the village to Allerton Bywater, 30 miles away, which also had a considerable impact on the area.

The closure of the pressurised fluidised bed project seems illogical in view of the Department of Energy's admission that cleaner coal technology is needed. We must first consider the greenhouse effect—the effect of the warming of the earth and its atmosphere, the artificial heating that will threaten polar regions, and, in future generations, the surface area that is currently at sea level.

A recent conference in Toronto drew attention to that matter. It stated that to do nothing would be the worst possible course of action. The conference would dismally regard the decision to discontinue funding for the pressurised fluidised bed project, which has achieved methods of cleanly burning fossil fuels in a manner that is acceptable to the environment lobby. As my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East has mentioned, nuclear power stations will not be the answer to environment problems.

The privatisation of electricity will threaten the future of the nuclear power industry. Two research programmes have already been discontinued by the Minister's Department. The future for energy systems involves the environmentally clean burning of coal and fossil fuels. I, too, urge the Minister to consider ways of continuing funding for the pressurised fluidised bed project in Grimethorpe rather than allowing it to fall by the wayside, to be resurrected at a later date by other countries and perhaps by people in this country who will regard such technology as the way forward.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Michael Spicer): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Barnsley, East (Mr. Patchett) on raising in this brief debate the future of fluidised bed combustion technology. He has argued, as has the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley)—I notice that the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) is also present—the case for Government support for the continuation of a programme of work at the Grimethorpe facility in the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Both hon. Gentlemen are right that for some years it has been clear that fluidised bed combustion offers the possibility significantly to lower nitrogen oxide emissions more than conventional methods of burning coal. There is also the added benefit that sulphur emissions can be substantially reduced by adding limestone or dolomite to the bed. There are other potential benefits in terms of the high rates of heat transfer within the fluidised bed.

With the rise in oil prices in the 1970s, the International Energy Agency understandably put forward proposals for research into oil substitutes. One such programme was the Grimethorpe project, in which the participants were the United Kingdom, represented by British Coal, the Federal Republic of West Germany, and the United States.

Contrary to much public impression, Grimethorpe is not and was never set up to be a power station. As the hon. Gentleman has probably implicitly acknowledged, it is the largest pressurised fluidised bed combustion research and development facility in the world. The British Government provided £17 million out of the eventual total project cost of £60 million. British Coal provided the balance of the United Kingdom share, together with a substantial contribution in kind.

The IEA programme was in fact almost complete when the miners' strike of March 1984 intervened and persuaded the American and German participants to transfer the facility to British Coal ownership. After the miners' strike, work continued at Grimethorpe with a £28 million programme funded by British Coal and the CEGB. The objective was to solve some of the problems already identified and to move the technology closer to the point where it could be developed commercially.

That programme was supplemented by work valued at around £10 million under contract from the United States Department of Energy and the Electric Power Research Institute, the United States utility's co-operative research and development organisation. At the end of this phase, problems relevant to the use of the technology in commercial operation were resolved, and a body of design data and information was produced which can now be used with confidence by engineering concerns wishing to develop and exploit the technology.

I wish to make two points on the future of Grimethorpe and its technology. First of all, pressurised fluidised bed combustion is only one of several ways in which coal can be used to generate electricity while at the same time meeting high environmental standards. In 1981 my Department's Advisory Council on Research and Development, ACORD, commissioned a programme to assess the economics of clean power generation by advanced coal-based combined cycles, compared with a conventional coal-fired power station with flue gas desulphurisation.

The programme was managed jointly by my Department, the CEGB, British Coal and British Gas, and embraced both gasification and fluidised bed combustion technologies. A series of design studies were undertaken by experienced engineering contractors, and the results are summarised in energy paper No. 56 published in August of this year. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House, and I arranged for a copy to be sent to the hon. Member for Barnsley, East.

The most detailed assessments were made of pressurised fluidised bed combustion, using data derived mainly from the joint British Coal and CEGB programme, and also of the gasification combined cycle plant, using information from the 500 tonnes per day British Gas-Lurgi gasifier programme at Westfield.

The conclusions of these studies indicated that, for the near term at least, none of the fluidised bed designs offered an advantage over the planned conventional 900 MW electrical pulverised coal-fired units fitted with flue gas desulphurisation and a low nitrogen oxide combustion system. It was these conclusions that caused the CEGB to look again at its involvement in the Grimethorpe project. As a result, late last year, the CEGB decided not to participate in any further programme beyond that to which it was already committed, and it withdrew from further support for the work at Grimethorpe.

A further factor in that decision may have been that an integrated gasification combined cycle plant design based on the British Gas-Lurgi slagging gasifier now shows promise of being able to compete with conventional plant with flue gas desulphurisation at sizes of current interest to the CEGB, assuming continuing improvements in gas turbine efficiency and a market for the sulphur by-product.

The first point then is that there are competing technologies to fluidised bed combustion capable of meeting and possibly improving on its performance.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Taking the Minister's argument into consideration, is it not a fact that fluidised beds still have the advantage of their huge heat transference ability? That is far more beneficial to the environment than the other matters mentioned. Has it not proceeded so far that field trials should be carried out in which the Government should play a part?

Mr. Spicer: I agree that this technology has advantages, and I want to say how it might develop. I am not arguing that this technology does not have its applications.

The second point I want to make about the future of fluidised bed combustion is that it can be conceived of as largely a proven technology. We have the technology. It is not a question of having to research into new technology. Following on from the hon. Gentleman's point, the question for the future is one of the rate at which it would be taken up commercially. It is not a question of privatisation; it is the application of the technology by whomever applies it. I certainly know of one private power company which is introducing it—I suspect very effectively—in the United States. I understand that industry in Sweden and Germany—the hon. Member for Barnsley, East mentioned Sweden—has shown a similar interest in the technology as that shown by the United States. I believe that a privatised electricity supply industry may result in similar innovations over here.

What certainly seems to be clear is that many private companies considering entry to the power generation market are thinking in terms of plant considerably smaller than those planned by the CEGB, and there may be opportunities to exploit pressurised fluidised bed combustion in that context.

Certainly the joint design studies that I have mentioned, which were sponsored by the Department, showed that at smaller plant sizes, around 400 MW electrical, the pressurised fluidised bed plant is potentially competitive with conventional coal-fired stations with emission control. However, the technology that power-generating companies choose is a matter for those companies alone, and their choice will be governed by the economics of operation and by the experience of others.

The Government's position with respect to the Grimethorpe facility is therefore clear and has been made clear on a number of occasions recently. We believe that the next stage of work is near-commercial, and that decisions on whether and in what manner the work should proceed are best taken by those who stand to benefit from its development. I am confident that the results obtained from the Grimethorpe project, which have been heavily financed with public moneys, will be of great value to any industrial organisation wishing to exploit this technology. I have already mentioned that this technology is being exploited commercially in other countries.

In summary, the Grimethorpe facility is the property and responsibility of British Coal. It is for British Coal, and for any partners that it may interest in the project, to determine whether the pay-off from continuing research at Grimethorpe will exceed the cost of doing so. However, in the meantime, technology at a certain level exists, and I believe that in a privatised industry it may be that that technology will be applied. It is therefore a matter for the owner—British Coal—to decide whether to press ahead and develop the technology.

Beyond that, I cannot give the hon. Gentleman any assurances except that I agree that it is a good technology. It is a proven technology and it is now a question of its being taken up by commercial power companies and put to the use that they think fit.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at four minutes past One o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Sunday Trading

2. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the number of convictions for breaches of Sunday trading law over the past three years.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Tim Renton): The total number of convictions for Sunday trading offences in 1985, 1986 and 1987 were 604, 559 and 550 respectively. Figures are not yet available for 1988.

Mr. Marshall: I thank my hon. Friend for his answer. Does he agree that a law that is frequently broken, rarely enforced and quite illogical should be reformed root and branch as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Renton: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend. As he says, the law is out of date, shot full of anomalies and, at best, unevenly enforced. That is why we have consulted many groups to see whether there is a broad consensus for reform.

Mr. Alton: Will the Minister take account of the large body of opinion, both in the country and in the House, that does not wish to see Sunday made into any other day, and wants to see it kept special? Will he take those views into account before bringing forward any legislation?

Mr. Renton: I appreciate what the hon. Member says, but there are many ways of keeping Sunday special. Many people may find that they could, for example, combine going to a shop with going to church without ceasing to make Sunday a special day.

Sir Charles Morrison: In the light of my hon. Friend's entirely sensible remarks about existing Sunday law, will he also consider the law affecting Sunday sport, particularly as every Sunday during the summer, and often during the winter, every sport or body of sport breaks the law in order to meet public need?

Mr. Renton: I hear with sympathy what my hon. Friend says and shall certainly bear his comments in mind.

Mr. Pike: Will the Minister recognise that the House expressed a view on the issue not all that long ago? Is it not wrong for his Department to wash its hands of the matter and leave it to local authorities to interpret the law as they wish? Should he not send a letter to local authorities advising them how the existing law should be administered and enforced?

Mr. Renton: Certainly not. Clearly, in the Shops Act 1950 Parliament vested in local authorities the job of enforcing the law. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General recently made clear, that is what we expect them to do. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) should bear in mind that on the previous occasion at which there was an attempt to reform Sunday trading laws every Labour Member voted against, including the Scottish Labour Members, who have enjoyed total deregulation in their constituencies for many years. When does the hon. Member for Burnley think that his Scottish colleagues will help their English counterparts to act legally when they go shopping on Sundays?

Firearms Amnesty

3. Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement on the result of the recent firearms amnesty.

7. Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many weapons have been recovered under the recent firearms amnesty; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): The firearms amnesty held in England and Wales in September netted 42,725 firearms and 1,511,000 rounds of ammunition. Some 4,280 other offensive weapons were also handed in to the police. This response compares very favourably with the last appeal made in 1968, when some 25,000 firearms and 795,000 rounds of ammunition were surrendered. The outcome of the amnesty represents a substantial success in removing from circulation those illegally held and unwanted guns, which might otherwise have fallen into irresponsible or criminal hands.

I shall publish in the Official Report a summary of firearms, ammunition and other weapons surrendered to the police during the amnesty, by police force area.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: The House will be delighted to have those figures. Has my hon. Friend any theory to explain why the amnesty, although of only a month's duration, was so much more successful than the one in 1968? Does he think that it owes anything to a reaction against what happened in Hungerford in the summer of 1987?

Mr. Hogg: I think that my hon. Friend is right. The tragedy at Hungerford focused attention on the unlawful possession of firearms. I also think that the amnesty's success was one of the consequential advantages of the Firearms Bill, which received its approval in the House last night.

Mr. Bowden: I know that the public at large will be reassured by what my hon. Friend has said about the success of the firearms amnesty. Could he now give additional reassurance by saying when the increased penalties provided by the Criminal Justice Act 1988 for crimes committed by someone carrying a firearm will be implemented?

Mr. Hogg: Provisions in the Criminal Justice Act 1988 that came into force at the end of September raise the maximum sentence for illegal possession of a shotgun to three years' imprisonment following conviction on indictment, and the maximum sentence for carrying firearms while committing a crime to life imprisonment.

Mr. Tony Banks: I agree that there is an amazing collection of surrendered weapons and ammunition: perhaps we can expect a reduction in the Defence Estimates because of it.

I know that this is probably a difficult question, but in view of the number and range of weapons collected, has the Department any idea how many are still around, perhaps waiting to be collected?

Mr. Hogg: The weapons were held unlawfully and without certificate. It is therefore not possible to say how many are still held unlawfully and without certificate.

Following is the information:

Rural Violence

4. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a further statement on action taken by the Government to curb rural violence.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): I have reminded the police and courts of their powers—both the original ones and now the increased ones—for dealing with outbreaks of disorder and infringements of the licensing laws, and have asked them to arrange for swift prosecutions and court hearings after outbreaks of hooliganism and disorder. I have also approved pilot projects in seven areas, Coventry being the first, to test the effectiveness of byelaws making it an offence to drink alcohol in designated public places.

Mr. Burns: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his answer. Will he confirm that the Licensing Act 1988 has given magistrates new powers to punish irresponsible licence holders? Will he also comment on what progress may or may not have been made in considering income-related fines to bring home to young, affluent people who have too much money and too little sense that the Government really mean business in curbing rural violence and loutish behaviour brought about by drinking?

Mr. Hurd: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's second point. It is very important that in each case the courts should have the information that enables them to make the fine bite as they want it to bite. We are trying to arrange that that is increasingly so.

My hon. Friend's first point is entirely right. The Licensing Act 1988 gives magistrates new powers, for example to restrict the drinking hours in discos and to revoke a licence while it is current; in addition, of course, to strengthening the law against under-age illegal drinking.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I have received a number of letters from people in Cockermouth in my constituency who are angry about the police's failure to deal with rural drunkenness, irresponsibility and violence in that area. When I approached the police, they said that they needed more officers in the county. May I have an assurance that when more places are available the money will be spent in Cumbria and that such problems will be resolved? Or does the Home Secretary intend to do what he has done in the past—nothing—and allow these problems to persist?

Mr. Hurd: It is always difficult to know where to start with the hon. Gentleman. Even in the short time during which I have been Home Secretary, we have had a further record increase in the number of police in England and Wales. At a conference in Brighton not long ago I was able to announce a further increase of 1,100, which is a record on top of a record. I was also able to announce a further and substantial programme in the years to follow. We judge applications from police authorities as they come in, and when we receive the Cumbrian application I shall bear in mind what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Alexander: Further to the question asked by the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), is my right hon. Friend able to say that the Nottinghamshire police authority has all the police that it requires? Is he aware that, for example, at Southwell Minster, in my constituency, graves are regularly vandalised, and people in the area are desperate to have enough policemen to ensure that that does not happen?

Mr. Hurd: The police have received a bigger increase in resources in real terms than any other public service. It is important that that increase should continue and that a record should be piled on top of a record. It is for the chief constable in each police force area to decide how to allocate his men. I am sure that the chief constable in Nottinghamshire will note what my hon. Friend has said about the county. We shall continue to preside over and administer a programme of steady increases in the police forces of England and Wales.

Mr. Corbett: The right hon. Gentleman says that there is a record piled on a record, but is there not a further record—the record amount of violent crime on our streets in both rural and city areas, which increased by 12 per cent. last year alone? Does the Home Secretary not understand that it is not pious words but extra feet on the beat which are needed to combat the continuing and growing violence in rural and city areas? While he is at it, can the right hon. Gentleman explain why these loadsamoney lager louts behave in this way?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman will have noticed and, I am sure, given publicity to, the substantial achievements of the West Midlands police in reducing crime. He will have noticed that that force is among the pioneers who are finding the best ways to detect and deal with crime. The hon. Gentleman represents an area with an extremely good police force which is achieving substantial results in the reduction of crime. I am sure that he fully supports and encourages that.

The hon. Gentleman will provide his own answer to the second part of his question. I simply note that, whereas a couple of years ago the Opposition Front Bench said that all such crime was the result of poverty and unemployment, it now appears that the Marxist explanation has changed. I do not find either sociological reason particularly persuasive.

Association of Chief Police Officers

5. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the Association of Chief Police Officers; and whether he will make a statement on what was discussed.

Mr. Douglas Hurd: I hold many meetings with the officers and committees of ACPO. The most recent was with members of the ACPO traffic committee on 24 October. The matters that we discussed included police breath-testing powers and the enforcement of road traffic law.

Mr. Leigh: With almost 5,000 police officers recruited in non-metropolitan areas since 1979, no one can doubt the Government's commitment to giving the police resources to deal with rural crime. However, when my right hon. Friend last met the association, did he make it clear that, having shown our commitment, Conservative Members demand from the police productivity, value for money and, above all, the concentration of resources on dealing with crimes against the person and property?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is right. He simply emphasises what I said a few moments ago. We have a steadily expanding programme for the police, but, before we consider demands from particular forces, we must ask whether the taxpayer and ratepayer are already getting value for money. I am greatly helped in that by the Inspectorate of Constabulary and am glad to say that an increasing number of police forces are innovating and using civilians, who cost half as much, for jobs that were previously done by uniformed officers and are finding new ways of streamlining their procedures and coping more effectively with the wide range of tasks that increasingly fall upon the police.

Mr. Ashton: Is it not a fact that police chiefs have said that the new registration scheme for football supporters is nothing but a fig leaf and that it will not stop hooliganism, which takes place on the way to the grounds rather than inside the grounds? The Government's attitude towards rural violence differs from their attitude towards football supporters. They are insisting on a registration scheme that will do a great deal of damage to the game and its finances and will have little effect on the national crime figures.

Mr. Hurd: I do not understand the logic of the hon. Gentleman's view. It is true that much hooliganism takes place on the way to and from the football ground. That is one reason why we have drawn the attention of the licensing justices to their powers temporarily to close premises, such as off-licences and pubs, in such circumstances. However, there is no reason why we should not deal effectively with the other problem in the grounds. The scheme that will be produced by my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for sport—I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has yet seen the details—will be designed to deal with those problems.

Mr. Hill: During my right hon. Friend's discussions with the chief police officers, will he once again try to revive the neighbourhood watch scheme in Hampshire? I have had words with the newly appointed chief constable, and the police say that they are 135 under establishment. That is one reason why they are unable to co-ordinate quite as well as they should with neighbourhood watch schemes. In some areas, such as large estates, there is a problem of co-ordination, because too few people wish to take part in the schemes.

Mr. Hurd: The neighbourhood watch scheme movement has grown so fast—there are now about 60,000 schemes, whereas six years ago there were only two—that the police have a problem in deciding how to keep in touch with them, which is essential for the success of the scheme. My hon. Friend is right. It does not necessarily follow that all that must be done by uniformed police officers. In some areas of London it is being done by civilians working with the police. In other areas, such as West Yorkshire, it is being done by special constables. That is one area where the police can usefully innovate.

Mr. Hattersley: Will the Home Secretary say how many chief constables at his most recent meeting had outstanding applications to him for increases in their forces? Is it not a fact that more than 50 per cent. of them have applications for increased establishments, which the Home Secretary has refused?

Mr. Hurd: It is probably true that about that number have outstanding requests, but they know perfectly well that they are not refused. We carry on the applications into the next year and consider them. Thanks to the arrangements made with the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, I now have slightly more resources for next year, but they will be difficult to allocate. We are piling a record on a record. This service will continue to have a higher increase than any other public service, but it will be tight, and that is why the supplementary question of my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) is to the point.

Robbery (Sentences)

6. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the change in the last year in the average sentence for robbery; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. John Patten): The average sentence imposed on men over 21, on conviction of robbery, has increased by 9 per cent. in the last year and by 22 per cent. since 1984.

Mr. Bennett: I thank my hon. Friend for that welcome news. I welcome the decision of the inquest jury in the recent case in which two armed robbers were shot dead by the police after being warned to surrender their weapons. Does he agree that those who go armed for robbery must be aware of the consequences of their actions and should desist from such actions?

Mr. Patten: Anyone who goes out armed for robbery faces, on conviction, the risk of life imprisonment. The Criminal Justice Act 1988 strengthens that by making life imprisonment the punishment for anyone who carries a firearm in the conduct of crime.

Mr. Grocott: Will the Minister confirm that most thefts, apart from those that feature in sensational headlines, involve sums of less than £100? Will he confirm also that the cost of imprisonment is at least £250 a week? Would it not make more sense to concentrate on compensating the victims of crime and on non-custodial sentences, which are much less expensive and often much more effective in preventing the recurrence of offences?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman is right. The cost of keeping someone in prison is about £240 a week. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman welcomed the recently introduced new provisions for compensation in the Criminal Justice Act 1988 and in a recent circular issued by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the possibility of punishment within the community for less serious, non-violent offenders is probably a much better deal for the community. Our proposals are contained in my right hon. Friend's recently published Green Paper.

Mr. Hind: Given the increased level of offences of robbery, does my hon. Friend not feel that it is time that we took a close look at the remand centres that have been built in the United States in inner cities and close to the courts? That reduces the cost of transportation from prisons to the courts and frees the places that we have in our prison system for those who have been convicted and require long sentences of imprisonment. We need new designs and new thinking.

Mr. Patten: We are already producing new designs and new thinking is taking place. That thinking is encompassed in my right hon. Friend's Green Paper, which was published in July. Passages in that document ask a series of questions about the possibility of introducing private management and private construction into the building of remand centres.

Mr. Skinner: What sort of sentences should apply to City financiers who are intent on robbery, who arm themselves with bogus portfolios and kid on thousands of old-age pensioners? They are supported by Department of Trade and Industry Ministers, which means that they can continue their bogus business and rob people. Should not the Government round up and concentrate on these people?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman's attack on my right hon. and hon. Friends who are Department of Trade and Industry Ministers is perfectly monstrous and totally without foundation. It is—[Interruption.] I believe that loutish behaviour is unparliamentary, Mr. Speaker, but we are seeing it on the Opposition Benches. It is for the courts to decide what sentences to impose for City fraud. The hon. Gentleman has forgotten that in the Criminal Justice Act 1988 we increased the penalty for insider trading from two years' imprisonment to seven years.

Video Recordings Act 1984

8. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department is planning to secure the better enforcement of the Video Recordings Act 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: In the Criminal Justice Act 1988 we have provided powers for local authority trading standards officers to enforce the Video Recordings Act 1984. We are also discussing with the trade associations how video dealers can be made more fully aware of their obligations under the Act.

Mr. Butler: When my hon. Friend meets representatives of the video trade, will he discuss with them how jointly they may clamp down on cowboys who deal in degrading filth?

Mr. Renton: Yes. I have already met representatives of the trade and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is planning to meet them shortly. It is the sort of subject that we discuss with them. I emphasise that progress is definitely being made. Now that the Video Recordings Act is fully in force, all videos except for a few categories, such as religion and education, must be classified. There is a fine of up to £20,000 for selling an unclassified video recording. I assure my hon. Friend that progress is being made in achieving the aims that he has in mind.

Mr. Randall: Does the Minister agree that if the number of prosecutions is anything to go by, enforcement is not working satisfactorily? Is it not hypocritical of the Government to advocate improved viewing standards that will reduce the showing of sex and violence without making more cash available to cash-strapped local authorities for enforcement? The Minister cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Renton: The hon. Gentleman is quite wrong. The Criminal Justice Act 1988 gives local trading standards officers powers relating to videos similar to those that apply to other aspects of their work—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman should wait for a moment. The enforcement powers began only last month, but information shows that they are already having an effect. So far this year the British Board of Film Classification has issued 48 certificates in connection with proceedings under the Video Recordings Act 1984 and is now examining almost 500 video works for the same purpose, yet it is only a month since local trading standards officers were given those powers.

Offensive Weapons

9. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department has taken to prevent the manufacture and supply of offensive weapons; and if he will make a statement.

15. Dr. Twinn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department has taken to prevent the manufacture and supply of offensive weapons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have taken powers in the new Criminal Justice Act enabling the Secretary of State to specify, by affirmative order, weapons that it will be an offence to manufacture, sell, import, hire, give or lend. The purpose of this provision is to take out of circulation altogether weapons that have no legitimate use. A draft order specifying 14 martial arts and other weapons was brought before Parliament for approval on 19 October.

Mr. Gill: What possible legitimate justification can there be for the continued sale and manufacture of crossbows—a fairly recent phenomenon which the public increasingly feel to be a menace, not just to human, but to animal life?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend will recall that last year we tackled the problem of crossbows through legislation and increased controls over them. We intend to review legislation on crossbows to determine whether any further changes need to be made.

Dr. Twinn: I congratulate my hon. Friend and his colleagues on the action they have taken to reduce the threat from knives and other weapons. Is he aware that there is still considerable concern about other weapons that will still be freely available? Is he further aware that this week in Enfield borough, which lies within my constituency, catapults are freely available and are being sold from the same shop window as sporting guns? That is of considerable concern to the public.

Mr. Hogg: I understand my hon. Friend's concern. We considered catapults, but there were two difficulties about putting them on the order. First, they have a legitimate use, as many anglers use them for the distribution of bait. Secondly, it is difficult to make a sensible distinction between catapults made commercially and those made by young people at home.

Mr. Cryer: Although I endorse the prohibition of minor weapons such as crossbows, may I ask the Home Office to go after the Mrs. Big of offensive weapons, a faded blonde who lives at No. 10 Downing street, who is producing more weapons——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Such questions do not enhance our proceedings.

Mr. Cryer: She is touting an international trade in offensive weapons——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We refer to each other either by ministerial titles or as hon. Members. Please do that.

Mr. Cryer: She is manufacturing weapons——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman kindly rephrase his question?

Mr. Cryer: Will the Minister take action—[HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."]—against the organisers——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman will rephrase his question. I have already asked him to do so.

Mr. Cryer: In case my question was unclear, I was referring to the Prime Minister as being the head of a Government who are engaged in the international arms trade and who are producing weapons of mass extermination. Surely such matters are of as great a concern to citizens as crossbows.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman's question is unworthy of response.

Mr. Hoyle: Will the Minister reconsider high-velocity catapults? Is he aware that they have caused deaths, one wilfully? Is he further aware that they have caused tremendous damage in Cheshire, where one school has been severely damaged? I have already written to the hon. Gentleman and I now ask him to give the matter further consideration.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I will, of course, give the matter further consideration. The hon. Gentleman has drawn my attention to a particular case. The arguments that I have previously mentioned in the Chamber are persuasive. At the moment, it would not be right to depart from the conclusions that we reached.

Safer Cities Initiative

10. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress his Department has made with its safer cities initiative; and if he will make a statement.

16. Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress his Department has made with its safer cities initiative; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: Twenty safer cities projects will be established throughout England over three years, with nine of them during the first year. Wolverhampton, Bradford and Nottingham have already been announced as safer cities areas. Staff have been recruited for the Wolverhampton and Bradford projects, and advertisements for staff for the Nottingham project were placed last week. Detailed discussions on local projects are well advanced in six further areas: Birmingham, Rochdale, Coventry, Hartlepool, Lewisham, and Tower Hamlets.

Mr. Sumberg: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his reply and on this splendid scheme. When he reviews it, will he bear in mind that crime is not limited to large cities and inner cities? Therefore, will he consider expanding the scheme to areas such as mine, which would benefit from it?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is right. We started with the five towns project, as he knows, and Bolton, which is not far from him, was one example of that, although not what he wants. It is because that was successful in bringing down crime that we have enlarged the project to take in areas of cities in which crime is a particularly serious problem.

Mr. Loyden: On the question of safety in cities, will the Home Secretary give full regard to the distribution of police forces? In many cases, the outlying areas of cities in which there is a high level of crime are the most neglected. I hate to use the term "working-class", but in working-class areas there appears to be less police concern about criminality. When reviewing crime in cities, will he give full regard to such areas? There should be a better and more equal distribution of police forces on the beat.

Mr. Hurd: It is for the chief constable of a force area, particularly a big force area such as Merseyside, to decide how to deploy his men. The hon. Gentleman is quite right. Many of the most difficult circumstances and conditions obtain on the edge of cities and not just in what are called the inner cities. The hon. Gentleman will have been pleased to see—I am sure that he has given publicity to it—that crime in Merseyside has been falling.

Electoral Law

11. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to introduce legislation to implement the outstanding recommendations of the Speaker's Conference in the 1970-74 Parliament, relating to electoral law.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No, Sir. The primary aim of the legislation to amend electoral law, which we intend to introduce in this Parliament, will be to implement our manifesto commitment to extend the period in which British citizens abroad may register as overseas electors.

Mr. Knox: Do the Government intend to do anything about the 1973-74 Speaker's Conference recommendation to reduce the age at which people can stand for election to the House?

Mr. Hogg: I know of my hon. Friend's interest in this matter. He was a distinguished member of the Speaker's Conference. The recommendation to which he referred was reached by a vote of 10 to eight. There is no evidence that the public want to be represented by teenagers. We are sometimes accused of behaving as though we were teenagers. The question asked by the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) explains why such allegations are sometimes made. I would not wish to add further substance to that charge.

Mr. Winnick: If it is right to control the amount of money that a candidate can spend during a general election—and it is right and proper that there should be such control—why is there no control on the amount of money that a party can spend nationally?

Mr. Hogg: Because Parliament has not deemed it necessary.

Electronic Tagging

12. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department where and when he now anticipates the introduction of pilot schemes for the tagging of offenders.

Mr. Hurd: We shall consult the police and the courts before deciding the areas for the pilot schemes. We expect the projects to begin next summer, monitoring people remanded on bail.

Mr. Coombs: Given the present overcrowding in prisons, despite a record building programme, and given the fact that it costs £1,000 a month to keep each prisoner in prison, does not electronic tagging represent a golden opportunity, especially for the 20 per cent. of those who are in prison for fine or maintenance default? It would represent a humane, realistic and flexible form of punishment, which will reduce the possibility of re-offending.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He has put the case exactly. We are all concerned about the increase in the remand population of people who have not been convicted of anything. If we can help the magistrates in the courts by providing this extra alternative, it will be well worth trying.

Mr. Mullin: Are there any plans for the electronic tagging of MI5 agents, since the Home Department seems to have lost track of what some of them are up to? May I commend to the Home Secretary an excellent book published today called "The Wilson Plot' by David Leigh, which will explain what some of them got up to in times gone by?

Mr. Hurd: The answer to the first question is no. The answer to the second question is that I take note.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Latham, Question No. 13.

Mr. Latham: Lucky 13.

New Police Station, Oakham

13. Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is now in a position to approve the request by the Leicestershire police authority to proceed with building a new police station in Oakham.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Lucky indeed. I am pleased to say that we are now able to give approval for work on the new Oakham police station to start in 1991-92. We shall be notifying the Leicestershire police authority of this very shortly.

Mr. Latham: That is a nice present for an eye test rebel. I thank my hon. Friend most warmly for that reply. Is he aware that it will be well received in Rutland, where the police station is in a poor condition, and that it shows the Government's commitment to rural policing?

Mr. Hogg: May I say of and to my hon. Friend that he has been a persistent and determined advocate of the need to build a new police station at Oakham, and that the decision owes much to what he has said and done in this place and elsewhere.

Police Manpower, Leicestershire

14. Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received any further representations seeking more police officers in Leicestershire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The police authority wrote on 8 September notifying us of a revised application for 89 police posts subject to the county council's decision on the availability of finance. It has been asked to provide some further detail on the make-up of the new application. It will be considered along with applications that have been received from other authorities for increases in 1989-90.

My right hon. Friend is able to approve 800 police posts for provincial forces in 1989-90. This is an increase on the 500 that were available for the present financial year. Demand, however, already exceeds this and he will look to Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary for advice on how the available posts should be allocated. The aim is to announce decisions around December.

Mr. Vaz: Following the friendly exchange between the Minister and the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) on the previous question, may I ask whether the Minister in aware of the deep outrage and anger in Leicestershire against the Government, and the Home Secretary in particular, because of their failure to allocate a single extra police officer for the entire county in this year's allocation? Is he further aware that earlier this year a petition that was launched in my constituency to open Uppingham road police station on a full-time basis and for more police officers to be allocated to the outer estates has attracted more than 10,000 signatures? How long will the Minister persist in his snubbing of the chief constable and the police authority, which represents both political parties, by his refusal to allocate extra police officers to Leicestershire?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman does himself less than justice. The matter was raised previously in June 1988 in an Adjournment debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham), to whom I have just paid tribute. He will be gratified by the hon. Gentleman's support today. As to the figures, I heard very little that was accurate in what the hon. Gentleman said. He will recall that since 1979 the total manpower available to the Leicestershire force, inclusive of civilians, has increased by 187. He will also know that between 1985 and 1987 the process of civilianisation has increased the number of operational officers by 70, and that the process will increase the operational strength by another 82 officers during the next three years. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman did not congratulate the chief constable on that.

Mr. Speaker: Questions Nos. 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22.

Safer Cities Initiative

22. Mrs. Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in developing his Department's safer cities project in Wolverhampton; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten rose——

Mr. Patrick Thompson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask Question No. 21?

Mr. Speaker: I have called Question No. 22.

Mr. Patten: Wolverhampton was the first safer cities project to be announced. Since that announcement on 7 April 1988, a local steering committee, including representatives of the council, police, probation and voluntary sector, has been formed. It held its first meeting in July. I am encouraged by the progress that we have made in Wolverhampton. There has been an enthusiastic and energetic response from a wide range of organisations and individuals, and especially from my hon. Friend.

Mrs. Hicks: I thank my hon. Friend for those comments, which I endorse. Does he agree that one of the most effective crime prevention measures that we can take is to instil in our young people, both at home and at school, a healthy respect for the law? In paying tribute to the junior crime prevention panel in Wolverhampton, I ask what steps have been taken to ensure that young people will be represented on the co-ordinating committees of those excellent schemes?

Mr. Patten: The junior crime prevention panel in Wolverhampton is doing excellent work, and we encourage the local co-ordinating committees fully to involve it in its work.

Mr. Speaker: If it was my fault, I will call Question No. 21.

Gambling

21. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to seek to change the law on gambling.

Mr. John Patten: Yes. My right hon. Friend announced on 5 October that he proposes by regulation under the Lotteries and Amusements Act 1976 to prohibit "multiple" lotteries and by order to increase monetary limits on individual lotteries under the Act. We keep the law on gambling under review, but have no other immediate plans to change it.

Mr. Thompson: I am grateful for the opportunity to ask this question. Is my hon. Friend aware of the concern felt in Norwich and elsewhere about young people who go into gambling arcades and get themselves into serious difficulties? Does he propose to give any further thought to this matter or take any action?

Mr. Patten: I am aware of the concern in Norwich, because of the delegation which my hon. Friend recently led to see me in the Home Office. We have made a recent announcement about our proposals to tighten up—with the co-operation of the gambling industry and of local authorities—access to amusement arcades. We hope and believe that those will have a substantial effect on the limited numbers of young people who suffer from an addiction to gambling.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mrs. Gillian Shephard: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 3 November.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend is on an official visit to Poland.

Mrs. Shephard: My right hon. Friend will have noticed in Tuesday's Autumn Statement the announcement that spending on the National Health Service is to increase next year by more than £2 billion—the largest increase ever announced. Does he agree that such an increase demonstrates overwhelmingly this Government's commitment to the continuing success of the National Health Service.

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend is right. The Autumn Statement demonstrates the commitment to the Health Service. It provides the largest increase in resources ever made to the National Health Service—more than £2 billion in 1988-89. Full funding has been provided for the nurses' pay, and in real terms that is an increase of more than 45 per cent. under this Government. The biggest building programme in the history of the National Health Service is under way and record levels of patient care are being achieved. The contrast with the Labour Government could not be more marked. Their words cannot disguise their actions when they were in power. It was Labour that cut nurses' pay and the hospital building programme.

Mr. Hattersley: Are the Government confident that charging for optical tests will not be a deterrent to examination, as the Minister of State, Department of Health hopes, or did the Under-Secretary of State for Health reflect the official view when she said on television last night that charging might well be a deterrent?

Mr. Wakeham: I thought that the right hon. Gentleman would at least take the trouble to look at what my hon. Friend said in full rather than what she said in the reports in some—[Interruption.]—at what my hon. Friend was reported as saying in some of the papers. My hon. Friend was clearly making the point that it would be commercial suicide for opticians to charge a fee for sight tests at a level that would drive away customers for spectacles. Three out of four sight tests result in a prescription for glasses. What my hon. Friend said was perfectly sensible and I support it.

Mr. Hattersley: I have the transcript, which clearly reveals that the Under-Secretary of State said that charges might be a deterrent, but on the other hand they might not. Was not the truth of the matter revealed by the Minister of State in the House in the early hours of Wednesday morning—that the Government have no idea whether they will or will not be a deterrent? In fact, the Government do not know whether they are cutting back on eye tests, and they do not care.

Mr. Wakeham: The Government do not believe that such charges will be a deterrent. We have had two very good debates on the issue in the House. Each time the Government have won the argument and the vote that followed. The right hon. Gentleman does not like to accept that. He will have to wait to see what happens down the Corridor. The right hon. Gentleman will try to have it both ways. If the Government win he will say that it is undemocratic, and if the Government lose he will say that it is a triumph for democracy. He cannot have it both ways.

Sir Anthony Grant: Will my right hon. Friend please ask all Ministers to speed up the replies that they give to letters from hon. Members? In particular, will he ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to reply to two requests that he has received from me on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Paice) and me, to which we have not had the courtesy of a reply?

Mr. Wakeham: If my hon. Friend has not had a reply to his letter I shall look into it and see what can be done. It is timely that my hon. Friend should remind us that it is important that all Ministers reply to letters as speedily as possible. I hope that my hon. Friend will ask me the same question in a year's time and that there will be an improvement where there has been any shortcoming.

Mr. Ashdown: Is the Leader of the House aware that the United States Government have now refused to supply key software to British universities because they refuse to take action on end users, which his Government have described as illegal under international law and an infringement of British sovereignty? We all know that the Government have refused to stand up to the United States Government in protecting British industry. Will he now stand up to the United States Government in protecting British universities and academic freedom?

Mr. Wakeham: The relationship between the British Government and the United States Government is a good, long-standing and enduring relationship. Any difficulties that there might be in any particular instance can be dealt with through negotiation between the two Governments.

Mr. Bowis: Will my right hon. Friend find time to study Mr. Dukakis's criticism of the British legal system and courts? Does he agree that either that gentleman is muddle-headed or mischievous, and in either case there is a question mark over his judgment?

Mr. Wakeham: I have no wish to make any comments about the United States presidential candidates on either side at this time. I am sure that if any presidential candidate studies the United Kingdom's justice system he will find that it does not match up with some of the reported comments.

Q2. Mr. Bell: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 3 November.

Mr. Wakeham: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave recently.

Mr. Bell: Can the Lord President of the Council tell the House why the Cabinet met on Tuesday morning, agreed public expenditure of £167,000 million, agreed a welcome £2,000 million for the Health Service, agreed a balance of payments deficit of £13,000 million, agreed a contingency of £9,000 million, and then reassembled here late at night and in the early hours of the morning to take three quid from the pockets of our constituents for dental checks and ten quid from their pockets for eye tests?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman gives an inaccurate account of a Cabinet meeting at which he was not present, and an inaccurate account of a meeting of the House at which he was present. At the Cabinet meeting in the morning we approved this year's Autumn Statement. That Autumn Statement shows the success of the Government's policies. Spending on priority programmes continues to grow. Total public spending as a share of gross domestic product is lower than it has been for 20 years and we are repaying the national debt. We have taken firm action to ensure that inflation resumes its downward path next year. Strong investment growth is adding to capacity, which will boost exports, discourage imports and help to reduce the current account deficit. All this will happen in the ninth successive year of economic growth. Any Labour Government would have been proud indeed to announce programmes of that kind, but they never did.

Q3. Mr. John Browne: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 3 November.

Mr. Wakeham: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Browne: Will my right hon. Friend support the drive against leaded fuel, highlighted in today's Daily Mail? Is he aware that although we appreciate Government action to date in terms of publicity and petrol tax incentives, we expect far more decisive and speedy action? Will he think in terms of legislation to set maximum percentage sales levels for leaded fuel, which would decrease into the future?

Mr. Wakeham: I agree that this is an important subject. The Government are playing a major part in the campaign to persuade motorists to switch to unleaded petrol. I urge all drivers to find out whether their cars can run on unleaded petrol. I am delighted to say that mine can and does. I hope that the industry will ensure that the clearest possible information is given to assist motorists in this.

Ms. Ruddock: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with the British ambassador to Dublin that nuclear power is popular in Britain, and will he confirm the ambassador's assertion that a possible sight for a nuclear power station has been considered in east London?

Mr. Wakeham: The Government are strongly committed to nuclear power and in that, I believe, we have the overwhelming support of the British people, but I am certainly not getting involved in discussing sites for nuclear power stations.

Q4. Mr. McCrindle To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 3 November.

Mr. Wakeham: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. McCrindle: Will my right hon.Friend join me in suggesting to those nurses who have a grievance about their grading that the way to overcome the problem is to use the appeals machinery that has been introduced, rather than to contemplate industrial action? Does he further agree that the British taxpayer will find it curious if, having met the bill for the largest ever wage settlement for nurses, the result were a diminution rather than an enhancement of patient care?

Mr. Wakeham: I agree very much with my hon. Friend. I am sure the public recognise that the great bulk of the nursing profession are very satisfied with the generous and well-deserved settlement. On average, even after inflation, nurses' pay is 45 per cent. higher than in 1979. That compares with a cut of 21 per cent. under the Labour Government. I am afraid that it is typical of some trade unions to prefer industrial action to sticking to agreements that they have reached, whether about the grading structure itself or about the way in which grading disputes should be handled.

Mr. Mallon: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that basic essentials such as food, heat and electricity cost 30 per cent. more in Northern Ireland than in other regions, with the result that many people will not be able to put food on the table in the winter? Are the Government intent on tampering with the right to eat in the same way as they are tampering with the right to silence, the right to free speech and the right to a free and open franchise?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman gives a one-sided account, although I accept that there are many problems in Northern Ireland. The hon. Gentleman put the same question to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security the other day, and I have nothing to add to what my right hon. Friend said.

Q5. Mr. Hannam: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 3 November.

Mr. Wakeham: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hannam: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the growing public demand for higher standards in broadcasting, especially with regard to violence and pornography on the screen? Will he ensure that proper safeguards are built into the future deregulation of broadcasting to protect viewers against what could be a flood of undesirable material?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend is right, and it was in response to the increasing public concern about the portrayal of sex and violence on television and radio that the Government decided to set up the Broadcasting Standards Council, which will serve as a focus for public concern on these matters. The need to maintain proper standards of taste and decency has been taken fully into account in our preparation of the White Paper on broadcasting, which will be published shortly.

Mr. Faulds: After the disturbing scenes at the Nuremberg rally at Brighton a couple of weeks ago, when do the Government intend to introduce uniforms for their followers?

Mr. Wakeham: I have a feeling that the hon. Gentleman would like to be wearing a uniform, and a year or two ago he might have looked quite smart in it. I have to tell him that we have no such plans.

Q6. Mr. David Porter: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 3 November.

Mr. Wakeham: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Porter: Will my right hon. Friend acknowledge the warm welcome given by most East Anglians to this week's Autumn Statement and in particular that part which gives extra money to sea defence spending, coast protection and flood prevention? Will he confirm that it is Government policy that flood prevention is a national undertaking and not merely a local problem?

Mr. Wakeham: As a Member representing an east coast constituency, I share my hon. Friend's pleasure at the fact that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given priority to improving our flood defences, and an extra £25 million per annum was announced in the Autumn Statement. We believe that local communities are the best judges of sea defence priority and costs, but the Government recognise that the expenditure can be heavy, and thus contribute substantial grant-aid to water authorities undertaking sea defence works.

Business of the House

3.30 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): May I ask the Leader of the House whether he will state the business of the House for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 7 NOVEMBER—Committee and remaining stages of the Rate Support Grants Bill.

TUESDAY 8 NOVEMBER—Motion on the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at 7 o'clock.

Consideration of Lords amendments to the Copyright, Designs and Patents Bill [Lords].

WEDNESDAY 9 NOVEMBER—Consideration of Lords amendments to the Housing Bill.

Consideration of Lords amendments to the School Boards (Scotland) Bill.

THURSDAY 10 NOVEMBER—There will be a debate on a motion to take note of the draft revised guidelines for handling Members' representations in immigration cases.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at 7 o'clock.

Remaining stages of the Road Traffic Bill [Lords], the Road Traffic (Consequential Provisions) Bill [Lords] and the Road Traffic Offenders Bill [Lords], which are consolidation measures.

Motion on the Consumer Protection Act 1987 (Commencement No. 2) Order.

FRIDAY 11 NOVEMBER—There will be a debate on housing and homelessness on a motion for the Adjournment of the House. The Environment Committee's Second Report Session 1987-88 so far as it relates to homelessness will be relevant to the debate.

MONDAY 14 NOVEMBER—There will be debates on motions to take note of EC documents on safety in the workplace and personal protective equipment, on tar yields of cigarettes and the labelling of tobacco products, and on waste from the titanium dioxide industry. Details of the EC documents concerned will be given in the Official Report.

The House may also be asked to consider any Lords amendments and messages which may be received.

[Monday 14 November 1988 (3 separate debates). Relevant European Community Documents: (a) 5211/88 Health and safety in the workplace; (b) 5762/88 Personal protective equipment; (c) 4192/88 Labelling of tobacco products; (d) 4193/88 Control of maximum tar yield of cigarettes; (e) 6387/83 Titanium dioxide industry wastes; (f) 7733/84 Titanium dioxide waste pollution.

Relevant Reports of European Legislation Committee: (a) HC 43-xxiv (1987-88) paragraph 3; (b) HC 43-xxxiv (1987-88) paragraph 2; (c) HC 43-xix (1987-88) paragraph 1; (d) HC 43-xix (1987-88) paragraph 2; (e) HC 78-viii (1983-84) paragraph 6; (f) HC 78-xxxiv (1983-84) paragraph 3, HC 43-xxxiv (1987-88) paragraph 1 and HC 43-xxxv (1987-88) paragraph 1.]

Mr. Dobson: Why is there no proposal for an Opposition day this week? This parliamentary year is about 25 per cent. longer than the average parliamentary year, so, in equity, the Opposition should have got five extra Opposition days to match the increase in time available for Government business.

Even if the Leader of the House now has so little time left in this Session to meet his obligations to the Opposition, will he turn his attention in the forthcoming Session to all aspects of his official job description? The list of ministerial responsibilities issued by the Cabinet Office states that the Leader of the House

"should uphold the rights and privileges of the House as a whole."

Will the right hon. Gentleman either do that or get the Cabinet Office to change the job description?

While considering his obligations to the House, will the right hon. Gentleman also consider his obligations to Britain, and in particular to the people of Scotland? Last week, I named four Tory Members who took part in the debates on the Housing (Scotland) Bill and on the poll tax in Scotland. My hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) has written to no fewer than 17 of the right hon. Gentleman's Tory colleagues who have asked questions at Scottish Question Time asking them whether they would take up places on the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs.

Surely, with such breadth of talent available to him, the Leader of the House should be able to use his influence to get at least four of his hon. Friends to serve on that Committee. Earlier this week, the Tory Whips worked hard to deprive people of free eye tests; could they put their threatening talents to work again, at least to bring the Scottish Select Committee into action? We would rather that happened than have a debate about why the right hon. Gentleman has failed to constitute the Committee.

Have the Government now agreed that the House will be given an opportunity in Government time to hold a separate debate and vote on the failure to uprate child benefit? As we said last week, the usual omnibus debate on all the benefits is an inadequate way of dealing with this matter.

Finally, arising from last night's debate, will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for the Home Secretary to make a statement to clear up the confusion created last night by the conflict between what he and the Minister of State said about who may or may not be interviewed live on television and radio in the context of terrorism? The Home Secretary owes that clarification to the House and the broadcasters.

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman raised four questions about next week's business. First, I congratulate him on his re-election to the shadow Cabinet with, I gather, one or two more votes than he managed to get the year before. I hope that his performances on Thursdays have helped him in his endeavours.

I regret that it has not been possible to find an Opposition day. We have much important business next week, but the Standing Orders clearly provide that 20 days shall be allotted in each Session to proceedings on Opposition business. We have already provided the Opposition with one additional day, and in accordance with the wishes of the minority parties we have agreed to carry over one of their days to the next Session. I regret to say that the Opposition do not receive fewer Opposition days in a Session which is shorter than average.

We have had a number of exchanges about Scotland in recent months; I want to move the debate on a bit further.

[Mr. Wakeham]

I would welcome such a debate, but, unfortunately, it has not been possible to find the time. I have given an undertaking, and the discussions are best resolved through the usual channels.

I told the House last week, in the context of child benefit, that benefits will come before the House before Christmas. I stick by that undertaking, and I shall discuss through the usual channels how best it should be carried out.

Neither the Home Secretary nor the Minister of State believes that any confusion arises out of last night's debate, as a fair reading of Hansard will confirm.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): Despite the isolationist gloss which the Prime Minister's press secretary seems to put on her perfectly sensible statements about Europe, there is a general recognition in the House of the need to co-operate more closely. Will my right hon. Friend be in a position next week to make any statement about improved facilities for contact between this Parliament and the European Parliament?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not accept for a minute what my hon. Friend has said about my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's press secretary. I thought that my right hon. Friend's speech was important and interesting, and it received considerable support. I believe that her officials did not attempt to put any gloss on it. I recognise the importance of the point that my hon. Friend has raised about closer contact. I have been trying for some time to make arrangements that are acceptable to all parts of the House. I shall continue my endeavours. However, I need other people to agree with me if we are to make progress.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): In regard to the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order on Tuesday evening, we understand that the Home Secretary is contemplating the introduction of similar legislation. Does the Leader of the House agree that it is desirable that such legislation should be similar throughout the United Kingdom, even if that means a delay in introducing the Northern Ireland order?

Mr. Wakeham: That is a perfectly proper point of view for debate. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has said how he wishes to proceed, subject to the approval of the House, and so has my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. The best thing for me to say to the right hon. Gentleman is that these points will be relevant to the debate next week.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Is my right hon. Friend getting rather tired of seeing me rising each week to ask whether he will provide time for a debate on the reports of the Select Committee on Procedure? He gave an assurance to the House that a debate would be held before the summer recess in 1987. As we are coming to the end of this Session, will my right hon. Friend assure the House that we shall have a debate within a fortnight of the completion of the debate on the Queen's Speech?

Mr. Wakeham: I assure my hon. Friend that, whenever he rises in the Chamber to ask me a question, I look upon it as a bright part of the day. I enjoy it very much.

When trying to find time to debate the Select Committee's reports, we have to consider that the reports contain a number of important issues on which we need to advance with as much co-operation as possible from all parts of the House. Some parts of the House have not, perhaps, been as quick to understand the implications of those issues as my hon. Friend has been. A debate will be held on the reports as soon as I feel that it would be a profitable exercise.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Is it not utterly disgraceful that life-saving medical help here is being denied to Marquita O'Garro, aged five, the severely disabled child in the British dependency of Montserrat, whose case is described by The Sunday Times as "Britain's shame"? Is the Leader of the House aware that, without an operation which cannot be performed in the dependency, she will probably die by Christmas? Will the right hon. Gentleman therefore arrange for a very urgent statement, either by the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs or the Secretary of State for Health, on whether they are prepared to intervene to save the child's life? Can we also have an early statement on the Government's whole attitude to patients in British dependencies who need urgent and specialised medical care?

Mr. Wakeham: The right hon. Gentleman raises a case that is obviously of concern to everybody. I cannot answer the question immediately, but I shall ensure that my right hon. Friends are aware of his concern and that he receives an answer about the way in which the Government feel best able to help.

Mr. Speaker: I call Mr. James Hill. I apologise for miscalling him previously.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): Did my right hon. Friend see last week the excellent documentary on the environment, presented by a member of the royal family, which described some of the monstrosities that are being passed by local council planning committees? Is there not a case, at a time when the issue is almost daily news in the national papers, for a debate on the process of environmental planning? Could we also not consider ten commandments for good, tasteful planning for human purposes?

Mr. Wakeham: I did not see the programme, but somehow I seem to have heard a bit about it. It sounded like an interesting programme for somebody who had studied the issue carefully. I know that those who are responsible for such matters will study the points that were made.

Ms. Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): Will the Leader of the House find time in the near future for a debate on environmental pollution, especially on Teesside, because although there has clearly been some progress, there is an increased level of public concern about the amount of waste which is being imported to be reprocessed and redirected in England?

Mr. Wakeham: No sooner asked than delivered: tomorrow's debate will be relevant to that subject.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Between now and next Wednesday evening, when on the Adjournment I and other Leicestershire Members of Parliament will raise the question of hospitals in Leicestershire, will my right hon. Friend please speak to the relevant Minister of the Department of Health and tell her—I assume it will be "her"—that it will not be sufficient to make some generalities in reply because we shall expect to hear that the proposals to close all rural maternity units have been dropped?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not know which Minister will reply, but if it is my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), I should say that I have not heard her being accused of making generalities in most of her speeches. Nevertheless, I shall put my hon. Friend's points to her.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Arising out of the right hon. Gentleman's reply to the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux), first, what further work is being done in looking into the way in which the House deals with Northern Ireland business, especially the Orders in Council procedures? Secondly, at what stage are the proposals to establish a British-Irish parliamentary tier?

Mr. Wakeham: I know that the way in which we conduct our affairs in matters relating to Northern Ireland is not entirely satisfactory, but I do not see any immediate chance of changing it, although it would obviously form part of progress generally in these matters if we could reach agreement. On the hon. Gentleman's second point about a parliamentary tier, I had some discussions with the leaders of parties in the House just before the summer recess to suggest where I thought we might be able to make some progress. I intend to have further discussions with them in the near future to see how they feel we should now proceed.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): In providing time for discussions on the future of the National Health Service, will my right hon. Friend deplore the method adopted by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) when discussing the future of the NHS by reference to hard, individual cases, however sad they may be? Will my right hon. Friend remind his noble Friends in the other place of the constitutional convention that in money matters relating to the Health Service—for example, charges—they should defer to the opinion of this House?

Mr. Wakeham: I certainly do not wish to criticise the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), but my hon. Friend has made a valid point. It is sometimes difficult, when an hon. Member raises an individual case and that hon. Member is the only one with access to the facts, for others to be able to make a considered comment upon it, because there are often many more facts that should be brought out first.

With regard to the House of Commons' decision on the Health and Medicines Bill and the other place, I believe that the constitutional rules by which we conduct ourselves are right. The House of Lords will make its own decision in its own way. I am sure that it will take into consideration the fact that this issue has been discussed twice, very adequately, by the House of Commons and that in both debates the Government won the argument and the vote.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): The Leader of the House will be well aware of the early-day motions which raise the issue of Barlow Clowes and of its effect on ordinary citizens of this nation who, in all honesty and with good advice, invested their hard-earned money in that enterprise. Unfortunately, we have been unable to have a proper debate on that, so will the Leader of the House consider having such a debate, or will the Government dodge that issue for ever?

Mr. Wakeham: No, it has not been possible to arrange a debate in the period up to the prorogation of Parliament. Obviously, many right hon. and hon. Members would like one, but that is a matter to which we can return after the Queen's Speech.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): The Leader of the House will no doubt have noted early-day motion No. 1169, "Crèche facilities at the Palace of Westminster".

[That this House considers that crèche facilities should be established within the Palace of Westminster for the children of Right honourable and honourable Members and members of the staff working within the Palace.]

That motion, which is in the name of one of the right hon. Gentleman's right hon. Friends, has attracted more than 100 signatures. Will the Leader of the House study that motion and make a considered response to whether crèche facilities can be introduced—not just for the children of right hon. and hon. Members but also for those of staff who work here?

Mr. Wakeham: This matter has already been referred to the relevant Sub-Committee of the Services Committee for further consideration. We must leave it to that Sub-Committee to consider the matter first.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): Can my right hon. Friend arrange a debate in the new Session, if not before, on a matter that touches on many problems, from football hooliganism and law and order to terrorism? I refer to the provision of a national identity card. We seem to be playing with that proposal and suggesting that others should introduce such a card, but even electronic tagging will be impossible without a national identity card system so that we may know where our population live and the rights they have.

Mr. Wakeham: I know that some people believe that such a card would be helpful in dealing with some problems. However, the Government have not been persuaded of the desirability of going down that road at present, although we encourage the voluntary issue of identity cards in certain cases, such as by licensed victuallers. I agree with my hon. Friend that this matter could be debated at some time. It may be relevant to debates that we shall be having in the not-too-distant future, but I cannot promise a special day.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I wonder whether it would be possible next week to arrange Prime Minister's questions and business questions at a time convenient for the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition. Incidentally, does my right hon. Friend know where he is today? It could not be, surely, that he is too important to honour the House with his presence when the Prime Minister happens to be abroad on important business?

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Well, he certainly does not come in to see you.

Mr. Wakeham: The Leader of the Opposition always very courteously tells me when he is not able to be present, and I appreciate that. It is for him to decide how he best uses his time.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Will the Leader of the House allow time for a debate on journalistic standards? I draw his attention to a headline in last night's Yorkshire Evening Post that casts a slur on Opposition Members by blatantly lying about their attendance during consideration of the Health and Medicines Bill. May we have such a debate urgently?

Mr. Wakeham: If we had a debate every time that either the press or the electronic media says something untrue or disagreeable about right hon. or hon. Members, we would discuss nothing else; that is something we must accept. By and large, the media do their best, but they do not always get it right. I agree that journalistic standards are an important matter, but I cannot promise an early debate. There will be one on the broadcasting White Paper that will touch on some of the issues, but perhaps not in the way that the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) phrased her question.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): In the debate that my right hon. Friend has just mentioned, will it be possible to raise the issue of media standards generally? Despite the controversy surrounding "Death on the Rock", Central Television recently allocated two hours of prime-time televison to accuse three gentlemen of President Kennedy's assassination, without bothering to find out that they all had cast-iron alibis. Right hon. and hon. Members are increasingly fed up with the powers of self-appointed TV producers to conduct trial by television and accuse innocent men without giving any right of reply. It really is disgraceful.

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) makes his point extremely well and clearly, but what will be in order in any debate is a matter not for me but for you, Mr. Speaker, to decide.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): Will the Leader of the House consider the six early-day motions 1475 to 1480, referring to local government and competitive tendering?

[That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Local Government Act 1988 (Defined Activities) (Exemptions) (Scotland) Order 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 1415), dated 8th August 1988, a copy of which was laid before this House on 11th August, be annulled.]

[That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Local Government Act 1988 (Defined Activities) (Competition) (Scotland) Order 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 1413), dated 8th August 1988, a copy of which was laid before this House on 11th August, be annulled.]

[That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Education (Mandatory Awards) Regulations 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 1360), dated 29th July 1988, a copy of which was laid before this House on 10th August, be annulled.]

[That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Local Government Act 1988 (Defined Activities) (Specified Periods) (Wales) Regulations 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 1470), dated 12th August 1988, a copy of which was laid before this House on 19th August, be annulled.]

[That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Local Government Act 1988 (Defined Activities) (Exemptions) (Wales) Order 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 1469), dated 12th August 1988, a copy of which was laid before this House on 19th August, be annulled.]

[That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Local Government Act 1988 (Defined Activities) (Competition) (Wales) Regulations 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 1468), dated 12th August 1988, a copy of which was laid before this House on 19th August, be annulled.]

Will the right hon. Gentleman consider also the three orders that have been laid in relation to local government and competitive tendering in Wales, and the situation in Scotland in particular? Can there be an early debate on those matters because of the uncertainties affecting local government employees and local authorities in general?

Mr. Wakeham: I know about the orders and the anxiety of the hon. Gentleman and some of his hon. Friends that a debate should take place, but I think that it is a matter for discussions through the usual channels.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Does my right hon. Friend feel that it would be for the convenience of the House to curtail important debates by midnight, bearing in mind our experience with the Health and Medicines Bill on Tuesday, when two important votes took place in the early hours of the morning and at least two senior members of the SLDP found it more important to be at home in their beds than present to vote?

Mr. Wakeham: I am afraid that those of us who seek and obtain election to the House must recognise that our hours are what I believe is known as unsociable. There have been attempts over the years to change that, and my task is to keep business down to the minimum, but I am afraid that late nights will still be involved from time to time. Nevertheless, I do not think that we have as many late nights as we used to.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Has the Leader of the House read the Le Quesne report on Barlow Clowes? Has he noted that, despite what was said at the Dispatch Box, it points to the guilt of the Department of Trade and Industry? Investors throughout the country want Parliament to discuss that report, but the decision is for the Leader of the House. Can we debate it?

Mr. Wakeham: I cannot add anything to what I have already said, which is that I cannot find time for a debate at present. I have, however, read the report, and I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's conclusions. I believe that the problem arose because a private sector firm defaulted on its obligations, and I do not think that the use of taxpayers' money to make good such losses can be justified. Investors must consider for themselves whether they have grounds for legal action and, if so, against whom. Let me repeat to the hon. Gentleman that no taxpayers' funds were used in the 1970 lifeboat operation for the secondary banking crisis, or when equity prices fell sharply in the mid-1970s.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the exceptional support on the Conservative Back Benchers for early-day motion 275, which calls for the abolition of the national dock labour scheme?

[That this House believes that the National Dock Labour Scheme is an anachronism which both endangers the viability of jobs in the scheme areas and acts as a deterrent to job creation by new ventures; and calls on Her Majesty's Government to abolish the scheme, and open negotiations immediately with employers and unions to bring that about.]

Is he aware of the considerable dereliction on the banks of the Thames and elsewhere in the docklands of the inner cities, largely brought about by the scheme? Can we hope for an early debate, or perhaps action to bring an end to the scheme and return jobs to those areas?

Mr. Wakeham: The Government are aware of the views of many of my hon. Friends about the drawbacks of the national dock labour scheme. As I have made clear to the House on other occasions, however, we have no plans at present to change the scheme's operation, although such matters are of course kept under review.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): May I draw the Lord President's attention to early-day motion 1503, signed by 84 Labour Members, which refers to British Airways' decision to purchase the Boeing 737 rather than the Airbus 320?

[That this House condemns the decision by British Airways to buy Boeing 737 in preference to the Airbus 320; regards this decision as a body blow to the United Kingdom and the European Aerospace industries; believes that it will threaten the long-term job prospects of workers in the Aerospace industry; recognises that this is a classic example of a privatised industry taking decisions without regard to the best interests of the United Kingdom; calls upon the Government who have supplied launch aid for the A320 to point out strongly to British Airways that their decision could adversely affect the repayments of the launch aid and the United Kingdom balance of payments; and requests them to reconsider their decision as the national carrier to fly the Stars and Stripes instead of the British flag.]

The move will bring very little work to this country, and is a matter of great concern to the aerospace industry. British Airways is one of the only national carriers in Europe to turn its back on the Airbus 320, which is technologically far in advance of the Boeing 737. Will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for an early debate?

Mr. Wakeham: I cannot arrange a specific debate on the subject, but there will be occasions on which the hon. Gentleman can raise points of concern to him. British Airways is of course a private company, and the way in which it chooses to equip its fleet is entirely a matter for its own commercial judgment. It is not for the Government to seek to influence its decision making in this or any other commercial matter.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the apparently surreptitious acquisition of 65 acres near Heathrow airport by or for British Airways, which my constituents and others living nearby in west London suspect to be on offer for a fifth terminal? Could we have an early debate so that hon. Members may express their determined opposition to the establishment of a fifth terminal there?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend raises an important matter, but I cannot promise him a debate on it. I am sure, however, that he will, with his usual ingenuity, find a means of raising it.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will there be an opportunity for the Prime Minister to make a statement on Monday—the day of industrial action over GCHQ—about how she can talk in Poland about trade union rights while in Britain she denies people at GCHQ their basic right to join a trade union? If the Prime Minister makes a statement on Monday, will she also be able to explain how she can sympathise about a shipyard in Poland being closed when she shows absolutely no interest in the imminent closure of a shipyard in Britain?

Mr. Wakeham: Those are two typical, but still mischievous, questions. The hon. Gentleman knows the difference perfectly well. We believe that workers should have the freedom to join a trade union of their choice——

Mr. Winnick: At GCHQ?

Mr. Wakeham: —or not to join one. There are, however, special considerations when national security is involved.

Mr. Winnick: That is what they say in Poland.

Mr. Wakeham: Members of the security services have never been allowed to join a trade union. The hon. Gentleman must accept that there was a considerable amount of industrial difficulty at GCHQ between 1979 and 1981. The differences have been well aired in the House, and the hon. Gentleman knows it. I cannot imagine that that matter will form part of any statement that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister may or may not make in the House next week.

The hon. Gentleman drew a wholly false comparison with regard to shipbuilding. The North-East Shipbuilders Ltd. issue is important and should not be treated lightly or casually. No decisions have been taken. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy is getting additional information that he wants about one of the bids, and will no doubt make a statement when a decision has been made.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Will my right hon. Friend find time early in the new Session for a full debate on Barlow Clowes? A debate would give us an opportunity to show how the City got it wrong in terms of solicitors and accountants advising the Department of Trade and Industry and intermediaries advising investors. A debate is important as there cannot be an hon. Member who does not have some sad cases in his constituency. It is important to show the country and investors in Barlow Clowes that we care about their plight and are prepared to join in a rescue fund. Such a debate would also clarify the situation.

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend is always very persuasive, but I cannot add to what I have already said on the subject.

Mr. Tony Banks: How did the Leader of the House feel when the Prime Minister so cruelly dashed his political hopes by dismissing the prospect of his or his colleagues ever taking over as leader of the Conservative party? Perhaps he will take this opportunity to get his own back by announcing that he has speeded up consideration of the terms of the experiment for televising the House, as it is about time that we had an opportunity to discuss the initial report. When will that report be presented to us? Does he yet have a date for the televising of the House?

Mr. Wakeham: One thing that we cannot criticise the hon. Gentleman for is lack of imagination. He can dream up all sorts of things to ask questions about.

Members of the Select Committee set about their work seriously and conscientiously. They are dealing with an important and substantial topic. Any rumours in the press about dates of reports and postponement are mostly in the imagination of people who want to disrupt us from the course we set ourselves, which was to produce a report having considered all the issues. If the House had wanted just a working party to set up this experiment, it would have got a working party. It wanted a Select Committee, and the hon. Gentleman knows that a Select Committee has to take evidence, consider it and make a report. It takes some time to do that properly, and it is being done properly.

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): My right hon. Friend will be aware of a recent incident of appallingly bad driving, when a barge went into Battersea bridge. He will also be aware that Battersea is an area of London with no rail or underground links. Traffic is prevented from going north across the river and only cars are allowed to go south. Will he arrange for a statement next week on when the bridge will be open? I hope that it will be open before Christmas. Will he also arrange for a statement on what steps are being taken to avoid such incidents in future?

Mr. Wakeham: I know all about that, because I was stuck in my hon. Friend's constituency for about an hour last Monday morning on my way to the House. Only because I saw so many people who had voted for my hon. Friend did my temper stay nice and cool. I shall refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to see whether a statement is required. If so, it can be made.

Ms. Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): Will the Leader of the House find time for an early debate on the problems that many pensioners will experience this winter in getting enough money to keep warm? It is a national scandal that there are so many deaths each winter from hypothermia in what is hardly the coldest climate in Europe. Can we also debate what practical steps can be taken to abolish the disconnection of utilities from people aged over 60?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Lady, I know, takes a serious view of these matters, but I must tell her that the Government's record on helping old-age pensioners is substantially better than that of the Labour Government who were in office before she came to the House. Also, additions to take account of heating costs are substantially greater now than they used to be.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Secretary of State for Employment to come to the House next week to explain what action he has taken to make a reality of the Government's guarantee to school leavers of a youth training scheme place or a job? Does he realise that thousands of 16 and 17-year-olds who left school this summer have neither a YTS place nor a job and that, since 12 September, they have been unable to claim benefit? Is it not wildly irresponsible of the Government to leave thousands of 16 and 17-year-olds without any income, thereby forcing some of them into trouble and crime? It seems recklessly irresponsible. Will the Government take urgent action to reverse this policy?

Mr. Wakeham: I have heard this before. When I looked into it, I discovered that there are substantially more places than people to fill them, but that in some areas the match is not as it should be. In those very few cases, the Government are taking urgent action with the providers of training to get over any little difficulties that there may be in one or two places. By and large, the scheme is working extremely well.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Can we have a debate in the near future—preferably next week—to consider the bids that have been put in for the Settle-Carlisle railway line and to see whether they have any sense, sensibility and realism? British Rail has treated the whole exercise as though it is a major defence secret. We could at the same time discuss the Government's plans to close 1,000 miles of branch line, fattening up—or slimming down—British Rail for privatisation, thereby destroying a valuable public service and forcing travellers to go on already overcrowded roads which yield more than 5,000 deaths and hundreds of thousands of injuries each year, instead of preserving a full public network. It is vital to have a debate before this organised vandalism is implemented.

Mr. Wakeham: I can deal with great authority with the article in The Guardian about the 1,000 miles of railway which is to be closed. One word describes it: the article is rubbish. I know that the hon. Gentleman has taken a keen interest in the Settle-Carlisle railway. I cannot add to what I have said to him in the past, but I shall refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will the Leader of the House, with his customary courtesy, correct a factual inaccuracy? He said that I alone was familiar with the case of the 5-year-old disabled child who is dangerously ill and in need of urgent medical care. While I may know more about the detail of the case than other people, how can the Leader's statement possibly be true when the case was reported at length and in detail by the Sunday Times?

Mr. Wakeham: If I said something that upset the right hon. Gentleman, of course, I withdraw it.

Health and Medicines Bill (Lords Amendments)

4.10 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This morning, the radio was retailing an account of representations that had been made to you regarding the continuation of the debate that took place on Tuesday about eyes and teeth. It was being suggested that the Parliament Act would prevent the debate and the vote on one of those issues taking place.

I am probably the last person in this building to want to give an oxygen cylinder to the other place, but the plain fact is that, under the Parliament Act as I see it, and in view of the fact that the other place has debated these two issues, it would be able to continue the debate and perhaps bring the matter back to this place, if the vote is carried.

Will you confirm, Mr. Speaker, that there have been no representations from the Government on this issue , that no decisions have been made and that, contrary to all the reports on the airwaves this morning, those debates will take place?

Mr. Speaker: I cannot confirm that, because I am not in any sense connected with the Government, but I heard what I judged to be a somewhat inaccurate statement on the news about my ruling.

To clear that up, I should say to the House that I have given no ruling on the Health and Medicines Bill other than that which I gave when I was in the Chair during the debate. Lords amendments Nos. 20 and 22 involve Commons privileges. The House gave a reason for disagreeing with the Lords on amendment No. 20. It did not do so in respect of amendment No. 22 as it is not the custom to give a reason when consequential amendments are made to a Bill.

Confidential Documents

4.11 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would be greatly obliged if you would consider and express, in due course and in principle, a view on an issue relating to a matter set down in extenso on page 93 of "Erskine May" under the general heading

"Matters arising outside Parliament which may be treated as proceedings inside Parliament".

This point arises by virtue of the close relationship of those two matters, pending business in the House and, especially, in the context of breaches of the Official Secrets Act. I refer generally to the release of certain stolen confidential documents from within Whitehall relating to the pending business of this House, and their use by hon. Members, inside or outside the House.

In the light of condemnation of such actions by the Law Lords in the "Spycatcher" case, I simply ask whether you would be good enough in due course to give a general ruling on such matters and to explain to the House what guidance it might take from your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: That is a hypothetical matter, but, if the hon. Gentleman is making an allegation about the leaked documents of which we have heard this week, as a matter of privilege, he should write to me in the usual way and I shall certainly consider the matter.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you confirm that, in the late 1930s, when Winston Churchill was leaking information and documents that he received from the Ministry of Defence, which was leaking like a sieve, an inquiry was set up in the House and the House ruled that it was his duty to bring that information, however he obtained it, before us?

Mr. Speaker: I cannot confirm very much of what went on in 1930. I was still at school.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Further to your response to the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Stafford, (Mr. Cash), Mr. Speaker, will you confirm that, in the event of the hon. Gentleman writing to you and your ruling on matters relating to the privilege in respect of leaked Government documents, any ruling by you will apply to any document, whoever leaks it?

Mr. Speaker: These are hypothetical matters. I will wait to receive a letter and look carefully into the question.

BILL PRESENTED

COUNTING WOMEN'S UNREMUNERATED WORK

Ms. Mildred Gordon, supported by Mr. Keith Vaz, Mrs. Alice Mahon, Mr. Tony Benn, Ms. Joyce Quin, Ms. Marjorie Mowlam, Mr. John Hughes, Mr. John Battle, Mr. Tony Banks, Ms. Dianne Abbott, Mr. Doug Hoyle and Mr. Bill Michie, presented a Bill to require government departments and other public bodies to include in the production of statistics relating to the gross domestic product and other accounts a calculation of the unremunerated contribution of women and to include this calculation in the Gross National Product: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 225.]

Public Accounts Committee

4.14 pm

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of the 1st to 36th and 41st Reports and First Special Report from the Committee of Public Accounts of Session 1987-88 and of the Treasury Minutes on those Reports (Cm. 307, 323, 367, 410, 502 and 509), with particular reference to the following Reports:—

16th: Monitoring and Control of Charities in England and Wales

20th: Ministry of Defence: Fraudulent expenses claims; Meteorological Services

26th: Community care developments

31st: Naval warship and weapons procurement

32nd: Review of the operations of the Land Registry

Today we are having our annual debate on the public accounts reports. They do not cover all the matters that we have discussed; they are the matters on which we have had a reply from the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who, acting on behalf of the Treasury, produces the Treasury minutes for us.

Our last debate was on 3 December last year when we considered the 54 reports tabled in the motion. This time, we are dealing with 38 reports and six Government replies. There are fewer this year because, first, it is only 11 months since the last debate and, secondly, as a result of the election, we took rather less evidence during the year. I must put the House on notice that we are likely to bring significantly more before it next year.

As on recent occasions, we have chosen five reports to highlight in the motion. The way in which we selected those reports reflects the lessons which can be learnt and should be drawn to the attention of the House because substantial sums of money are involved and particular interests should be explained and discussed. A number of other reports are likely to be mentioned in the debate.

I must give my personal thanks to Committee members. It is an extraordinarily hard-working Committee, frequently interviewing two Departments each week. That means that there is a vast amount of paperwork and the work is now undertaken by the Committee far more assiduously than it has ever been during the period that I have been associated with the Committee, which, like that of the hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw), goes back over 20 years. That work has borne fruit in the reports now before the House.

A number of hon. Members have left the Committee. The hon. Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern), has become chairman of the commission which looks after the detailed operations of the National Audit Office and the Northern Ireland Audit Office. He considers such matters as pay, conditions and recruitment. I am also a member of that commission and, only this week, we visited Northern Ireland to see the National Audit Office there and to ensure that it has the appropriate impact.

The value of these reports—I cannot stress this too highly—is that we have unanimity in every report. That is important because we differ from other Select Committees, which have their differences from time to time. We achieve this unanimity because we are trying to protect the taxpayer. That matter is of overriding importance to us. We achieve that unanimity, not by diluting the force of our report, but by concentrating on whether the taxpayer is obtaining value for money. That is why we have such an impact and, I hope, always will have. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury will reply to the debate. He is welcome to attend our meetings whenever he wishes, but we know that the burdens of his office prevent him from attending frequently.

If the Committee and the National Audit Office are to work successfully, they must do so in a form of partnership. That is much easier to achieve now that the Comptroller and Auditor General is an Officer of the House. That is an important change. He is responsible to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House. That was not so in the past and has been an enormous improvement. In the past, we had almost a branch of the Civil Service, which meant that recruitment had to be undertaken within the normal rules of the Civil Service.

Now the situation has changed and the staff are auditors and accountants in their own right. They have more in common with accountancy firms in the City and in provincial towns than they have with the Civil Service generally. This is as it should be. So successful are they that a number of them are being attracted by the City and other areas of the private sector, where they are paid higher salaries, because of their expertise. When the recruits sit their accountancy examinations, we find that they take about 80 per cent. of the top places when the results are announced. These are the recruits of the National Audit Office. It is a great success story and we should be proud of it. We can be proud of this part of Parliament in which we have some responsibility.

The PAC works closely nowadays with the National Audit Office's investigations. Our work is based upon detailed examination of all Government papers that deal with the work undertaken in the Department which is the subject of the report from the Comptroller and Auditor General. The NAO produces its report to the House, and the Government know that the PAC and the NAO monitor the action that they take in response to the Committee's reports. We know that under the National Audit Act 1983 the Comptroller and Auditor General has discretion in the investigations that he chooses to make. There are regular discussions with the Committee, which is a novel feature of the PAC's work. This is part of the process which involves annually a detailed NAO corporate plan and a detailed examination of the reports and areas of activity. The relationship between us has prospered as we have brought our views to bear. The NAO gives us its views on important issues within the areas that are under investigation.

The new NAO Comptroller and Auditor General, John Bourn, was appointed by the Queen after the relevant motion was approved by the House, and we have a happy relationship with him. We feel that he has proved to be a successful choice. The office has nearly 1,000 staff members and it needs to keep under review the value for money that is achieved by the Government. The staff members are comparable to the sort of staff that would be found in industry. They examine the way in which the Civil Service spends public money.

I visited the National Audit Office in Northern Ireland on Tuesday. The task of auditing Northern Ireland expenditure on behalf of the Committee is an arduous one. There are particular problems in dealing with expenditures in Northern Ireland, but there is power now to make reports on value-for-money investigations. Five years ago, before the National Audit Act 1983 came into force—this was prompted by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Garrett)—we had the appropriation accounts. These were one or two voluminous reports that dealt with detailed matters.

We are now engaged in the process of getting value for money, and I shall say something about the way in which we go about that. Our prime consideration must always be to ensure that public money goes for the purposes which Parliament intended. Our purpose is to ensure that when the House votes money it goes to those whom Parliament intended to receive it and for the purpose which it intended. That must always be a prime consideration as we assure ourselves of the probity of the public service, and perhaps we take for granted too readily that probity.

I have met members of PACs from other parts of the Commonwealth. Their major preoccupation is to reduce fraud and corruption, and they want to know how we tackle the problem. Once fraud and corruption starts, it is extremely difficult to root out. The greater barrier to fraud and corruption in the public service is formed by honest individuals within the service. Once a group acts in concert to defraud the public, it is extraordinarily difficult to root out. Whenever we see any possibility of fraud or corruption we treat it as the most serious matter to come before us, and it is right that we should do so.

I am happy to say that these occasions are few and do not take as much of our time as they demand of other PACs in other countries. Thus we are able to deal more effectively and more usefully with the value-for-money parts of our operation.

Mr. Ralph Howell (Norfolk, North): I am interested to hear the right hon. Gentleman's remarks. I ask whether he is being rather complacent. How can we be sure that we are getting value for money in the National Health Service, for example, when there is no real accounting system, which means that there can be no real auditing system? It has been arranged deliberately that there should be no inventory control in many sectors of the NHS. This is made clear in the 14th report of 1985. Having considered the situation in the Health Service over all the years of its existence, the Department still did not know whether there were too many nurses or too few. The comment was made that that was unsatisfactory. I questioned my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State about this matter only the day before yesterday and he still could not say whether there are too many nurses or too few. The necessary information is not available and there is nothing on which to make comparisons. There is no proper accountancy system in the NHS or, I think I am right in saying, in any other sector of Government. I feel that complacency is being shown, and that talk of getting value for money is unrealistic.

Mr. Sheldon: I had not really moved to the question whether we are getting value for money. The hon. Gentleman is anticipating what I have to say about the problems of getting value for money. If he had waited a little longer he might have learnt rather more about the way in which we approach the issue.

I do not know whether the hon. Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) has read the PAC's 11th report, which deals with the internal audit of the Health Service. We set out what we need to have if we are to assure ourselves on these matters. In the past two years we have undertaken, with the co-operation of the Comptroller and Auditor General, a close and continuing examination of the NHS. The report on nurses was one of the early fruits of that work. We showed that the Department did not know whether there were too few nurses or too many. There was a report produced last week about the state of the NHS. It deals with whether it is being looked after properly. We cannot discuss the issue fully within this debate because we have not had a Treasury minute. There has been no opportunity to debate it properly. The important issue of operating theatres will be arising shortly. We are giving consideration also to family practitioners and doctors. We have suddenly moved into this area.

I am aware of the continuing interest of the hon. Member for Norfolk, North in these matters and I am pleased that we are able to deal with them. That is largely because of the way in which the NAO has superseded the old Exchequer and Audit Department. The value of the reports that are produced will become more widely appreciated.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I appreciate that my right hon. Friend has moved on from fraud and corruption to value for money. I revert to fraud and corruption, however, because he has said that there are relatively few examples of it. It would seem that there are some spectacular rake-offs as a result of fraud and corruption, especially that which involves the Ministry of Defence. Some of the large defence contractors, or defence monopolies, have taken the taxpayer for a ride. Investigations appear not to be bearing fruit and, in effect, the taxpayer is not recovering his money. What is the PAC doing in this area?

Mr. Sheldon: I was dealing with fraud and corruption as a proportion of the work that we undertake. I shall be dealing with specific instances that arise in two of the reports among the five which have been singled out. My hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Norfolk, North are right to attribute to these matters the importance that they deserve.

The elimination of fraud and corruption must be our major task. After that, we shall have time to consider value for money, economy, efficiency and effectiveness, all of which are written into the National Audit Act 1983. Economy is simply a matter of ensuring that we are not paying any more for what we are getting than we need to pay. That is a straightforward undertaking with which the accountants can usefully deal. Efficiency is a little harder because sometimes it is worth paying a little more to have something a little better. It is a trade-off between extra efficiency and how much more might have to be paid for that. Effectiveness is more difficult. We must ask, "What do the Government intend?" We do not question policy, which is the major difference between our Committee and other departmental Select Committees. We take the policy for granted, even though many of us may disagree with certain aspects of it. We ask what the Government are doing to make the policy more effective. When we know that, we can compare results with expectations.

All that actually lies at the heart of the auditing function. Every time that a civil servant comes before the Committee, we want to know about the programme that he sets out before us—when it was initiated, how he quantified what he wanted to achieve, when it would be achieved, how much money it would cost and his arrangements to monitor month by month, or year by year, how effectively the programme operated. It is the comparison between expectation and achievement quantified. That is important. There have been some disastrous experiences of the failure to do that. The civil servants did not know what they wanted to achieve, they did not know when they had achieved it, they did not know the cost and they did not know whether the programme had ended. We must avoid those horrors if there is to be proper public accountability. We must know, with some precision, what is expected, how much it will cost, when it will be achieved and that proper monitoring arrangements have been installed. In fairness to Government Departments, they are now aware of that and it is relatively rare for those expectations not to be built into the programmes that we examine.

I must mention the Treasury Officer of Accounts, Mr. John Beastall, and his Northern Ireland counterpart, Peter Small, who work closely with us and are valuable contributors to our discussions. The accounting officers take our evidence sessions seriously and spend a great deal of time preparing for them. I am conscious of the amount of time that we take from those senior civil servants, who have many other activities to undertake. I know that when they are informed that we will take evidence, they spend a great deal of time—several days or even more—preparing for their appearance before us. The easiest thing in the world would be to browbeat those civil servants, as do some of the Congressional committees. However, that is not the way that we take evidence. Part of our major task is to ensure that we improve the administration of the way in which money is spent. We understand the problems of the accounting officers and I and my colleagues try to take them into account in our questioning.

I am not sure about the number of reports that will be published this Session and whether we will beat the previous record of 52 reports in the 1985-86 Session. Of course, it is not the number of reports that is so important. Indeed, we used to combine all reports into one big report. It was unwieldy and few people were interested in it. The way that we do things now—one report per subject—makes them more digestible. People then know what they are doing and can go about it rather more quickly than if they had to wait for an annual report.

Mr. John Garrett (Norwich, South): My right hon. Friend knows that I greatly admire the functioning of the PAC under his chairmanship. In many ways, it has carried out the improvements and the changes that many of us have wanted for a long time. Today we are considering 38 reports, of which five have been selected for particular debate. The Committee often produces 50 reports in a year. Does my right hon. Friend agree that some of them are rather superficial? Would it not be far better to concentrate on, say, half the number in much more detail?

Mr. Sheldon: I fully understand my hon. Friend's point, as it is one that arises from time to time. Part of our job is to ensure that Departments expect supervision of their work. If there were only a limited number of reports, we would not get round many of the Departments. That is the way that the Canadian House of Commons operates. Some of its Members visited our Parliament two years ago and said that they were unhappy with the system and that their relationship with their Comptroller and Auditor General was little short of disastrous. Their relationship with the other Members of their House did not appear to be that good either. They came here to find out how we handled matters. There could be no greater tribute to our work than the fact that they returned two years later to examine our work in greater detail because they had been so impressed with the way that we operated. Their Committee produces fewer reports, which the various Departments do not take seriously because it could be a few years before the Committee dealt with those Departments again.

One of our great strengths—and this applies especially to the large Ministries such as the MOD—is that Departments know that we will come to them again and again on matters such as procurement and that we take a continuing interest in what they are doing. For example, if they tell us that they have dealt with certain problems, they know full well that the next time that they come before us they will be confronted with that statement and be held to account for it.

I grant that the Committee might be working far too hard, and for the benefit of those who work with me I should dearly like to find some way to limit the load. I fully understand both sides of the argument and we shall continue to keep these matters in mind.

It is likely that there will be a larger number of reports this year than in the record year of 1985-86. The National Audit Office is, rightly, planning a gradual increase in the number of value-for-money studies, and we welcome that. We want it to become active in many areas. It is probable that a number of those reports will not have the great depth that the Committee rightly requires. We have it in mind to ask certain questions and, if we receive fairly satisfactory answers, we will leave it at that and not necessarily produce a report on each occasion. The alternative would be to set up a sub-committee, but we are very much against that because we believe that all of us must have responsibility for the expenditure of public money and the examination of the way in which it is spent. We have always been against any division of responsibility within the Committee.

I must say a few words about the way that we review past actions. One of the features of the past year has been the large number of representations from inside and outside the House asking for examinations of all sorts of matters. Indeed, some have asked us to consider future matters, and I have to remind them that we essentially consider the past, monitoring whether money has been spent effectively, economically and efficiently. We are trying to learn lessons and to offer lessons to Departments in the expenditure of moneys. Of course some lessons are valuable, because they highlight some points that are worth examining. We discuss with the Comptroller and Auditor General how they might fit into his rolling programme. That is also an important development.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): On matters in which the Public Accounts Committee has taken an interest, will the right hon. Gentleman, on behalf of the Public Accounts Committee, accept my warmest congratulations on its excellent reports on Ministry of Defence schools of music? They were thorough, effective and crucial in the representations that were made to Her Majesty's Government on the survival of the royal military school at Kneller hall. The Public Accounts Committee's reports were extremely important and had a bearing on the result that was obtained. The Royal Military School of Music at Kneller hall was saved, as a result of which it continues to produce the finest military bands in the world, which are the envy of every other nation.

Mr. Sheldon: The hon. Gentleman has given the House part of the lesson that I was about to give. I might as well introduce it now. The interest of many hon. Members and of those outside alerts the Committee to certain matters that are worthy of further consideration. The hon. Gentleman's case is precisely within that definition. Because of his efforts, we realise—[AN HON. MEMBER: There were others as well.] Yes, there were others as well.

Because of the efforts of the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel), we realised the full extent of the problems involved, and carried out a more detailed investigation than we might otherwise have undertaken. We found that the Ministry of Defence proposals and the way in which it carried out its examination were woefully inadequate. We were able to satisfy ourselves that alternative methods were better. The fact that it pleased the constituents of the hon. Member for Twickenham is a bonus for him, and it is a pleasure for us that we were able to deal with the matter effectively and sensibly.

As the activities of several Government Departments are hived off agencies will come into being. It becomes important to consider how they will be dealt with and who will appear in front of us. We must have before us the person who makes the final decision. We do not want to be fobbed off with seconds or, God forbid, thirds. We want in front of us the people who are to make crucial decisions. With agencies, it is a more complicated matter, because an agency might be a minor body in which the permanent secretary might make the major decision, or an agency's chief executive might make a final decision on a major spending matter. We content ourselves by saying that we must have the main person responsible. We have sent a note to the Treasury detailing our interest and concern and putting forward our recommendations.

I now refer to the Government's response to our various proposals and recommendations. We shall soon begin to quantify matters. The quantification of proposals and acceptances is not an exact science. For the record, I point out that the National Audit Office, which I asked to produce figures for me, said that, in 1987-88, out of 161 specific recommendations or findings, 153 were agreed by the various Government Departments involved. I suppose that that is a success rate of 95 per cent. But let us not make too much of it, because it depends more on the importance of the recommendations than on the numbers. However, it is a sign—no more than that—of the way in which our reports are treated and accepted, and we value that. An essential part of our task is to make sure that we not only get value for money and proper accountability but try to improve administration in the way that I mentioned.

I shall deal with one or two reports apart from the five that are set out on the Order Paper. I begin with the report on the monitoring and control of charities in England and Wales. We would not have had that kind of report, say, five years ago. The Committee considered that it was important because there is a clear Government responsibility dealing essentially with value for money. Nobody is questioning whether any certification work has gone adrift—for example, fraud or corruption within the Charity Commission.

Charities are big business. There are more than 150,000 of all shapes and sizes. They spend over £10 billion a year —frankly, when I first saw that figure, I thought that there had been a mistake—and hold assets of more than £2·5 billion. They enjoy tax concessions and get support from public funds worth an extra £2·5 billion a year. Obviously, by their nature, they have a special place in the minds of the general public. It is crucial that charities be seen to be not only above fraud but perfect in their operation, or as near to perfect as we can get them. The Public Accounts Committee was disturbed that charities were not properly controlled and efficiently managed and that there were major gaps in the Charity Commission's control and monitoring systems. We found that the register of charities was seriously out of date, unreliable and ineffective, and that there was no computerisation of records. All that they had were brown folders and they were not undertaking their responsibilities. Paragraph 9 of our report states:

"All registered charities are required, under the Act or by the Commission, to submit annual accounts to the Commission. But the NAO found that this requirement was being widely ignored, with little attempt at enforcement by the Commission. And less than a third of the accounts received had been professionally audited."

Paragraph 14 states that we found that an NAO

"test examination indicated that the Commission examined only 4 per cent. of the limited number of accounts received from charities".

Two thirds of charities' accounts were not submitted in the past five years. We found that administrative charges varied from 0·5 per cent. to 20 per cent. in top charities. Apart from the top 21 charities, some charities were charging 95 per cent. for administration. That is clearly fraud, unless something has gone wrong. One of the advantages of our report is that it stimulated many other people to investigate further. We discovered charities that really were rackets. People were going from door to door, saying that they were from a registered charity. It is the easiest thing in the world to become a registered charity. All that one must say is that one's objects are charitable, not whether what one is doing is charitable. That is an absurdity. There is no need to submit any accounts, because nothing happens. One can go from door to door, pick up money, and put it in one's pocket. That is shameful. There is now a new broom in the Charity Commission, and we wish him the very best.

Something could have been done. I can understand problems with staffing, a lack of money for computerisation, and a vast amount of work to do. Because charities could not do everything, it did not mean that they should do nothing. That was one of the saddest aspects that occurred to the Committee. There could have been a sample examination, for example, and there could have been an undertaking to publicise the charities that had not published their accounts. The Commission could have threatened to do that. There were many possibilities that fell between doing nothing and doing everything. That would have satisfied at least part of the criticism. The Committee was gravely concerned at the risk of fraud, abuse and maladministration. We considered that such organisations needed to be much more positive and purposeful.

Since we produced that report steps have been taken to tackle some of the problems, and we are happy to have prompted some action. Like many other bodies, when the Charity Commission knew that we were examining this area, it took steps to discover the true position and produced its own report. That happens frequently with the work of the Public Accounts Committee. One must not compare the position that we discover with the position as it should be, but with the position that might have existed had we not announced our intention to examine. The very announcement of that intention often prompts changes. My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Garrett) will be aware of that. I am delighted when bodies say to us, "Things are not as bad as they used to be", and I make no criticism of them, but I am aware that much of the progress is a direct result of the understanding that the Committee will take its examination further.

We are pleased that action is being taken, and pleased with the Treasury minute, which endorses the Committee's anxieties and fully accepts the need for revised priorities and firm action in the areas identified. The change in senior management in the Charity Commission and the fresh impetus in its work appear to be leading to continuing improvement. We look forward to those aims being vigorously pursued.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Is this the first occasion on which the Public Accounts Committee has investigated the Charity Commission?

Mr. Sheldon: I know of no previous investigation. The Home Office, which had responsibility for the Charity Commission, never regarded it as having the importance that charities should have. The great thing about our country is the way in which the charitable impulse is readily catered for. We need only a disaster or information about something terrible happening for a great deal of money to come forth, even from very limited pockets. That is a great tribute to the response of the British people, but we must ensure that the money goes to the right people to carry out the right task.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman is right when he says that with such large sums—about £10,000 million a year—the potential for abuse, and indeed for a major scandal, is great, but does he agree that, although the Committee was right to criticise the Charity Commission, the fact is that the law under which it operates is wholly unsatisfactory? For example, there is no requirement for a charity to produce audited accounts, so there is no external check on its finances, and the Charity Commission itself is under-resourced. Might it not be a suitable candidate to become an executive agency?

Mr. Sheldon: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that there is a fundamental need for a change in the law. The Government accept that, but the problem now is one of time. I agree that audited accounts must be produced, or an alternative found for smaller charities, but whatever happens the legislation will take some time, and in the interim I am anxious that people's confidence in the value and work of charities should not be diminished. The Committee was conscious of the need to retain respect for charities, most of which are perfectly well run. I did not want there to be a gap between what was wrong in the past and what will be as near right as one can get it in the future. We have handled the matter reasonably well, and it is for the Government to produce their proposals. We hope that they will not be too long delayed.

The Committee's 20th report related to fraudulent expenses claimed in the Ministry of Defence, mainly fraudulent travelling, and subsistence claims made by its ordnance searchers staff. The amounts of money were difficult to determine. We identified more than £203,000, but the true sum may have been millions of pounds. The important matter was not that the money was obtained fraudulently by people who regularly went home every evening but still claimed subsistence in hotels and other accommodation, but that the claims were countersigned by military personnel.

It goes without saying that the Public Accounts Committee is always greatly concerned about evidence of fraud by public servants who handle public money. This was a serious and shocking case, and there was evidence of long-established local malpractices and management connivance. But, following police inquiries, the Director of Public Prosecutions advised that criminal prosecutions could not be sustained. Although the Ministry of Defence considered disciplinary action, none was taken and nothing has been recovered. The Public Accounts Committee found that astonishing. It regarded as extremely disturbing the scale of the fraud, the blatant control failures and the weak disciplinary approach and delays of the Ministry of Defence. What disturbed us most was that military personnel who were responsible for civilian employees were conniving in the operation. We were sad that the vigorous action that was vital was not taken, and the public standards which rest on the truthfulness and integrity of supervisors were found to be sadly lacking.

In the Treasury minute, the Ministry of Defence assured the Committee that serious fraud cases should normally be followed by prosecution or disciplinary action, and that the effort needed was not sufficient reason for not pursuing such action. It is easy to say that it would cost more to get the money back than the amount of money at stake, but that can never be the argument when one is dealing with public money. With private money, we may decide individually that it is not worth throwing good money after bad. But that argument cannot easily be sustained in the public sector. Taxpayers' money should be more rigorously controlled than our private money, about which we may decide as we think fit.

We are pleased that the Treasury minute accepts that such cases require prompt, vigorous action and that it has taken decisions to improve internal control. That emphasises what we considered to be the deplorable handling of the cases that we examined. I hope that the Financial Secretary will be able to say whether there has been any success in recovering money and what has been done to give all Departments guidance on disciplinary action in serious fraud cases.

The 26th report deals with community care developments. We noted the Government policy that elderly, mentally handicapped and mentally ill people should, as far as possible, be cared for in their own homes or in the local community. Most of the 8 million elderly, mentally handicapped or mentally ill people are cared for in their own homes, but 220,000 people live in residential homes and 155,000 in National Health Service accommodation. The implementation of a policy of transferring from hospital into the care of local services run by the NHS and the local authorities demands a certain relationship between the two bodies, but we found that relationship to be inadequate.

We examined the success of the transition from hospital into community care and placing people in their own environment. We found a complex administrative framework involving local authorities, NHS hospitals and family practitioner services, and the danger that patients could be transferred to the community without appropriate services being in place. In one case, people were being discharged from hospital, sent to their homes, sent back to hospital in an ambulance and then sent back home. Joint planning and finance schemes were not as effective as they should be.

The funding mechanisms needed to be improved to provide practical ways of moving people to the community without penalising those who wish or need to stay in hospitals. The Committee also examined the rapid growth of residential care for the elderly, many of whom have been financed by supplementary benefits, which amounted to £500 million in 1986. That support was provided irrespective of any assessment of the need of the claimant for that sort of care. Almost a quarter of those receiving benefits could have stayed in their own homes had community support services been available. What is more, it could have been done more cheaply and more in line with the claimants' requirements and wishes.

We were concerned that those in residential homes might not be receiving good value for the money paid to the proprietors, and that the registration and inspection of homes were inadequate. We were told that, if value for money was not being obtained, that would prompt the elderly to go elsewhere. I shall read one question put to the accounting officer—at 1786 in the 26th report—by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr Davis). He asked:

"Have you done any comparisons on the basis of value for money as between private residential homes"?

He then went on to ask:

"you say you do not bother about value for money because you leave it to the customer, the person who is receiving supplementary benefit . . . Do you think that is realistic?"

Mr. Partridge replied:

"Yes, it is realistic."

My hon. Friend asked further:

"Have you ever heard of the fears of elderly people of being victimised if they complain about what is going on in a private residential home"?

Therefore, the claim that one can receive value for money by asking elderly people to make their protests and to take their custom elsewhere, if they are not satisfied, was not only unrealistic, but it disturbed us that this was the view held by the official concerned. We have all been to these homes and know that these people would not take their custom elsewhere. Many of them dare not make a squeak of protest. The House may recall that this report led to a number of further examinations, one of which showed what happened in some of those homes. That added to the force of our argument that these homes need to be looked at more fully and more regularly. We said that the registration and inspection of homes was inadequate. I am pleased with the response that we have received. The Treasury minute promises further consideration of the need for care assessment, which is essential to achieve not only the right care for the elderly, but, of course, value for money for the taxpayer.

The Treasury minute promised an increase in the minimum number of inspections from one to two a year, and that the question of the reasonableness of charges would be researched further. That would seem essential to ensure proper value for money.

Our report on this was issued before Sir Roy Griffiths' report, "Community care: Agenda for Action", was published. The Griffiths report recognised the need for fundamental changes in the funding and administration of community care. The recommendations of that report are still under consideration by the Government. However, whatever changes are made, they need to ensure that individuals receive adequate and appropriate forms of care that also provide good value for money, which was a point made by the Public Accounts Committee.

The 31st report, "Naval Warship and Weapons Procurement", followed up earlier Public Accounts Committee reports on the Ministry of Defence's management of torpedo programme and design and procurement of warships and management of Trident programmes. Those are substantial expenditure programmes. It is bona fide because we must have a Ministry of Defence examination of at least one of its reports in our regular annual reviews, because of the amount of money involved as well as the lessons that need to be learned.

The torpedo expenditure programe is more than £5 billion and the programme for Trident is more than £9 billion. There is a long history of poor value for money in defence procurement. We now know that up to half of defence expenditure on procurement was not anticipated at the time that these defence contracts were considered.

It is important to look first at the question of torpedoes, because the Public Accounts Committee has lived with them for more than 20 years. If one were to start from scratch and consider whether it was worth spending £5 billion on a torpedo programme, or whether it would be better to get them off the shelf from America or somewhere else, few of us would have any doubt. We have had extremely poor value for money. Paying £5 billion for a weapons system would be appropriate if it were a weapons system that would determine many conflicts at sea or elsewhere, but torpedoes do not come into that category. They are not so crucial as to require that amount of money when they can be obtained elsewhere so much more cheaply.

Perhaps I may start with the way in which the Ministry of Defence has been operating, because we acknowledge the Department's efforts in response to earlier Public Accounts Committee criticisms. We know that the MOD is pursuing possibilities for introducing competition for the first time in main torpedo production contracts in the light of Marconi's previous monopoly position. We were encouraged by the way that Mr. Peter Levene is studying those contracts and trying to introduce competition wherever possible. Clearly the proof of the pudding will be in the eating, and we shall not be eating very much for a few years yet, but the process, the examination and the instructions that he has given have been satisfactory. The Committee would like to see, especialy in those large elements of expenditure on weapons procurement where one cannot get competition—for example, for a submarine—competition in the subcontracts that are placed, which is important. Further to that, Peter Levene has assured us that he is encouraging those firms that have not previously considered themselves as defence contractors to enter the field. The difficulty of entering the field is obvious to anyone in industry, but given the right encouragement this can be done, and that will introduce competition in a way that would not be possible otherwise.

We are pleased, too, with the way in which Mr. Peter Levene is trying to eliminate gold plating. That is the system whereby one waits for the very latest update and then tries to incorporate that into one's weapons system, so that one has the very last word. The importance of Mr. Levene's work is that he sets a date so that one will not get something which is right up to the minute, but something that will work in the time scale required. It is no use having a weapon that is never ready because it is always being updated. Almost equally important is the fact that, once one starts adding to and altering specifications, control of costs is lost. That is a lesson that we have had again and again. We find that the way in which Mr. Levene is tackling this is satisfactory, and we hope that it will lead to results in the next few years.

We felt that it was important for the Ministry of Defence to have a strategy for reconciling the conflict between the objectives of securing competition and preserving a viable warship building industry, and for it to give warship builders sufficient information for them to plan efficiently.

We welcomed evidence that financial control and project management of the main programme for Trident appeared to be operating reasonably, and that the programme costs had been reduced overall in real terms. We noted the constraints on competition in Trident work, particularly submarine production, but we were concerned at the lack of control on the size and cost of the atomic weapons establishment programme, which is not charged to the main Trident programme, although it is obviously vital to its successful completion. The atomic weapons establishment programme increased from nine projects, valued at about £134 million, in 1980 to 32 projects in 1986 with an estimated cost of £1 billion plus on a worst cost basis. Cost increases and delays illustrate the dangers of departing from accepted control procedures, which I mentioned earlier.

The MOD should have ensured from the beginning that arrangements at the atomic weapons establishment were as good as those for the main programme and that adequate co-ordination existed between the two programmes. The Committee was worried that the resulting reliance on the use of existing aging facilities at the Atomic Weapons Establishment and, taking account there of staff shortages, identified warhead production as a major risk to the Trident programme.

On all that we have received Treasury minute 501. On torpedoes and warships, it generally welcomed and accepted our comments. On Trident, it said that competition was sought where feasible and competitive subcontracts would be secured for submarines; that the works programme had been brought under effective control; that old atomic weapons establishment services can be used until new ones are ready, and that staffing will be kept under constant review. Obviously, a programme as big as that will be kept under constant review by the PAC. We would be failing in our duty if we did not go at least that far.

Let me deal now with the fifth of the reports that have been singled out for special mention—the review of operations of the Land Registry. The main point is that the Land Registry's business lies at the heart of land and property transactions. Therefore, the speed and efficiency of its operations are important to almost everybody. It is not so much its work as the impact that that has on other people's transactions and operations that is important. It really needs to be efficient, like the Companies Registry and other such bodies, not so much in its own right but because of its effect upon the rest of business and other communities.

On the face of it, the registry is a profitable organisation, spending £90 million a year and collecting fees of £140 million. That is a nice business to have. What did it do? Under Treasury rules, it was prevented from using that income to meet a major upsurge in demand. As a result, there was a large backlog of 400,000 unprocessed cases and long delays. It had 8,000 staff but its productivity had fallen well below 1982-83 levels. It is hard to think of any other area of clerical activity where efficiency would be reduced as much as that. There were continuing staff shortages and the registry was trying to regain lost ground from 1982-83 and computerisation had been delayed. Productivity was less than it was six years ago. I know that it had some problems then, but this was, after all, a number of years later. Despite that poor service, customers had been significantly overcharged in recent years and the fees needed to be reduced. Fairer and more flexible fee-fixing arrangements were required.

Such a monopoly, which has its effect on the community, is a serious matter and we recommended improvements in those and other areas. The Committee emphasised the importance of strengthening the registry's planning and management to speed up its response to increasing demand. We recommended a review of its management structure, organisation and location. There is no reason why it should be where it is. It could be in any part of the country. Speaking personally, not as Chairman of the Committee, may I say that it is sad that we have far too often accepted that congestion in the south-east means that people must be paid a bit more. That makes the area more attractive, more people come and they need to be paid a bit more again. It is a vicious circle that the Government and others should be able to break.

The Treasury minute was published only a few days ago. It accepted in virtually all respects the concerns expressed by the Committee and the recommendations made. Funding has been changed from 1 April 1988 to allow the registry greater freedom to use its full resources to meet changing work loads. Staff numbers are being increased and training improved. Output is being improved to cut the backlog as soon as possible. Higher standards of productivity, service and cost-effectiveness are being built into forward plans and computerisation is now moving forward. Fee arrangements are being closely watched and the need for fresh legislation is being pursued. There is a firm commitment to strengthening planning and management to meet increasing responsibilities and the registry is now being considered for agency status under the Next Steps initiative. We hope that that will lead to improved work by the registry. We shall wait to see and, like all the examinations that we undertake, we shall keep it under review.

I should briefly mention a couple of other aspects. In reply to the hon. Member for Norfolk, North, I mentioned the internal audit in the NHS. Also important is internal audit in Government Departments. The need for internal audit is becoming greater. It is not just certification that is important; it should be undertaken for value for money. It should be undertaken—not every firm does it—to ensure that a Department is as effective and efficient as it should be. One way of doing that is not to wait for the National Audit Office to produce a report every now and again, but for the firm to undertake the work itself. If Departments do that, when the National Audit Office comes, a useful relationship can develop between the Department concerned, the National Audit Office and the PAC. It should be able to ensure that adequate quality and quantity of resources will be provided and proper aims met.

Then we dealt with the Export Credits Guarantee Department. That has a number of uncertain debts and obligations because it has not carried out what we felt was the proper way of applying the Bank of England guidelines to the money that was lent overseas. Now there is an indeterminate amount of debt of doubtful quality. The sums of money can be substantial and we found that it had failed to meet one particularly important requirement.

A report that has only just been published, which is not strictly the subject of today's debate, relates to the royal ordnance factories. That will be covered in a subsequent debate. I would only briefly point out that the need for Government Departments to value their properties properly and effectively is of great importance. We need to ensure that whenever public money is accounted for it is done properly and that we have proper valuations. We may be going further into that in other areas, but the royal ordnance factories report stands on its own. Because there has been confusion on this, I would just point out that the royal ordnance factories were the subject of a report that was produced before the recent outcry and our further examination was a consequence of that.

Those are the matters that we have discussed and deliberated upon at great length. I am happy to say that we had a good working relationship within the Committee and with people outside. It is one of the great pleasures that we have such a happy relationship. It means that the effectiveness of our work can be that much more precise, accurate and valuable, and long may it remain so.

5.18 pm

Sir Michael Shaw (Scarborough): I am glad to follow the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), who properly covered the wide area dictated by the motion. The Public Accounts Committee has done a lot of work and made a number of reports. The right hon. Gentleman has dealt with those which are of particular significance. One must take cognisance of the fact that the debated covers a year's work. Some of the reports are more than a year old and some of the Treasury responses are already nine months old.

We used to be very upset that our reports were not debated more quickly by the House, but I have since changed my view. One must accept the facts as they are and as they are developing within the Committee. As the right Member for Ashton-under-Lyne mentioned, in the old days the Chairman did virtually everything and ordinary Committee members had very little to do. I am glad to say that under the right hon. Gentleman's leadership that attitude has changed and all are brought fully into the discussions and the examination of witnesses. Indeed, it is hard to conceive of our working much more efficiently than we do. That is largely due to the right hon. Gentleman's leadership and I take this opportunity to thank him on behalf of the Committee for all that he has done.

Another change has been that the Committee no longer meets in secret. Now that we meet in public, the impact of our activities is far more immediate. That must be a good thing. The reports of the National Audit Office attract a certain amount of publicity and reaction, which sets the ball rolling. We then cross-examine witnesses and if we deem it necessary—we do not always do so—we prepare a report of our own which, in its turn, has an effect on the public and certainly on the Department concerned. The effectiveness of our work is thus far more clearly centred on the work that we do upstairs. It is significant that, as we discuss these reports, we already know the reactions not just of the Treasury but of the Departments concerned. A great deal has happened in relation to those reports before they are debated in the Chamber. This debate is therefore much more of a tour d'horizon, seeing how the system is working and picking up one or two special points in the year's work. Sometimes certain trends also appear which need picking out and emphasising.

Now that our meetings are nearly always open—not quite always, as some matters have to be discussed in private—there is the danger that members of the Committee may be tempted by the desire for publicity which, I am afraid, is never very far from the minds of Members of Parliament. I believe, however, that members of the Public Accounts Committee can take credit for the fact that we put that temptation aside and genuinely try to get on with the business of examination rather than headline-seeking or party politics. So far, I believe that we have been successful in that respect—here, again, our Chairman has given a very good lead—and long may that continue, because if ever we cease to abide by that precept the value of our Committee will largely disappear.

A major change this year has been the departure of Sir Gordon Downey. We wish him well in his future activities. He has played a notable part in developing the National Audit Office in its new form. I also join the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne in welcoming Mr. Bourn and hoping that relationships will be equally fruitful in the future.

Mr. Tim Smith: Does my hon. Friend agree that publicity for the Committee's work and reports is a great help? If we can expose some of the maladministration and inefficiencies of Government, that must be a good thing. And will it not be even better when the television cameras come to the Public Accounts Committee and the public can see for themselves the complacency of the accounting officers and the "Yes Minister" answers that we sometimes receive?

Sir Michael Shaw: I entirely agree. That is why I welcome the fact that our meetings are open these days. If they receive the publicity that they so often merit, that is certainly good, but if members of the Committee began attending meetings bent on seeking publicity for themselves or sensational headlines that would be a very bad thing. Frankly, after a number of years in this place, I am thankful that certain Members were never appointed to the Public Accounts Committee.

I should like to deal with certain specific reports, beginning with the seventh report. That report deals with the BBC external services, in which I believe strongly. They do an extremely good job. One has only to travel abroad to realise their importance. I draw attention particularly to paragraphs 29 and 31. Paragraph 29 states:

"we cannot emphasise too strongly that the BBC External Services should, in common with other second-tier bodies funded by grant-in-aid, be directly accountable to Parliament through the audit of the C & AG".

I stress that point because the BBC is not examinable by the National Audit Office due to the terms of its charter and the way in which it draws its money from licence fees rather than from the Government. The external services, however, draw their money from the Government and it is right that they should be examined by the CAG and the NAO. To examine the external services accounts, we must have all the information and not just part of it. It was noticeable that in the past the BBC had refused access for the Exchequer and Audit Department, as it then was, but happily, according to the Treasury minute, there has now been agreement.

I emphasise this as a general principle as well as a specific one. Whether one is considering the BBC external services as a separate department within the BBC or a particular business function run by a local authority, if there is not access to all the information it is all too tempting to feed into a department being paid for by someone else overheads which should not exist in that department. It was therefore absolutely right that the CAG should insist on looking at all the facts and figures. Almost every year we have an argument with the Treasury and others about how much money is to be spent on the BBC external services. I wish to ensure that every penny that possibly can be used goes towards putting the message across to people abroad in the way that has been done in the past. There should never be any danger of any of that money being used to pay for overheads which, strictly speaking, should not be suffered by that department.

The 10th report deals with internal audit in central Government. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne has already dealt with this and we have examined it in considerable detail over the years. I am glad to say that over the years we have noticed—whether as a result of our nagging or for other reasons—a great improvement in the internal audit service. In the past, it was regarded as just a temporary function of civil servants as they moved through the department and up to higher things, and I thought that that was a most unsatisfactory way to proceed. They were birds of passage, passing their time as quickly and as best they could, and then moving on to other things, and they had no expertise in internal audit, despite the importance of their having that expertise.

Things are now much better. The whole subject of internal auditing is taken much more seriously. The internal audit should be a vital management tool in the hands of the finance officer. I hope that this fact has been realised. It is significant that now, according to evidence given to us, the ideal period for somebody to work in the internal audit department is five years, and in that five years it is expected that full training will be given. I expressed doubts about whether all the high-fliers regarded this as seriously as they should, and suggested that they might try to avoid it as not being their cup of tea. I was assured that it was taken seriously and the finance officer, Sir Peter Middleton, whom I was questioning, said that he would use his power to the utmost to make sure that my doubts were unfounded. On page seven, at paragraph 2185, he said:

"You will see the statistics for people being promoted who have done internal audit improving quite noticeably if you give it another five years. There are two reasons for this: one is that we have been promoting a lot of people within internal audit as we have been improving the grading and secondly, they have not been out long enough to have been promoted in many cases."

That is in interesting contrast to the earlier evidence that we took. I hope that it is true. If so, there will have to be a different atmosphere within the Civil Service because there will be more emphasis on those who enter it, and those who proceed, expecting to be makers of policy. There will be fewer of them, and more people learning the skills of management because in many cases Departments are there to manage rather than to make policies. I know that the function of Departments is neither one thing completely nor the other completely, but more of a mix, and it may be that, as a result of what is happening, we shall get the right mix in the end.

The 11th report deals with the internal audit of the National Health Service. We did not spend too long on taking evidence, but it is an important report, and I have thought about it a great deal since we took our evidence. I asked questions when we took that evidence. The internal auditors at district level are appointed at district level and they work entirely within the district level. We have regions and districts and I know that there are arguments about whether that is the right set-up and whether the regions should exist. I am not arguing about that, because it is a matter of policy, but if we have regions and regional auditors, it is worth looking at whether the regional internal audit system should be aligned all the way down the line with the district audit system. That should not stop the district auditors having close contact at district level with the chairman and director, but there should be a much more direct contact with the regional internal auditor. That would be of benefit to everyone, and would ensure that everything is done as it should be. That is just a thought and a reflection arising from our questioning and study of the NHS internal audit.

The 26th report deals with the community care developments. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne dealt with that in some detail, and rightly so, because it is one of our most important reports. I shall not go over the details again, save to say that many people are involved in community care and their number is growing rapidly. That means that we have to get our treatment of them right, and that the money that we spend on their care must be spent to the best advantage. It is not for us in the Public Accounts Committee to look at the policy, but it is our duty to see that the money is spent in the best way.

As a result of talking to various people, I have become worried about whether the resources and the planning are adequate to the growing needs of community care. In particular, I am worried that the responsibility for community care lies with no one authority. It is a joint responsibility, and I hope that the Government will look as carefully as they can at the way in which joint responsibilities are carried out. All too often, people tend to say, "Well, it is the other chap's duty to look after this or that." I hope that the final responsibility is clearly defined in every case.

During their life, those in care may move from Government responsibility to local authority responsibility, and back to Government responsibility. I hope that those lines, and the responsibility, are clear. I also hope that when people are moved back into their homes or outside institutions full plans are made for their safe arrival in their new homes and that there are adequate safeguards to ensure that they are looked after. I am by no means convinced that in certain cases I have seen that is always so.

I am convinced that the work that we do is essential to the smooth running of Government. There is a job to be done and it is important that those of us who decide to join the Public Accounts Committee do not decide to do so just for a month or two, or even a year or two. If we join the Committee we must be prepared not only to put in the time to study reports, but to put in a number of years' service. The value of seeing the same pattern repeating itself is inestimable because of the influence that we can bring to bear on the Departments whose staff we interview. This is an important matter. We have seen it all before, and probably long before any of the witnesses started in that Department. That puts us at a great advantage—an advantage for the Government and for the country as a whole.

5.39 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): When the hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) said that we had seen it all before, I was reminded of the fact that he is the most senior member of our Committee, with many years of responsibility for examining these matters. I listened intently to his contribution; if he saw me discussing something with my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) that was because we were talking about his reference to arrangements for audit at district, as opposed to regional, health authority level. Perhaps the hon. Member for Scarborough would care to raise the interlocking arrangement he mentioned in future proceedings on the matter.

Tonight I want to discuss other reports that are not on the Order Paper but which we are in a position to mention. I do not expect authoritative answers from the Minister today, but perhaps he will write to me about some of these issues in the future. I particularly want to discuss something that I have frequently spoken about over the years, drawing on a little new material, as is my wont each time that I discuss it.

I am concerned about defence contractors and procurement irregularities and fraud. In the appendix to our 35th report, we set out several cases of fraud against the Ministry of Defence which were allegedly perpetrated by defence contractors. Having considered all those cases together, I shall give the House my overview of them. The first case, which concerned the Aish company, resulted in £421,000 being refunded to the MOD; yet no prosecution was brought, for reasons of insufficient evidence.

The third case, which involved Thorn-EMI, resulted in £69,000 being refunded to the MOD, and again no prosecution was brought, as a result of a decision of the Director of Public Prosecutions that there was insufficient evidence. Case number 4 involved Rolls-Royce, and case number 5, involving Marconi, is now the subject of investigation by the DPP's fraud investigation group. In the sixth case, the name of the company is not identified, but as in the seventh, eighth, ninth, 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th and 14th cases, it was concluded that there was insufficient evidence of fraud.

The DPP refused to bring action in all those cases. Cases 16 to 24 also resulted in no action being brought by the DPP—but he instituted proceedings in two cases, which, interestingly, involved only companies that had gone into liquidation. Another case was brought against an official who had accepted a couple of electric kettles and a toaster. The prosecution was brought for minimal offences.

An examination of the prosecution policy of the DPP shows that in cases of major defence fraud no prosecutions ever seem to be brought. In case number 16,

"the MoD police investigation in 1986 revealed a prima facie case against the firm and/or its directors on fraud based charges involving about £40,000. However, the Crown Prosecutor decided that the evidence was not sufficient to justify a criminal prosecution."

I brought another case that made me angry to the Public Accounts Committee some years ago—that of Dowty Rotol. In that case, almost £500,000 was handed back to the MOD. There was clear evidence of fraud; I interviewed the chap who was involved in it through having been asked by his company to participate in it. Today he is unemployed. He was one of my five whistle blowers. He cannot find a job and has never been compensated. I want to know why no prosecution was brought in that case.

My preliminary view about defence contractors and fraud is that the DPP has decided that when it might be said that the reputation of a company could be damaged in overseas markets the DPP will not bring proceedings for fraud in a British court of law whenever possible. The list of cases I have mentioned shows that all the companies operating in export markets which were involved in fraud were not the subject of legal action by the DPP.

I quote from the case of Dowty Rotol:

"It was referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions who ruled, nine months later"— following a great number of parliamentary questions from me—

"that it was not in the public interest to institute criminal proceedings."

What precious words

"not in the public interest".

In these cases, they mean that, when a defence contractor has markets overseas and its reputation may be damaged, no prosecution for fraud will be brought against it, even if there is prima facie evidence of major fraud having been committed.

Let us compare this with what happens in the United States of America. We suggested in our report that the Ministry of Defence should consider examining the hotline system in America—a system that enables people to ring in with information about Government Departments—especially the Department of Defence—to alert the American equivalent of our National Audit Office to fraud in the places in which they work. I quote from a General Accounting Office report that I picked up in Washington about three weeks ago. Referring to the hotline, it says:

"In its nine years of existence the GAO toll-free fraud hotline has received over 94,000 calls, of which 13,992 have warranted further review. Seventy per cent. of the latter were received from anonymous sources. Some of these were from Federal employees. Altogether calls from Federal employees totalled 26·2 per cent. and the majority of cases were reported to have taken place in California, with Washington DC coming in second place"— that is, in the administrative head state of the United States.

[Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours]

It is worth considering what all this fraud reporting has meant. Here I am using another document produced by the GAO in America, a report entitled "Defence Procurement Fraud: Justice's Overall Management can be Enhanced". The Americans have set up a system called the FACT system. It provides an overview of all fraud inquiries and investigations and legal proceedings against defence contractors. The problem with the system is that it does not collect all the information. The report questions its ability to attract all the information that is available about prosecutions of American defence contractors:

"For the period October 1 1983 through to May 31 1987 the FACT system showed that Justice received 680 defence procurement and DOD-related fraud referrals involving 1,184 subjects for bribery of Government officials, conflicts of interest, anti-trust violations and procurement fraud. Of the 680 referrals 599 were sent to the US Attorney offices for action, 75 to the criminal division, six to another Justice headquarters litigation division. As of September 1987 211 referrals have been accepted, 183 referrals declined and 286 referrals were pending action. As of January 1988 the FACT system showed that Justice components obtained indictments on 180 subjects, of which 113 were convicted, 5 were acquitted and 62 are pending final court action."

I read this into the record to point out that they mean business in America. They bring actions in the courts; they do not sit down and work out whether a particular defence contractor's reputation might be damaged in foreign markets. If the law has been breached and a way can be found of prosecuting, the Americans prosecute—they do not dither like the DPP in this country.

I shall now deal with the question of whistle blowers who ring in on the hot line. Some are identified and they are in a particularly difficult position. We have had a number of whistle blowers in this country. Burgess Cooper from Dowty Rotol has been unemployed since blowing the whistle and may never find employment again. Other whistle blowers have been Don Pitman of Thorn-EMI and Jim Smith of Aish and Company. We now have Mr. Thrower in Preston, the man who gave information to me and to members of the Ministry of Defence police about allegations of fraud in Marconi.

It is interesting to examine the pressures that are exerted on people who have decided to be whistle blowers unless the state steps in to give them some form of protection. Don Soeken, an American psychologist, has done research on whistle blowers. He examined 233 whistle blowers in the United States of America and found that 90 per cent. of them had lost their jobs or been demoted, 27 per cent. faced law suits, 26 per cent. faced psychiatric and medical referral, 25 per cent. admitted to alcohol abuse, 17 per cent. lost their homes, 15 per cent. were divorced during the aftermath, 10 per cent. attempted suicide and 8 per cent. went bankrupt. The pressure on whistle blowers is extensive.

In the United States of America, an organisation called the Government Accountability Project has been set up to help whistle blowers. We do not have such an organisation here, although we need one. Whistle blowers are crucial to the Ministry of Defence in establishing what is going on in defence contractor companies.

That brings me back to the report of defence procurement irregularities. If the Committee is to do its job properly, we need to be assured that we have the resources and procedures to ensure that information about defence contractors which are involved in fraudulent activities is made available to the people who can either prosecute or bring rapid action. Unfortunately, I have no confidence in the current arrangements. I have confidence in the new arrangements which Mr. Levene has introduced on the general question of defence procurement and in the substantial training that is carried on in his department.

However, if the Director of Public Prosecutions repeatedly fails to bring action against fraudulent defence contractors, the morale of those who are responsible for investigating those matters in the Ministry of Defence police and in Mr. Levene's own department will drop and those people will lose confidence. They rely on the Director of Public Prosecutions to bring legal actions, but he has failed in his public duty by bringing so few actions. I hope that every pressure will be brought to bear on him to review that position.

I want to deal now with the 33rd report and particularly with the evidence that we took from Her Majesty's Customs and Excise about VAT collection and fraud. The hon. Member for Scarborough referred to publicity. When I raised the matter, considerable publicity surrounded my allegation—and many of my colleagues may not have believed what I was saying. It subsequently emerged that the allegation was true.

The appendix to the report states:

"Offences are normally investigated for criminal proceedings when one or more of the following conditions apply: the evasion of at least £75,000".

I had uncovered the fact that the policy in operation was that, if someone was involved in a VAT fraud for a sum of less than £75,000, the chances were that he would not be prosecuted and a deal would be done behind closed doors whereby the money would be repaid. I understand that that system is called compounding. It is defined in annex A:

"Compounding is one of a range of sanctions available to the Commissioners of Customs and Excise. It is a process whereby as an alternative to taking legal proceedings for an offence under the Customs and Excise Acts, they may offer the alleged offender the option of being prosecuted or settling out of court."

The people concerned are invariably respected in their local communities. They will want to do a deal with the Revenue or with Customs and Excise because they do not want their names to appear in the newspapers in connection with a prosecution. However, they are the very people we should be prosecuting. I know that such prosecutions will cost a lot of money, but it will be a rapidly reducing sum, because the day that Customs and Excise announces that it intends to start prosecuting people for much smaller amounts of VAT fraud, many of the people involved in such activities will quickly pull their socks up because they will be frightened by the prospect of being mentioned in the local newspapers in communities in which they may be church wardens or chairmen of Rotary clubs.

The Government should look carefully at the principle of compounding and be a little more liberal in their attitude to prosecution. The Government's talk about the resources not being available is not the issue. We should frighten small VAT fraudsters into cleaning up their act by making it clear that we intend to prosecute. If the Government do so, they will quickly find that there is a rapid reduction in the number of people and small firms involved in VAT fraud.

It is invariably small firms that are involved. Large firms find it hard to cheat in that area because employees often want to break ranks. Such frauds often take place in small companies in which the chap who does the books is the proprietor or has some special relationship with the proprietor. We should be far more rigorous in our prosecution policy.

I turn now to our 22nd report. Our introductory paragraph states that that report has been the biggest spender. Our report expressed concern about the arrangements for hiring such consultants. We were not convinced that competitive tendering had been the order of the day in all cases. However, we stated:

"concerns the arrangements for the employment of works consultants by government departments and health authorities where the PSA"

"We welcome the very recent reduction in the PSA's competitive tendering threshold to projects valued at more than £1 million. We acknowledge that it may not be cost-effective for PSA to abolish thresholds completely."

The whole question of consultants has come up in a number of reports in the past 12 months. For example, allegations were made, in which I played a part, about irregularity in the award of contracts for docklands development.

Development corporations are another area that we should consider. The PAC may well end up doing a full-scale inquiry at some time. All I am doing now is alerting those people who might be considering such matters to the fact that the Committee will inevitably have to consider development corporations. I make particular reference to the Milton Keynes development corporation. We all know what has happened in Milton Keynes. A development corporation was set up—I believe by a Labour Government—and a lot of public money was spent. Although I do not agree, I understand that the Government wanted to switch emphasis from development by a public sector organisation to development by the private sector. Although I argue against that, I accept it as the Government's ideological position.

When development corporations are wound up—the Milton Keynes development corporation will be phased out by 1992—a special responsibility is placed on the people who are responsible for that winding down to ensure that work is given out properly and fairly. One must ensure that, once work is awarded to the private sector, competition prevails and everyone has equal access to the cake. I am not convinced that that is the case in Milton Keynes. I am told that there, legal services have been given to a local firm of solicitors; that a landscaping contract has been awarded to a firm called Country Landscaping Design; that engineering contracts have been given to a company named Pell Frishman; that accountancy services are being provided by Touche Ross; that a national firm of estate agents is undertaking the strategic planning services; and that architectural services have been awarded to a firm called Planning Design and Development Limited.

Are the people who awarded those contracts absolutely sure that if, at some stage, the PAC examines the way in which they were awarded, and the way in which that work was tendered for, if it was, it will be satisfied that they are above suspicion? If not, let the people concerned get their house in order now. I give them advance warning that, in the event that an opportunity arises, I shall question them on those matters in detail.

Consideration should also be given to what will happen in 1992. I return to the subject of the Royal Ordnance factory land scandal, for want of a better description. I am told that, when Milton Keynes development corporation is wound up in 1992, a large acreage of land will be available for development. Some people put a value of £500 million on that land today. Let them know in Milton Keynes that that value is placed on it by someone here in Westminster. If that sum is not realised when the land is sold, uprated to 1992 values, then I shall be asking questions. We shall want to know that, in every way, that land, if its disposal is necessary, has gone to the private sector at its full market value.

I turn to the 18th report of the Committee, "Regulation of Heavy Lorries". When taking evidence, I sensed—as I believe did the majority of Committee members—that the Department of Transport was dragging its heels over the arrangements for weighbridges at British ports. Yet we know that in Kent there has been for a number of years a major argument that overloaded foreign lorries often enter the United Kingdom but manage to reach their destinations without being stopped by the police. Throughout the report, the PAC comments that the Department of Transport hid behind a lack of resources as an excuse for failing to deal with the matter. Several months ago, Kent county council produced a report showing that many of its own weighbridges were not even in working order. Such is the authorities' lack of priority in ensuring that equipment is maintained in perfect condition at all times to guarantee the maximum possible number of weight checks of vehicles entering Britain from the continent.

That report also drew attention to the fact that fitting improved suspension systems to all heavy lorries could save about £100 million annually in road maintenance. The Committee commented:

"We believe that DTp should have taken earlier and stronger action to encourage the use of vehicles which take advantage of available suspension systems and axle configurations which cause least wear."

The Department of Transport has not responded or legislated for and required that the authorities put in place the equipment required and that transport companies ensure the fitting of equipment designed to minimise road damage. If they had done so years ago, millions of pounds worth of damage that has already occurred, the repair of which will inevitably have to be funded by the taxpayer, would have been prevented—and even less money would have to be spent in future.

This is a crying priority. The Department of Transport must act. I hope that it takes the report very seriously. During our proceedings over the past 12 months, it was one of the reports most debated behind the scenes and away from the Committee Room. It was felt that the Department's position was indefensible. If I might say so, it was a disgrace.

6.4 pm

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): It is always interesting to participate in one of these debates, because the work of the Committee of Public Accounts is, from the point of view of most hon. Members and of the public, among the most important instruments in Parliament for ensuring that the taxpayer receives value for money.

There are 38 reports lying on the Table, constituting much material that could be examined in considerable detail by right hon. and hon. Members. I am only sad that there are not more of them present, as I see from looking around that most of the right hon. and hon. Members present are themselves members of the Committee. Although I have not in the past been greatly in favour of introducing television into the House of Commons, one factor that persuades me to change my mind is the hope that its introduction will cause some of our absent colleagues to take a greater interest in the Committee's reports and that we shall have an opportunity to examine them by the light of that wonderful medium and bring the oxygen of publicity to bear in sharpening up the accountability of Government Departments.

The Committee is an interesting one because it is by convention non-political. That it does not reach political decisions is an important aspect of our work and it contributes substantially to the agreement we reach over the reports that have been presented. I echo the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) in paying tribute to the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) for his unfailing courtesy and encouragement to all members of the Committee, which makes our work pleasurable as well as extremely interesting.

I shall focus on the 32nd report, "Review of the Operations of the Land Registry". Of all the reports we have considered and to which the Order Paper refers, this sticks in my mind because we were able to discover what was undoubtedly a most unsatisfactory situation. When the PAC examined the chief land registrar and his colleagues on 1 February, it was concerned to discover that there was a backlog of nearly 1 million items representing four months' work. Every right hon. and hon. Member knows only too well the importance of the registry's work to the average citizen. The evidence we received pointing to that considerable backlog was, I repeat, a matter for great concern.

The Committee was told that the cause of the backlog was a massive surge of work occurring between 1986 and 1987. However, having taken fully into account that surge, which is a matter of fact, we were disturbed to discover that, instead of productivity improving, it was deteriorating, and that in 1985-86 it was 6 per cent. less than in 1982-83. The levels of productivity ranged from 3·07 per cent. in Peterborough to 2·01 in Harrow—which, incidentaly, happens to be the office serving my constituents living in Hillingdon. The chief land registrar told the Committee that the reason for those variations was varying conditions. One was the difficulty of recruiting suitable people of the right calibre in the south-east of England. Another factor, at the Harrow office in particular, was that the conveyancing work was especially complex because that office is responsible for work involving properties in central London.

I am the first to admit that there is a considerable problem in recruiting suitable staff of the right calibre in a town such as Harrow. That points to the need for the Government to look urgently at the location of the Land Registry's offices around the country. If ever there was a case for moving them to areas where recruitment is easier and properties less expensive, this is it. But it is gratifying to note the improvement in productivity in 1985-86 and in 1986-87.

One measure taken by the Land Registry to deal with the backlog has been the transfer of responsibility for two of the London boroughs, Hillingdon and Hounslow, to Swansea—a somewhat novel development, but one that perhaps can point the way to the future and bring improvement in its train.

We are told that at Harrow—that hard-pressed office—a measure of computerisation is to be introduced, and we hope that that will result in a reduction in the backlog there, but I found it astonishing to sit in the Public Accounts Committee in 1988 and to learnt that "a measure of computerisation was to be introduced."

Why was it not done years ago? Why is an organisation like the Land Registry still operating manually, with a quill pen system, when all around it are businesses operating very satisfactorily with modern computerised methods? I believe that the average property owner has the right to expect an office of this kind to use modern business methods, and to have a high standard of management with the resources at its disposal to do such a complex and responsible job.

At the time when we examined our witnesses, the registry had accumulated a surplus of some £84 million. That was in March 1986; by April 1987 the surplus had risen to £110 million. As the registry is a statutory monopoly, I think it particularly important—and I know that my colleagues agree, for they say so in the report—that the public are not overcharged for its services. But as our Chairman has pointed out in the report and subsequently, that has clearly happened. It is not good enough that a Government Department, responsible for the organisation, should have allowed it.

Fees have not been properly aligned with costs. We were told when we took evidence that lower fees were in prospect when a new fee order was approved. We understand from the Treasury minute that we have received that that order has now been made, and I hope that those who use the registry's work will pay less for its services in the future.

As I have said, the Land Registry's work is of great importance to everyone. The substantial backlog, poor productivity, large accumulated surplus and higher than necessary fees were features of the session in which we took evidence from the chief land registrar and his colleagues, and I am glad to see that the position has been recognised in the Treasury minute. Alternative resource control measures have been introduced with effect from 1 April this year, and substantially more staff have been recruited to improve output and to reduce backlog.

We are told that a radical review is under way to establish what further activities can be moved from the south-east, and that plans for further transfer of responsibility for registration in certain London boroughs and south-eastern counties are being developed. I hope that my right hon. Friend will be able to tell us the extent of that development, what progress is being made and how much longer it will be before we hear about it. It is also encouraging to learn that the fees order has been approved and that that will reduce the ad valorem fees for most applications.

Paragraph 27 of the report bears quotation. It says:

"In giving evidence to us, the Land Registry seemed to assume that the current level of activity, with its pressures on the Registry's performance and efficiency, is only temporary and that the level of transactions will return to 'normal' in two years or so. We do not think it is safe to assume this will happen, since changes in the pattern and volume of business could persist. If the present level of activity continues, we believe that planning and management will need to be strengthened to enable the Registry to respond much more quickly to increasing demands . . . We accordingly recommend that the position be reviewed and further consideration given, as necessary, to the management structure, organisation and location of the Land Registry."

I emphasise my belief that an urgent review of the registry's management is needed, and if ever there was a case for a change in the way in which it is run, it is made in the report. I hope that my right hon. Friend will be able to say whether the Government have yet reached a preliminary conclusion on whether the registry is to become an agency. It was established by Act of Parliament in 1862 and I believe that the time has now come to change the way in which it operates—to turn it into an agency and to ensure that it has the resources, the management, the modern business methods and the proper supervision that will provide a first-class service for all our constituents, so that they no longer have to put up with the delays and backlogs of recent years.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): There have been several references to the unanimity that usually, indeed always, surrounds PAC reports; but it would be a careless observer who concluded that the unanimity of our reports reflected identical views. The speech by the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) illustrates my point: although we may agree about the report on the Land Registry, we certainly differ on the conclusions that we would draw as party politicians. I shall not, however, pursue the hon. Gentleman's point, because I wish to touch on several other reports.

As one of the newer members of the Committee, I associate myself with all that has been said about our Chairman. I had been a member of the Committee some years ago, in 1979, and I thought that I knew my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) quite well before I returned to the Committee a year ago. I can only say that the respect in which I held him before my return has been greatly enhanced—if that were possible—in the last 12 months. I have become a great admirer of the deft way in which he chairs our proceedings. The highest compliment that I can pay my right hon. Friend is to say that, although I thought his predecessor Lord Barnett very good, he is even better.

Just before my return to the Committee, there was a change in the appointment of the Comptroller and Auditor General. The House debated the appointment. I had some reservations about Mr. John Bourn's appointment as Comptroller and Auditor General, although I was not one of those who voted against the recommendation of my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne. All members of the Committee have, during the past year, come to respect the work of Mr. John Bourn. I have also formed a very high opinion of the work done by his deputy, Mr. David Myland, and all the other National Audit Office staff. We sometimes forget that it is the more junior members of the NAO staff who really do the work. I am sure that Mr. John Bourn agrees with that view, and I must tell the House that I have formed a very high opinion of the NAO's reports and the work on which they are based.

The shortage of hon. Members present to debate these matters has been commented on. I think that it would be much better if, instead of one all-inclusive debate involving 38 reports, there were several perhaps shorter debates on individual reports. Almost all of these reports are important. That is not surprising because there is a sifting process. It must be noted that not every investigation by the NAO results in a report, so reports are done only on matters which it considers significant. There is a second sifting because the PAC does not take evidence on every NAO report. It follows, therefore, that if we have taken evidence on an NAO report and produced a report of our own, there must be some significance to the subject.

It is obviously impossible to deal with more than a handful of the 38 reports before us. It might be better if we had debates by Department, and included PAC reports in debates on the reports of departmental Select Committees. That is a personal suggestion—I am not speaking for my colleagues.

During the past year, I have several times wished that we had more time for our work by being able sometimes to return to a subject because there have been times when accounting officers have not been able to satisfy us. Some have not come properly prepared and have been unable to answer all our questions. They are always willing to send information later, but that is quite different from being able to ask questions about that information at the time. Because the Committee meets twice a week, and because we have such a busy timetable, it is not practicable to recall witnesses very often. We have done it only once or twice during the past year. I appreciate that asking an accounting officer to return is a sort of sanction and that we do not want to do it too often, but I sometimes wish that it was possible to take evidence on a memorandum which we have received afterwards.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne said that fraud is rare. I agree. We have come across few examples of proven fraud during the past 12 months. My right hon. Friend mentioned the expenses paid by the Ministry of Defence to some of its staff. There are questions to be asked about decisions that were taken then and the Ministry apparently doing so little, or nothing, about it. There were no prosecutions and no disciplinary action.

My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) referred to VAT frauds, which were the subject of our discussion with the chairman of Customs and Excise, and my hon. Friend rightly said that several decisions have been taken to compound those frauds. I disagree slightly with his assertion that the frauds were committed by small firms rather than large ones. My understanding of the evidence was that the frauds subject to investigation by the investigation division—which is supposed to be the elite—of Customs and Excise were frequently committed by large firms. Indeed, we were told that some were committed by large-scale criminal organisations. The decision to compound the fraud is therefore all the more surprising.

We should contrast the treatment of such significant fraud with that of small business men who make mistakes. I drew the Committee's attention to a self-employed newsagent in my constituency who had recently set up in business. Although the newsagency belonged to a large business, he was on self-employed terms. The man made a mistake with VAT, and it was agreed to be a mistake by Customs and Excise. Nevertheless, he had to pay the VAT and a penalty. There was no doubt about the man's integrity, and when I compare the treatment he received with that given to large companies which commit VAT frauds involving many thousands of pounds, I am surprised by what appears to be public policy.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: My information, which I repeated, that small companies are more likely to be involved came from the person who told me about the £65,000 threshold. He went to some length to tell me that, in his experience, large companies are not involved.

Mr. Davis: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Perhaps we are quibbling about the definition of large and small. I am talking about self-employed business men and he is talking about small companies. I was comparing one-man business with large companies. I suspect that my hon. Friend is talking about something in between.

Several examples of what I can only describe as fiddling came before the PAC. It would not be too strong to describe some of them as cheating. I refer to our evidence about "Financial Support for the Fishing Industry in Great Britain". The Government operated a Common Market scheme for the decommissioning of some fishing vessels. I am not questioning the motivation of the policy. It was decided that there was excess capacity, and that decommissioning grants should be paid. But the Marr company received £591,000 in grant as a result of returning a ship to fishing solely to qualify for grant. The vessel was doing seismic work at the time of the application. It returned to fishing for exactly 100 days and then went back to survey work. Members of the PAC will remember that, to qualify for grant, a ship had to fish for 100 days during a certain time. It was clear to me and, I think, other members of the Committee that that company had fiddled. It returned a ship to fishing for just as long as it was necessary to qualify for £591,000 worth of grant.

There are several small examples of cheating, and the Committee is right to draw attention to them. My hon. Friend the Member for Workington mentioned Ministry of Defence contractors, who often work on an even bigger scale. My hon. Friend's pursuit of those people, who are fiddling the taxpayer, should be admired.

The hon. Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) intervened in the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne to call into question our enthusiasm for value-for-money studies done by the NAO, and the hon. Gentleman referred specifically to the National Health Service. He has done that before. His concern for value for money in the Health Service takes on the appearance of a vendetta against it. Our experience in the PAC during the past 12 months suggests that there is a great deal of inefficiency and much money-wasting in many other Departments, not least the Ministry of Defence.

If I were to part company from my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne, it would be in respect of his regard for some of the accounting officers who come before us. It would be easier to single out those accounting officers who have impressed the Committee rather than those who have not impressed us.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Chairman could not say that.

Mr. Davis: My hon. Friend says, in effect, that the Chairman could not be so blunt.

Some of the civil servants who come before us appear to regard their role as being to defend the indefensible. Those who come before us and admit that mistakes have been made and that matters could have been better administered receive much kinder treatment and more sympathy from Committee members than those who pretend that everything is for the best in the best of all possible worlds.

My right hon. Friend referred to the fraud involving subsistence allowances and expenses at the Ministry of Defence. It is important to note that the permanent under-secretary at the Ministry of Defence told us that > "After going into it now with great thoroughness I think that the decision that was taken not to pursue disciplinary action against these men was on balance the right one."

I give that as one example of senior civil servants who are accounting officers and appear to take a much more relaxed view about inefficiency than Members of the House of Commons.

It is fair to say that there is far too much complacency among some senior civil servants. Hon. Members have referred to the National Audit Office report on community care developments and the report from the Public Accounts Committee. My right hon. Friend referred to the unrealistic attitude taken by the second permanent secretary at the Department of Health and Social Security, as it used to be. He appeared to think that the question of value for money, given the substantial amounts being paid through income support or, as it was formerly, supplementary benefit, to people who run private residential homes, should be decided by people resident in the homes. In practice, it is simply unrealistic to think that such elderly people can judge whether they are receiving value for money.

I asked the accounting officer what could be done to ensure value for money. He replied:

> "We would say that profiteering in private homes, if it exists, is something that we would look to the market to rectify. If they charge too much then one would expect . . . people to be able to go elsewhere."

That is not the real world. If accounting officers take that attitude, we must question whether we are ever going to obtain value for money.

Similarly when the accounting officer was asked whether it was more cost-effective for taxpayers and ratepayers to provide for people to live in private residential homes or, alternatively, to provide for them to live in local authority homes, he was unable to tell us whether any study or comparison had been undertaken in any part of the country. That was a most unsatisfactory reply.

I refer to those accounting officers only as examples, but the complacency sometimes exhibited in the evidence that we took can also be seen in other respects. The National Audit Office report on community care developments referred to the shortage of district nurses and occupational therapists. It stated that there would be a shortage by 1994 if current recruitment and training patterns remained unchanged. The Committee asked a few questions about that and concluded that it was concerned that the shortages in nursing and therapy professions would adversely affect the implementation of plans and the standards of care provided. In new sums then we may also have been complacent to some extent because we underestimated the facts, based on the information given to us. Only this week, I was told that, in east Birmingham, 700 people are waiting to be assessed by occupational therapists. People whose condition is classed as urgent have been waiting four months to be assessed. The social services department says that the reason that those people are waiting in the most dreadful circumstances can only be attributed to the lack of occupational therapists.

There is, therefore, not only a need for the Committee of Public Accounts to maintain the work that it undertakes, but to be a little more questioning, within the limits of time—the Chairman is always anxious that we should bear in mind time constraints—than we have been, even in the past 12 months.

6.35 pm

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): It is a matter of deep regret to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, as it is to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis), that our debate has been deprived of any representative of the Liberal party, but, although it is a matter of regret, it is not a surprise, either to the hon. Gentleman or to me.

This is the first occasion on which I have spoken in a debate on the reports of the Committee of Public Accounts since I became a member of the Committee. I was pleased to become a Committee member for three reasons. First, it has given me the opportunity to serve under the chairmanship of the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon). I join Opposition Members and my hon. Friends in paying tribute to his chairmanship. Anyone who wishes to be instructed in the art of chairmanship would do well to come to our Committee when it is in public session and take a few lessons from the right hon. Gentleman.

Secondly, I was pleased to become a member of the Committee because I have always believed that one of the areas of highest priority of the House is to scrutinise public expenditure. I have always believed, and still believe, that there is a greater duty on those who spend other people's money to take care of that money than there is on us to take care of our own money. This place is a trustee for the proper spending of other people's money.

Thirdly, I was pleased to become a member of the Committee because I believe that it carries out effectively its task of scrutinising properly the spending of public money. That is why our debate is important.

There is another truth. The need for scrutiny of public expenditure will not diminish as the years go by. Only this week, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us that the Government had in mind to spend £167 billion in the coming year. That is a greater sum in real terms than any Government have ever spent in this country, in war or in peace. Hence, although one might have believed that, as the proportion of public expenditure to total national wealth falls, there might be a diminished need for scrutiny of public expenditure, precisely the opposite is the case.

Further, whether our time in the House is long or short, I hope that there will always be those willing to serve on the Committee of Public Accounts, who will be vigilant in the defence of the proposition that other people's money requires continuing protection.

I wish to devote my remarks to only two reports. The first is the 16th report which deals with the Charity Commission. I agree with the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne that sometimes the complacency and even self-satisfaction of the accounting officers who come before the Committee is a matter of the deepest regret. I shall illustrate that general proposition by reminding the House of the evidence given to the Committee by the former Chief Charity Commissioner. First, I shall remind the House of the Committee's unanimous findings. Secondly, I shall contrast the findings with the words of the former Chief Charity Commissioner. The Committee found that "the Commission's register of charities is seriously out of date and unreliable and is ineffective . . . The Commission has adopted . . . a passive attitude to its registration responsibilities . . . We are disturbed at the . . . failure of the Commission to obtain annual accounts from charities . . . We feel that the Commission is too complacent . . . We regard it as unsatisfactory that the Commission has not devoted greater resources to monitoring and investigation work."

My hon. Friend the Minister for Trade is right to be in his place, and I am extremely glad that he should be there. It is not only he who has entered the Chamber, for sitting next to him is my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken). Mercifully, both my hon. Friends are vigilant when it comes to public expenditure. They might be worthy successors to myself on the Committee of Public Accounts one day. However, I do not wish to be diverted.

I move to another finding of the Committee, which reads:

"we are astonished that the Commission has no qualified accountants on its staff."

A devastating exchange took place between a member of the Committee and the Chief Charity Commissioner, and we are able to read the precise words which were used. The hon. Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) was in her place, as usual, during the cross-examination. First, let the House be in no doubt about the name of the former Chief Charity Commissioner. His name is Mr. Peach. He is a Commander of the Bath, no less. This is the exchange which took place:

"After five years as Chief Charity Commissioner do you think it would be unfair to describe this report as a massive indictment of the Charity Commission?"

Those were the words of the hon. Member for Eastbourne on 28 October 1987. The reply was as follows:

"It would be indeed unfair."

The hon. Member for Redcar, whom I almost describe as my hon. Friend, is being reminded of the very words that she heard on that day. I say to my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who is to reply to the debate, that anyone in his old regiment or mine who gave that reply when an indictment of that sort had been read out and found proved by jury would have been the subject of the most harsh disciplinary action.

It has always been a matter of consternation to me that ministerial responsibility for the Charity Commission should rest with the Home Office. Legion are the merits of the Home Office—there is no dispute about that—and my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South will be the first to pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. Nevertheless, it is difficult to understand what can be the logic in having ministerial responsibility for the Charity Commission falling with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and, unless I am mistaken, with my noble Friend Lord Ferrers. Am I right in thinking that Lord Ferrers is Minister of State, Home Office? I believe that I am. There is no need to have anything but praise for my noble Friend and my right hon. Friend, but I suggest to my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary that logic requires that responsibility for the administration of the Charity Commission should be transferred at the earliest possible date from the Home Office to the Treasury. That is where the responsibility belongs.

In the report which was published in May 1987, the Comptroller and Auditor General stated:

"Charities"—

it was the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne who reminded us of this—

"are big business."

Yes, they are. That was said in April 1987, and even the Home Office would agree that we are now in November 1988. In that interval, charities have become even bigger business. The tax relief from which charities benefit is not one which diminishes as the years pass, save, of course, when the rates of taxation are reduced. Substantial benefit is still given—in my view, rightly—to charities. My right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary has no need to consult my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. When he replies, I ask him merely to agree with the excellent suggestion that responsibility for the Charity Commission should be transferred with effect from 6 April next year to the Treasury.

A matter of deep concern was recognised in part of the Treasury's response. We must have confidence in the proper administration of charities or we shall have some awful scandal, as a result of which those who currently give generously to charity will be sceptical about continuing their donations. It is a matter of great urgency that we should do all that we can—we cannot do everything—to prevent improper conduct by charities, and we can do much more than we have been doing. What I am about to say is a criticism of the Home Office, not of my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, who stated in the Treasury response:

"The Commissioners share the Committee's concern that in certain important respects the Central Register of Charities is deficient."

The next sentence reads:

"They"—

that is the Charity Commissioners—

"have long recognised that an up-to-date computerised Central Register would provide a much-improved source of basic information about registered charities to the public."

This is all elementary stuff. Fairly modest businesses in Britain have computers. These are businesses that are not responsible for £10 billion for which the Charity Commission is responsible. If relatively modest businesses —I have no doubt that some of them are run by Labour Members in the new entrepreneurial spirit of the age, with others being run, no doubt less efficiently, by Liberal Members—can have computers, why cannot the Charity Commission? Why should the commission be such a hopelessly inefficient body? I welcome the undertaking that has been given by my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary that we shall have legislation before the end of this Parliament to deal with these matters. When we come to the Gracious Speech in three weeks' time, I hope that we shall find that there will be a measure to reform the law of charity that will give greater powers to the commission.

I know that my right hon. Friend will tell the House that he cannot anticipate the Gracious Speech. Well, if it is not in the Gracious Speech now, he has three weeks in which to include a commitment to reform the law on charity in the coming Session. If he were to do so, I assure him that there would be widespread support from both sides of the House—even from the Social and Liberal Democrats—for an urgent measure to update the law on charities and to give greater power to the Charity Commission.

We are fortunate to have in the Chamber my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces. We are happy about the arrival of Ministers of the Crown. My hon. Friend the Minister for Trade is one of the most distinguished military historians ever to serve in this place. It is, therefore, timely to deal with matters relating to the Ministry of Defence.

We have heard a really amazing story. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne rightly referred to the episode of the 90 civilians employed by the MOD, whose task in life was to journey all over the kingdom—even to Wales and Scotland. I think that only Northern Ireland was spared such a visit. They sometimes travelled by motor car, sometimes by train, sometimes apparently by both—occasionally on the same journey at the same time —and sometimes, no doubt, by air. They made those journeys over some considerable time. Hon. Members need not take my word for that—harken not to me but to the Comptroller and Auditor General. So that this may be preserved for all time, what that gentleman said can be found in his report, which is available in the Vote Office. He said:

"The losses statement"— that is, the losses in the MOD—

"on page 11 includes a sum of £203,416 relating to the falsification of travel and subsistence claims by certain MOD staff. In 1984 MOD Management Information highlighted the fact"— my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) will wish to pay particular attention to this—

"that the searchers unit was absorbing 10 per cent. of the Army's total civilian travel and subsistence expenditure."

So 10 per cent. of all the costs of travelling, for example, all the way to the Falkland Islands and the whole of the subsistence and travel costs of the Ministry of Defence —the Army, the Navy, the RAF, the Royal Marines, the Territorial Army Volunteer Reserve—was being absorbed by those 90 people, not in some banana republic in central America but in this United Kingdom. What on earth is happening?

What did the MOD do when that astonishing saga came to light? Hold on to your seat, Madam Deputy Speaker, this is what it did—nothing. It was to that absence of action that the Committee drew particular attention. The hon. Member for Redcar was at my side when that great saga unfolded before the Committee.

To say that I am looking forward to my right hon. Friend the Minister's reply—he used to serve in the MOD and is therefore especially well qualified to comment upon such doings—is an understatement. I must say a word of praise for my right hon. Friend. I have a deep affection for the Treasury—a Department in which, for 10 glorious weeks, I served. I very much welcome my right hon. Friend's prompt decisions. I even offer one word of praise for the MOD. However, the decision not to prosecute any of those involved was not taken by Ministers. That was disgraceful. A decision not to prosecute in such a serious case of fraud should always be taken by Ministers. They were not consulted, which was quite wrong.

I very much welcome the assertion in paragraph 55 of the Treasury response:

"The MOD accepts that in future Ministers should be consulted before disciplinary action is ruled out in any case of serious fraud."

I congratulate the Government on that decision. I welcome the reminder that the Treasury has sent to all Departments about the PAC's concern with fraud of any sort and its belief—which, I am pleased to say, is also the Government's—in the importance of maintaining effective controls to prevent fraud.

If we seek evidence for the belief that the PAC has an important influence on good government, we can find it in the reports that we are debating. It should be a matter of pride in the House that the Committee can be effective and vigilant, and it is a matter of pride to the Committee that it has the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne as its Chairman.

6.57 pm

Ms. Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): I echo the last words of the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), paying tribute to the Chair of the Committee. New members of the Committee find it a little forbidding to learn its regulations and my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) has been incredibly helpful. It is certainly forbidding to be faced with accounting officers or permanent secretaries who are doing their utmost—and in the most complacent way—to avoid answering the question. I have to admit that it gives me some degree of pleasure to ask them over and over again a question that, first, they do not want to answer and, secondly, they do not think they should be asked, anyway. That is one of the few pleasures of serving on the Committee.

My right hon. Friend referred to value for money. It has been made clear to new Members that we serve on the Committee not in any party-political sense but to evulate Government policy in terms of value for money. We have to evaluate whether Government policy works effectively, whether it is being implemented economically and efficiently. Those are the criterion for evaluating the policies before us.

My difficulty with many of the reports is that in considering value for money as defined in the reports it tends to mean the lowest common denominator of cheapness. It tends to be volume or quantity, because they are easy to measure. As the Committee Chairman pointed out, we tend to evaluate policy on the basis of economic effectiveness and cost benefit and value per head, rather than look at the much more difficult to measure, but essential, criterion of effectiveness. We must ask, "Is the policy effective in terms of the Government's objectives?"

I readily acknowledge that that is a difficult thing to measure, but some of the reports that came before us came to terms with that test and others did not. One report that has been referred to by many hon. Members which does not come to terms with measuring qualitatively the effectiveness of the Government's objectives is the report on community care policy. If we examine that report, we see that the policy objective we are evaluating is whether the Government—it is odd that the Government should have such an aim—have provided a better service, so that the patients' interests come first. We are told that that is the community care objective that we are evaluating. The problem that appears when we try to evaulate that policy objective is that it is not defined in a way that allows us to do it. For example, if, as the report clearly shows, we want to determine whether community care has been properly implemented, we must know what community care means.

Perhaps it seems a simple, naive question, but, in Committee, I asked the accounting officer whether I was correct

"in understanding when you defined community care that you talked about the quality of service and in that you were including such things as nightline services, counsellors for the caring, covering for counsellors"— that is, when they are off duty or 24-hour cover—

"would you include laundry services, would you include meals, would you include training, . . . would you include warden services?"

The answer that we got from the civil servant was:

"I do not want to go right through that list but I would not accept all the width of that list".

After several questions, we did not get from the accounting officer a clear definition of community care. Without a clear definition, we cannot evaluate whether the Government's policy is properly implemented. Our job is difficult, and as a result we cannot evaluate the effectiveness of the community care programme. We are told that community care is working for the 8 million people concerned—the mentally handicapped, the mentally ill and the elderly—but, if there is no agreement betwen the NAO, the Department and the PAC as to what the policy objective is, we shall have great difficulty in doing our job properly.

Another report that came before the Committee was much more constructive in defining the policy objectives that we were examining. I refer to the report on the efficiency of DHSS front desks. We were trying to work out whether they served their clientele well. The NAO decided to have a public opinion poll of clients to see what is happening and whether clients consider that the service is meeting their needs—that is, whether the objective is being met—and whether they consider that they are getting the service that they demand. Clients were asked "How long do you have to wait at the counter and how long do you have to wait for a letter?" The Committee got some frightening results in relation to the five to six hours that many people sit waiting in DHSS offices, but we were able to do our job properly because we had a clear measure of the effectiveness of Government policy.

When we look at the reports that were presented today and those that will be presented in years to come, unless we clearly define effectiveness, not just economically or in terms of a cost benefit analysis, quality will be a much more difficult thing to measure. Unless the PAC and the NSO come to terms with that, we shall not clearly evaluate the policy objectives of whatever Government are in power.

I wish to highlight one report, and that is the 28th report on matters relating to Northern Ireland. It focuses on the DHSS fraud investigation branch in Northern Ireland. It considers how efficiently the fraud investigation branch works in Northern Ireland. When we are considering the Government's objectives for benefit fraud investigation branches, it is useful to see what their purpose and functions should be. In non-party terms, the Government's policy objectives are to maximise the efficient use of taxpayers' money, to be sure that they correctly label people benefit scroungers, and to judge the public sector by the kind of results tht it produces. We shall see whether the Department works in that way.

[Ms. Marjorie Mowlam]

According to the PAC's 28th report, such policy objectives are clearly not being met, bearing in mind what is happening on the ground in the DHSS in Northern Ireland.

The first problem that we face—it greatly concerned the PAC—was the DHSS ratio, set out in 1984, between benefits saved and administrative costs. We discovered that, for every pound it spent, it got £6 back in benefit saved. A 6:1 ratio is good and, we assume, efficient for the fraud investigation branch. However, we find that the potential value of the fraud investigation branch in performing its service is severely hampered by staffing. The number of staff in that DHSS branch in Northern Ireland is 10 per cent. below what is expected, and that has been the case since 1986. When the Committee asked why the figure was as poor as that, we were told that the Department has to be cash-limited and that, therefore, it must prioritise. In the Committee, it was not clear whether the Department is spending money efficiently in terms of getting the same ratio in the fraud investigation branch. There was no evidence to suggest that it would get better returns than 1:6 if it had proper staffing.

There is another problem in the DHSS in Northern Ireland, and it is repeated in many other Departments. I refer to the difficulty in knowing how to measure a Department's efficiency. A good example is the fraud investigation branch. If we want to know whether it is functioning efficiently—that is, if benefit scroungers, as they are labelled, are being caught by the fraud investigation branch—the obvious measure would be the total amount of benefit saved. That seems to be quite clear. However, the DHSS in Northern Ireland records only the number of what it defines as effective cases—that is, cases in which it has discovered or prevented fraud. We have no base line or no clear measure, since it defines as its policy objectives what it succeeds in achieving. Hon. Members will accept that that is not a fair measure of whether that Department is functioning efficiently.

The Department also faces great difficulty in knowing the exact number of people whose benefit is saved. Even though there has been an increase in the number of cases being dealt with by the Department, many cases do not involve prosecution and do not go before the Director of Public Prosecutions. In fact, 58 per cent. of cases that the fraud investigation branch discovers never go to the DPP. Apparently, such cases are too weak to stand up in court.

There is clearly a strong case for an inspectorate randomly to examine cases not taken to court to ensure that they are prepared properly and that the fraud investigation branch figures for non-effective cases are accurate and not exaggerated in any way.

In the short time that I have served on the Public Accounts Committee, it has discovered some serious problems which I hope that I have illustrated with the cases that I have brought to the attention of the House. It is difficult to ascertain value for money solely in economic terms. The National Audit Office is considering developing measures so that we can begin to ascertain quality much more effectively.

7.10 pm

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): As a relatively new member of the Public Accounts Committee, I shall be brief. Serving on the Committee is refreshing, in that we have no party political bickering, which is unusual for the House, and all members of the Committee work as a team with one aim: to ensure that the taxpayer gets value for money. They do so even though some members may not agree with the policies that are being implemented.

There is an old story about the four ways of spending money. First, when one spends money on oneself, one is desperately worried about quality and cost. Secondly, if one spends money on someone else, one is worried about cost but not too worried about quality. Thirdly, if someone spends money on me, I am worried about quality but I could not care less about cost. Fourthly, if someone spends someone else's money on someone else, quality and cost go out of the window. The latter method of spending money reminds me of some of the accounting officers and some of the reports that appeared before the Committee.

Like everyone else, I pay tribute to the excellent Chairman of our Committee. I do so from the heart, not because I hope that he will call me earlier in some of our investigations. I also express my appreciation of the National Audit Office which so lovingly presents its reports to us.

One worrying aspect of the reports has been mentioned in Committee, and I have no reservations about mentioning it here. That is the requirement that the National Audit Office must agree a report with the Department under investigation before it can be published. That could be viewed in the same light as a criminal having to agree the charges on which he is arraigned before the trial can begin. The National Audit Office should be able to highlight—perhaps in a different colour or underlined—the areas of disagreement and should not be tied down by the processs of plea bargaining. That processs may weaken the report and the advice given to members on how to direct their questions.

The fact that the Land Registry and the Charity Commission have been the subject of many speeches shows the anxiety felt in the Committee about the appalling state of both bodies. On the 32nd report, almost all hon. Members will have had examples of the tardiness of the Land Registry. Its operations are a growth activity. We are told that, during the past three years, there has been a 66 per cent. increase in operations. That must have been expected by the Land Registry, but its representatives seemed to be surprised by the increase and thought that it was unfair. May I counter that with some simple arguments?

First, several years ago, about 1 million council houses were sold. The figure has increased considerably, and it cannot be a surprise that some of those people will now wish to move home. It has not come out of the blue. That, together with the Treasury forecast of great economic activity, means that the Land Registry will have much more work, and it should have been more alert to the demand.

The minutes of evidence show our dismay with the progress being made, with productivity struggling to creep back up—despite computerisation—to the 1982-83 level. The Committee was worried that the Land Registry was not effectively tackling the staggering backlog. We were told that the Plymouth office had managed to attain 2·48 units of work per person per day by January 1988. In an appendix to the report, we see that for 1993-94, when the great majority of titles will be on computer, the target is 3·05 units per person per day. I do not know whether the House regards that as satisfactory. It means that during the next six years that office will try to improve its efficiency by less than 4 per cent. a year. One wonders whether it will ever catch up with the staggering backlog.

We derive some comfort from the reaction of the Treasury. It states:

"The Registry has taken steps to set even more demanding targets as part of the improved resource control measures referred to above."

I hope that those targets are more demanding than the figures quoted by the accounting officers who appeared before us. If they are not, I have no confidence in the backlog being tackled effectively.

I refer to the Committee's 16th report, on the Charity Commission, with some diffidence. I was unable to attend the hearings as I was stricken in bed. I was doubly upset not to be present because I am the national treasurer of a well-known charity and I am glad to announce that its administration expenses are under 6 per cent. Any donations to that charity will be effectively and expeditiously applied. But it would be wrong of me to promote the Leukaemia Research Fund.

I shall not discuss the report in too much detail, because many right hon. and hon. Members have mentioned it. It highlights an almost staggering indifference among charities—with one exception—to the Charity Commission. One member of the Committee asked whether it was not deplorable that "only 23 per cent. of the sample of the NAO had submitted any accounts to the Commission within the previous five years and only 9 per cent. of those who had not submitted accounts had been sent any reminder by the Commission."

That is unbelievable; it makes the commission a laughing stock. Although I welcome the Government's response, of establishing a computerised register of charities, I find it incredible—as my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) said in relation to the delayed computerisation in the Land Registry—that in 1988 a file of more than 150,000 charities is not already computerised. I wonder, because of the billions of pounds involved in charities, whether that is a sufficient response to discharge the burden of trust that is put upon the Commission. I find it incredible that today we are told that they should think it should be computerised. It is almost being held up as a dramatic and tremendous advance. I must say that I find that especially shameful.

The last point which I want to emphasise in this report is that of the investigation and the quality of the investigators. There is something especially wrong when fraud and abuse are perpetrated on charities—funded as they are by the goodness and generosity of people. We should be seen to be vigilant in the protection of that trust. Again, I express surprise that the Charity Commission does not have one qualified accountant. I am delighted to read in the Treasury's report that an accountant has been appointed to identify those types of charity which most need scrutiny so that available resources can be deployed with greatest effect.

It is encouraging that there will now be 14 officers able to investigate the cases. I understand from the report that they will investigate some 1,000 cases a year. I work that out to mean that in a fairly normal working week each of those 14 investigating officers will investigate a case every three days. I am not qualified to comment on whether three days is the average time needed to investigate a charity account, but it is obvious that the Charity Commission is relying on whistle blowers to initiate an investigation. The process is reactive and not proactive.

I echo the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), who raised doubts about the suitability of the funding and of the structure to handle the monitoring of this vast area of public generosity. I must say that the Treasury minute is a sticking plaster and not the major operation that is needed to resolve the problem. I have no doubt that the activities of the commission will come before the House time and time again until matters are satisfactory.

I say with great deference and respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), whose skill, knowledge and wisdom are renowned in all corners of the House, if not the land—certainly in Eastbourne—that it will not matter a row of beans whether the commission is taken out of the Home Office and put into the Treasury until the restructuring has taken place, because it has at present all the ingredients of a major disaster. The Government ignore that danger at their peril.

Mr. Gow: And ours.

Mr. Page: Hon. Members can see that the opportunities for debate in the Public Accounts Committee are endless, and it is with restraint, and almost tact, that I do not stretch my few words even further to tackle some of the 30 other reports. I would like to believe that the sample put before the House tonight is indicative of the work that the Committee has done and the value that the Public Accounts Committee offers both Parliament and the country.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): The House will be grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) for his presentation of these reports. On behalf of the Opposition, I say that we wish to be associated with the kind comments made about my right hon. Friend and wish to express our thanks for the sustained hard work that both he and the Public Accounts Committee have put in during the past year.

The hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) referred to the Chairman's personal approach to the Committee and the way in which he involved all members and contributed to the good working atmosphere. The hon. Members for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby), for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) and for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) associated themselves with those kind and bipartisan remarks. As I said this time last year when we were debating PAC reports, the bipartisan way in which the Committee carries on its business is important to the authority that it lends to the reports when published and, of course, when they come to the House.

It is not possible to deal with all the Committee's reports tonight, but the Committee has highlighted matters that it wishes to draw to Parliament's attention. There are three themes to which I shall make special reference. The first is the frequency with which the Ministry of Defence features in Public Accounts Committee investigations and the second is the Government's privatisation programme. I shall also spend a little time considering the resources that are devoted to the prosecution of fraud across a range of Departments.

[Mr. Nicholas Brown]

Before dealing with those matters, I offer a word of encouragement to my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours). I know that there are Conservative Members, and perhaps one or two Opposition Members, who feel that my hon. Friend does not need too much encouragement, but I offer it to him anyway. I strongly welcome the remarks that he made about urban development corporations being an appropriate subject for investigation by the Committee. I am convinced that there is cause for concern in the way in which some of those bodies are operating, and the public good would benefit from a long hard look at those bodies by the Public Accounts Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Workington referred to the issuing of contracts which I believe is a serious matter. In local government and in most public authorities, the authority decides what it wishes to tender for, and the tender is issued to people who are interested in bidding. The body issuing the tender then chooses which bid is the most suitable. That practice has always pertained in public authorities to avoid corruption. But some urban development corporations are doing it the other way round—choose the developer first and then discuss with him what is to be developed. There are obvious causes for misgivings in adopting such a policy, and a long hard look by the Public Accounts Committee would be timely.

I pay compliments to the speeches of other hon. Members on the three themes that I have chosen to discuss. The Ministry of Defence features in five reports covering the school of music, service hospitals, fraudulent expense claims, naval warships and weapons procurement and procurement irregularities. I presumed that the report on procurement irregularities would be about the auxiliary oiler replenishment ships and Harland and Wolff, but on closer investigation I found that it was not, and that was disappointing.

The 31st report draws the attention of the House to the need for the Ministry of Defence to draw a balance between preserving competition in naval procurement and securing the lowest possible price. So far, the Ministry of Defence's response to the reasonable point made by the Public Accounts Committee has been unsatisfactory. Almost at the same moment as the Committee was issuing its 31st report, the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement came to the Dispatch Box to announce that the entire frigate programme for the year would be placed with one yard—and one yard only—thus denying orders to all the others. That decision is the exact reverse of the statement that the PAC has attributed to the Ministry of Defence.

The Ministry of Defence has not responded in a measured and open way to the Committee's request and that failure to respond, particularly about setting out its future procurement programme, is not only damaging to the warship building industry but may have disastrous long-term consequences for our national defence capability. The PAC was right to single out that report for debate and I hope that the points that it made go home.

The second report and theme with which I wish to deal is the Government's privatisation programme. Those matters are referred to in the Committee's 34th report. That expresses some doubt—a modest way of putting it—about whether the Department of Trade and Industry will be able fully to recover the £382 million of taxpayers' money that it sunk into Rolls-Royce before privatisation. The Committee makes a nice point about the value of sales incentives, which I hope that the Government will take on board. It says:

"departments should ensure that the taxpayer's interests are protected as effectively as future shareholders' interests."

That is important.

I should have thought that that point, regardless of political arguments about the rights and wrongs of privatisation, goes to the heart of such exercises. It is particularly important in the case of Rolls-Royce, because, as the Government have admitted, in that case there was no intention to secure a wider and deeper share ownership, which is the intention that has sat alongside some other parts of the Government's privatisation programme. Indeed, the Committee also has some points to make about wider share ownership, in particular about setting objectives before the exercise is embarked on rather than waiting until the exercise is halfway through and seeing where it is taking the Government.

Because the report is now some months old and was widely commented on when it came out, one would hope that the Government, and in particular the Treasury, had had a chance to consider the points made and, in the context of privatisation, to respond. But we know that next year we shall, among other things, be debating the 48th report which deals with the Ministry of Defence's sale of the royal ordnance factories. That report clearly says that the Treasury has learned little from previous PAC reports. It says:

"the Ministry of Defence did not themselves explore the possibility of redevelopment at Waltham Abbey and Enfield or obtain an alternative valuation of these sites based on the assumption that their redevelopment might be approved in the future. We note that BAe could make a substantial gain on their sale or development without benefits accruing to the taxpayer beyond the sale price paid by BAe."

That is the very point that was made in the context of Rolls-Royce some months before.

The Committee goes on to recommend, absolutely properly, that "in any similar sales in the future, any feasible planning permissions likely to increase property values should be obtained before offers are invited."

Let us face it; if we were dealing with our own property, not that of the state, each and every one of us would make sure that we knew the real value of what we were selling before we sold it. It is a pity that the Government have not done the same with public property.

My third point relates to the resources devoted to the prosecution of fraud, not just financial resources, but energy and commitment. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne referred to the difficulties that the Committee occasionally comes up against in that area.

Five reports seem to have some bearing on that matter—the 28th report on Northern Ireland, the 33rd report on Customs and Excise investigations of fraud and smuggling, the 16th report on charities and two reports relating to the Ministry of Defence, one on fraudulent expenses claims and one on procurement irregularities. A common theme which runs through each of those reports, even though they relate to different areas of public endeavour, is that all of them, to different degrees, say either that there are insufficient resources or that there is insufficient vigour in the pursuit of fraud.

My hon. Friend the Member for Workington referred to specific cases of fraud by defence contractors. I want to add to what he said, but to put it in a slightly different context, although I agree wholeheartedly with his comments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam), who has special responsibilities for Northern Ireland, rightly referred to the report on the work of the fraud investigation branch and made some pointed comments. The PAC says:

"We do not accept the argument put forward by DHSS for leaving staffing vacancies in FIB unfilled for almost two years".

The report adds:

"We are firmly of the opinion that such additional staff as are considered necessary for fraud investigation work should be appointed without delay."

Having made that point about resources for social security frauds in Northern Ireland, the Committee goes on to make an even more worrying point:

"We strongly recommend that special exercises should be mounted from time to time to ensure that social security offices and other benefit branches are not closing cases which should be submitted for prosecution."

The House should consider the circumstances that lie behind such statements and the nature of fraud investigation work in social security benefits in a community such as Northern Ireland which is riven with problems. The Chairman of the PAC rightly referred to the special difficulties that pertain in Northern Ireland.

When the PAC makes the case for extra resources, they should be allocated. I should have thought that the Government would willingly respond to that. I suspect that they may be less enthusiastic in responding to some of the other points that I intend to make about the pursuit of fraud. The Government have always been enthusiastic about pursuing poor communities and working-class fraud.

Let me move on to a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) about big companies being treated in one way and smaller organisations being treated in another. That relates directly to the 33rd report dealing with Customs and Excise issues. The report makes two points strongly. It says:

"We are concerned that staff shortfalls are a continuing feature, especially in London and the South East."

There are two conclusions to be drawn from that. The first is that the case is made out for resourcing, as it should be, and the second is that it could be argued, as the report does, that there is a need to relocate to somewhere such as Newcastle upon Tyne——

Ms. Mowlam: Or Redcar.

Mr. Brown: At least in the northern region—and to ensure that proper resources are allocated.

The report also expresses concern on the subject of scale and the fact that it is easier to pursue smaller matters than larger ones. I am sure that we do not want that situation to continue.

Many Members have referred to the 16th report, which deals with the Charity Commission and was also highlighted for debate. I strongly agree with the key conclusions of that report. I am especially concerned to note that the Public Accounts Committee, given the very moderate language that it uses when presenting its views, felt the need to state so boldly:

"We are gravely concerned at the risk of fraud, abuse and maladministration involved in the massive and increasing resources devoted to charities."

That is a very strong way to put it. As has been pointed out by Conservative Members, the report says:

"We regard it as unsatisfactory that the Commission has not devoted greater resources to monitoring and investigation work and has never established a system of positive inspection of selected charities";

and:

"Given the need for expert analysis of accounts and financial information, we are astonished that the Commission has no qualified accountants on its staff and apparently sees little need to recruit any."

We understand that there has been a response to that, but it is an extremely serious state of affairs and it is impossible for any of us who care about the role of charities in our national life to leave things in their current state. It is a question not just of the resources to pursue fraud but of willingness to pursue these matters and to carry out the proper monitoring function that many of us believed that the Charity Commission exercised. I am convinced that if this issue is not addressed at once the House will wish to return to it, perhaps through the Public Accounts Committee.

That brings me to the two reports concerning the Ministry of Defence. The report dealing with fraudulent expenses claims is as clear cut as one could ever expect to see. The disgusting thing is not just the fraud, which is disgusting enough, but the failure to follow it up properly when it was discovered and, as the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee pointed out, the involvement of Army officers. The affair does not reflect well on the services and the Committee was right to highlight the report for debate.

That leads me on—I was going to say "nicely", but that is probably the wrong word—to the 35th report, which also deals with fraud in the Ministry of Defence although in a slightly different way. The report stresses the need to keep the matter in proportion in terms of the Ministry's total budget—a nice point and properly made—but states:

"We note that all the prosecutions undertaken arose from relatively straightforward cases of employee misbehaviour rather than from complex corporate fraud; that several prosecutions were either not undertaken or were unsuccessful because of the insufficiency of the evidence; and that the strength of the MoD Serious Crime Squad is only 28."

That brings us back to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hodge Hill about the tendency of those responsible for prosecutions to go for the type of case that can at least be brought to a conclusion and not to embark on cases which might be more complex and difficult, most likely through lack of resources to see the case through to a satisfactory conclusion. Despite the comment about keeping things in proportion, the Public Accounts Committee has issued a clear warning to which the Government must respond.

Having set the issues in the various reports about the prosecution of fraud in their context, I wish to refer briefly to the way in which fraud is dealt with elsewhere. The establishment of the serious fraud office earlier this year was carried out in such a way that it can handle only about 60 of the most serious and complex cases at any one time. The criteria for selection are therefore bound to be fairly narrowly defined—they will be cases in which the facts are very complex or the sum at risk very substantial or in which there is great public interest or concern.

In my view, that is not satisfactory. The best way to prevent fraud must be to ensure that such massive resources are devoted to its detection and subsequent prosecution that the incentive to undertake the crime is dramatically diminished. While staffing levels in organisations such as the serious fraud office and the other bodies that I have mentioned still oblige them to choose priorities, preventing them from pursuing all the cases that they would wish, crimes of fraud will continue. It is not just a question of the serious fraud office—there is also justifiable concern about staffing levels in the fraud division of the Crown Prosecution Service.

In conclusion, I repeat on behalf of the Opposition our thanks to all hon. Members on both sides of the political divide who do such good work for the whole House in the Public Accounts Committee.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Norman Lamont): There was a slightly mean article in The Guardian today referring to last year's debate as an exercise in self-congratulation. Given that such debates are not attended by many non-members of the Public Accounts Committee, I am not sure who else could do the congratulation, but I am certainly prepared to join in, as I believe that the congratulations are extremely well deserved. The Public Accounts Committee does a most valuable job. It spends a great deal of time on subjects such as external trade measures for agricultural produce, prison service farms, repayment arrangements for works expenditure of United States forces and other matters which do not often hit the newspaper headlines but in which the Committee rightly takes an interest as they often raise considerable issues in terms of efficiency and finance.

I join the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) in his remarks about the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon). I particularly appreciated his opinion that the right hon. Gentleman had been an even better Chairman than his predecessor the noble Lord Barnett—I only hope that the remark will not spoil a long-standing and beautiful friendship.

Mr. Gow: For the avoidance of doubt, will my right hon. Friend reassure us that he does not read The Guardian from choice?

Mr. Lamont: I have to confess that I knew that the mean article had been written not because I read The Guardian but because I happened to have lunch with the man who wrote the article. When he drew my attention to it, I made it clear that I did not regard it as the most welcome of comments.

The Public Accounts Committee has come a long way since it was first appointed in 1861. Not very much has escaped its eagle eye since then. In its second report in 1872, the Committee expressed its agreement with the Comptroller and Auditor General in his criticism of the Army for exchanging a consignment of surplus bricks for blasting powder when the bricks should have been sold and the proceeds paid into the Exchequer. That episode is paralleled by some of the reports that we have been debating tonight.

I notice that the severity of the Committee could also be tempered with mercy. In its 1882 report, it concluded that the sum of £14.16s.2d paid in connection with the Dundrum lunatic asylum, Ireland, was not properly chargeable against the Vote, but since the officers responsible admitted the error, the Committee was disposed to agree that they should not be personally charged. We have had rather more severe judgments tonight and in some cases that is quite right.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne reminds me, if I needed reminding, that I am not just the person who has to reply to the debate annually, but a member of the Committee. I am aware of that, because I receive not only the working documents, but letters inquiring whether I am the source of leaks. I can reply to the right hon. Gentleman's latest letter by saying that I assure him that I was not the source of the leak on the report about which he was worried, and, although I know that motive is not necessarily good evidence in deciding who committed the crime, I cannot think of anybody who would have had less motive for leaking that report.

The right hon. Gentleman said that there are rather fewer reports being considered today than there were this time last year, because of the intervention of the election, among other things. None the less, we are considering a staggering 38 reports, and that poses quite a problem for me, even though the Committee has kindly starred five of them. I feel a little like the fielder in a cricket match who is told to go to a boundary and when he asks the captain which part of the boundary he should field on is told, "All of it.".

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne and my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), among others, have commented on the 16th report. I must correct my hon. Friend on one point. I was never a member of a regiment, which may account for my very short stay in the Ministry of Defence. Extremely serious issues were raised to do with the monitoring and control of charities, as a number of hon. Members have pointed out. Charities enjoy considerable tax privileges in law. They play a vital role in our society, in arts, social welfare, housing, education and, as the right hon. Member pointed out, huge sums of money are involved. Like him, I could hardly believe the figures when I looked at them. The total income of charities is some £12 billion and there are about 160,000 of them. Therefore, it is vital that the integrity of the charitable sector is secured and protected.

I share the concern that in certain respects the arrangements for preventing, protecting and dealing with the abuse of charities has been seriously defective, and is in need of reform. That is why my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced in January the acceptance of the recommendations made by Sir Philip Woodfield in his scrutiny report on the supervision of charities, and the Government committed themselves to legislation. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) said that the Treasury minute is merely a sticking plaster when what we need is surgery. Although I cannot agree that a Treasury minute is mere sticking plaster, I assure him that we shall be introducing comprehensive legislation which will deal with many of these problems and implement many of the recommendations in Sir Philip's report.

The report had recommendations directed to the realisations of the responsibility of trustees, reducing correspondingly the responsibility of the commissioners, but increasing the scale of their activities in respect of malpractice and detecting inefficiency. Sir Philip made recommendations for the clarification and strengthening of the commission's powers of investigation and intervention when there has been maladministration.

On the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) about audited accounts, Sir Philip recommended that all the accounts of charities other than the very smallest should be audited and that they should be available to the public. He also made recommendations enforcing their submission to the commission. He recommended the tightening of controls on fund-raising, particularly when there may be manipulation of expenses or excessive remuneration—a point made by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne.

The result of these recommendations will be that, as the Committee very much wants to see, greater resources will be devoted to monitoring and investigative work, the register will be computerised and accounts will be more frequently examined and action taken. Some of the recommendations require legislation. Our detailed proposals will be set out in a White Paper to be published early next year. Meanwhile, many of the recommendations not requiring legislation are being implemented, and these changes will mean that the commission is on course to become much more effective both in supervising and monitoring charities. This is already apparent in the increased scrutiny of accounts, from 4 per cent. at the time that the report was made to 20 per cent. by the end of the year.

We share the Committee's concern that the register is deficient. It recognised that an effective register is essential to the strategy of providing information relevant to monitoring and investigation. We need to develop a database of information about charities as a whole. For this reason, as the right hon. Gentleman acknowledged, consultants are conducting a study into the method of setting up a computerised charity data base.

I agree with the Committee that the risk of abuse of charitable status under the present supervisory system is unacceptable. I understand that the commissioners are taking urgent measures to improve the monitoring and supervising of the charities in advance of the legislation. The staffing allocated to monitoring is to be increased further. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West referred to a figure of 14 and this is to go to 39 by the end of this financial year. I share the concern that the poor level of submission of charity accounts prevents this exercise of monitoring. I also share the view that the accountability of trustees for the stewardship of funds for which they are responsible would be enhanced by the regular submission of accounts that have been professionally audited.

In short, the Government back the reforms, and agree with what the Committee has said. That is why, this week, we have invited Parliament to approve a winter supplementary to raise the money available to the commission to carry forward the proposals arising from the scrutiny study and to put them into effect.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne spoke about the relationship between the Public Accounts Committee and the agencies and he has written to the Government recently about this, setting out the Committee's views. The Government entirely agree with the Committee about the importance of proper arrangements for ensuring that these agencies are accountable to the PAC and the House, and we are considering what the right hon. Gentleman said. By and large, we agree with it, and we shall reply in detail fairly soon.

The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), who has apologised for not being able to be here for the end of the debate, asked several questions, and perhaps it would be for the convenience of the House if I replied to them by letter. He raised a point that was also touched on by the hon. Member for Hodge Hill, who commented on the practice of compounding by Customs, and the decisions about when to prosecute. This is a difficult problem, and I shall draw it to the attention of my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury. Customs always prosecute professional criminals, fraudsters, second offenders, those who have committed substantial fraud and offenders in special positions of trust. Experience shows, however, that comparatively small-time fraudsters are rarely, if ever, sentenced to long terms of imprisonment. They tend to be given suspended sentences or fines which can be considerably less than those imposed in out-of-court settlements. From the Exchequers' point of view, the current practice is more in the public and taxpayers' interests. More substantial penalties are obtained and taxpayers do not have to pay the costs of trials. That is the guiding principle behind the practice.

I shall reply by letter to what the hon. Member for Workington said about whistle blowers.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) remarked on some of the comments made by the PAC about privatisations. He particularly referred to the capital injection before the flotation of Rolls-Royce. That injection was given on the basis of professional banking advice and was consistent with successful flotation. The advice we had was that the health of the company and the flotation would be endangered, and the market's view of it would be bad, if we had not given the injection. We recovered the full proceeds through the flotation——

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the implication—although it was nicely put—of the PAC report at the time was that the chairman of Rolls-Royce twisted the Government's arm pretty far up their back for an extra cash injection before privatisation, without which he said he would not have felt able to privatise at all?

Mr. Lamont: The negotiations were tough: I was the person involved. I remember them extremely well, and neither side got exactly what it wanted.

Several hon. Members referred to the 26th report on community care developments. It is an extremely comprehensive report with myriad recommendations for joint projects between local and area health authorities. The report covers joint financing, monitoring and the effectiveness of community care, and makes certain pointed comments about the fees charged in residential care.

The Government are fully committed to promoting the development of high quality community services so that people do not have to stay in hospital longer than necessary and are helped to live as independently as possible in the community. That is not a cheap policy, which is why we share the Committee's view that one of the key objectives must be value for money. It is all the more necessary because resources for community care have expanded considerably, having had, as the Committee emphasises, a significant contribution from social security funds.

It was in this connection that Sir Roy Griffiths was asked to review community care and Lady Wagner carried out her independent review of residential care. The Government are considering the recommendations in both reports. I appreciate that our conclusions have been long and are anxiously awaited, but these are difficult issues. Our conclusions relate to some of the points made by the Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) touched on joint projects and financing between local and area health authorities. The Government are firmly of the view that there is scope within existing structures for health and local authorities to continue to improve ways in which they plan and work together. There are many examples of successful and innovative projects of this sort. We agree with the Committee that we need fully effective joint planning arrangements; they do not exist in all parts of the country. We need to get the rest up to the standards of the best.

The Department of Health shares the Committee's view of the importance of improving control over the financing of these joint finance schemes. The Department has written to the regional and district health authorities asking them to ensure that the procedures comply with the Department's guidelines. The Department of Health also recognises the need to improve information and monitoring systems and the performance of local authorities with them. I very much agree with the point that the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne is reported to have made in Committee about how one cannot rely only on the consumer to evaluate value for money. Resources must be put into independent assessment of how effective and up to standard these institutions are.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne also commented on the rapid growth in residential care for elderly people. Hon. Members may be interested to hear that in 1986, the latest date for which statistics are available, almost half the people living in residential care and nursing homes claimed no income support payments to meet their fees. They paid them from their own resources. Decisions about how financial support should be given to people in residential care and nursing homes cannot be made in isolation. The present system of setting national limits, which the Committee examined, is under consideration as part of the Griffiths report. Research carried out for the DHSS showed that basic charges for residential care homes were considered reasonable in more than 80 per cent. of cases that registration officers were asked to assess. Had the limits been set for homes at the levels recommended by registration officers, expenditure would have been somewhat higher.

I turn now to the point made by the Committee and repeated by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne about clinical assessment of the need to put people into accommodation, some of whom could carry on their lives in the community. I am advised that the research quoted by the Committee and which formed part of its report shows that more than 90 per cent. of a sample of elderly people claiming income support in homes in four areas were assessed as needing residential care on admission and up to two years later. The 23 per cent. of claimants referred to by the Committee who could remain in their own homes were not from the whole sample, but from the group of people who had come in from the comunity rather than from hospital or from other forms of care. By the time of the study, only 7 per cent. of those people were assessed as being capable of managing at home.

As the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne acknowledged, we have acted swiftly to deal with a number of specific points. There is now a requirement for a record to be kept of social security payments received on behalf of residents by the proprietors of nursing homes. I believe that that is a necessary step and I therefore welcome it. Although we are awaiting the Griffiths report, there is much that local authorities and other providers of care can do to improve standards. I hope that they will realise that and not wait for the report's conclusions.

Several hon. Members referred to the 20th report, which deals with fraud among Royal Engineers Regiment ordinance searchers. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne said that he was agog while waiting for my answer. I hope that his rapture will not be modified when he hears my reply. Perhaps I should not joke about the matter as I agree that this fraud was a sorry business. I share the anxieties that the Committee expressed and I agree with much of what has been said today.

The hon. Member for Workington alleged that action was never taken in cases of fraud. That is going too far. In a recent case at the Clyde submarine base, which caused some anxiety to several hon. Members, a number of people received prison sentences as a result of action brought by the Ministry of Defence.

In any case with which one is dealing, the key point is the availability of clear evidence. In the case of the Royal Engineers Regiment, the Director of Public Prosecutions decided that the evidence was insufficient to justify a prosecution, bearing in mind that the trial would have been lengthy, complex and expensive. Greater confidence in obtaining conviction would have been needed to justify proceedings. The Ministry of Defence similarly concluded that the evidence would not sustain disciplinary action.

The commanding officer, who called in the Ministry of Defence police, had been in the post for only two months, so no criticism could be made of his actions. Of the other officers in the unit, the most immediate supervisors were two troop commanders. Evidence against one troop commander was put to the Director of Public Prosecutions who concluded that the evidence, which did not suggest personal gain, was unlikely to secure a conviction. By the time that the decision was made, the individual concerned had retired from the Army.

No evidence was put to the Director of Public Prosecutions about the other troop commander. Any disciplinary action has to rely on the available evidence and not on speculation or supposition. After considering the evidence, the military authorities took the view that such action was not merited. One must remember that the supervisors were not the instigators of the abuses in the unit, which were of long standing. Strong views were expressed about the matter in Committee. Frankly, it is debatable whether the decision was correct. The standard of management fell short of the level that one would expect of public officials and the supervisors took insufficient action to check what was happening.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under Lyne asked whether action was being taken to recover the outstanding money. I cannot tell a cheerful story about that. The Ministry of Defence has written twice to those concerned, seeking repayment. The Ministry of Defence has no powers to enforce repayment against the 42 searchers who are implicated in the case, or against those who have left, without recourse to civil law. As it is clear that the individuals will not repay the sums voluntarily, civil action is now being considered. The Ministry of Defence will have to weigh in the balance the legal advice that it has received on the evidence and the prospects of success in the case.

I agree that it is a profoundly disturbing case. The Treasury has reminded all Departments of the seriousness with which the PAC rightly views fraud and it has reminded them of the role of the serious fraud office, which can take over investigations from Departments. The Treasury circulates information about fraud that has been discovered so that Departments can apply the lessons to be learnt. Finally, we shall shortly issue further guidance to all Departments, making it clear that in cases of serious fraud Ministers should be consulted before disciplinary action is ruled out.

I should also have added that travel and subsistence procedures have been tightened up. All staff in the Ministry of Defence have been made aware of the requirements for handling the disciplinary aspects of serious fraud cases. When evidence of fraud is clear, steps will be taken to secure prosecution or disciplinary action. Any recurrence of fraud will be made more difficult as a result of the steps that we have taken, although I do not dissent from some of the points that have been made on the matter this afternoon.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne touched on the 31st report, which deals with defence and warships. The hon. Member, in whose constituency Swan Hunter is situated and who always stoutly advances the case for his constituency in the House, made several comments about procurement policy, competition and batch ordering, particularly as applied to the type 23. I appreciate his constituency vantage point, but I must say that competition and batch ordering have saved the taxpayer considerable sums.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne referred to the Trident programme. Most of the points that he made are covered in the Treasury minute. He also referred to the capital works at Aldermaston—the advanced weapons establishment programme—which were a source of anxiety to the Committee. The works are an extremely important aspect of the Trident programme and the Ministry of Defence, in concert with the Property Services Agency, has already taken a number of measures to improve management and control, the main one being the introduction of a single experienced contractor working on an incentive basis to provide comprehensive co-ordination of the remaining stages of construction and fitting out. The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Trident programme as a whole—and he is right to zero in on particular aspects of it—remains on course to enter service in the mid-1990s on the due in-service date.

A number of hon. Members raised the question of the Land Registry, such as my hon. Friends the Members for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) and Hertfordshire, South-West. I share the concern that has been expressed. The steady growth in owner-occupation, the right-to-buy provisions and the increasing frequency with which people move home have all contributed to the problems at the Land Registry.

In July last year we authorised additional resources for the Land Registry. As the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne acknowledged, from April this year we exempted the registry from gross running costs control which, as the Committee wanted, enables the registry to draw more readily on its fee receipts to finance the resources it requires.

To meet the rapid growth and to take the pressure away from its offices in the south-east where recruitment and retention have been difficult and where conveyancing has been especially active, the registry has opened four new offices, in Telford, Coventry, Hull and Leicester, in the past two years. Two further offices are planned for 1989. A further 1,000 staff—mainly local additional recruits—are now working in the new locations.

The registry has continued to give priority to pre-contract and pre-completion applications. It is the post-completion applications for substantive registration of new owners and mortgagees where the turnround times have been extended. However, the additional staff who are now being recruited and the new work initiatives which are directed to increasing productivity will lead to reductions in the backlog in the near future. Provided that there is not an unexpected increase in the work load, the changes that have been made should have considerable effect. My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge asked about agency status for the registry. We believe that it is right that the registry should remain in the public sector, but we regard it as a potential candidate for agency status, and that is now under review. Agency status could provide the further management and financial freedoms that are necessary to promote improved performance.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East, apparently in order, referred to Royal Ordnance and the report——

Mr. Nicholas Brown rose——

Mr. Lamont: I am sorry, that remark did not imply anything. None the less, the hon. Gentleman surprised me by referring to the report on the disposal of the Royal Ordnance factories. The Government will reply on that in detail and I believe it would be a discourtesy to the Public Accounts Committee if I were to go into that matter in detail now. I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman did a great service in raising the matter at this stage. However, I can assure him that his arguments will prove to be ill-founded.

The price received for the sale of Royal Ordnance was the outcome of a keenly fought competition in the latter stages of which no fewer than six firms were involved. The price achieved was considered to be a good price by the merchant bank advising the Ministry of Defence, and was regarded by the Government as representing a satisfactory return to the taxpayer. Any talk about sales of sites is speculative and dependent upon planning permission being received—it has already been turned down. In any case, any property gains must be balanced against the costs of relocation and of decommissioning and against the fact that the buyer of Royal Ordnance may have taken on loss-making parts of the business and loss-making contracts. The price achieved for the business of Royal Ordnance as a whole was achieved for a going concern, to be managed and developed by British Aerospace, in the best long-term interests of Royal Ordnance and its work force. We shall reply fully in a Treasury minute to the Committee.

Finally, I should like to join the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East in thanking again the members of the Committee and those who have participated in the debate. The Treasury, of all Departments, very much appreciates the work of the Committee, which underpins our own objectives.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of the 1st to 36th and 41st Reports and First Special Report from the Committee of Public Accounts of Session 1987-88 and of the Treasury Minutes on those reports (Cm. 307, 323, 367, 410, 502 and 509), with particular reference to the following Reports:—

Sixteenth, Monitoring and Control of Charities in England and Wales;

Twentieth, Ministry of Defence: Fraudulent expenses claims; Meteorological Services;

Twenty-sixth, Community care developments;

Thirty-first, Naval warship and weapons procurement; and Thirty-second, Review of the operations of the Land Registry.

Mid-Downs Health Authority (Recruitment)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

8.24 pm

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Not long ago, I received a letter from 20 doctors in the Horsham and Crawley area telling me that 60 beds were out of action in the Horsham and Crawley hospitals; that the theatre operating lists had been cut by a quarter; and that most waiting lists had grown by over 20 per cent. The main reason for the shortfall in performance was the nursing shortage, which itself was due, in part, to the cost of housing but also to the lack of employees because of the full employment in our area.

The hospitals are short not only of nursing staff but also of ancillary and office staff—perhaps even more than they are short of nursing and midwifery staff. Furthermore, although the number of people aged over 75 is rising throughout the country, the number of school leavers is falling. That represents a severe challenge in the future—indeed, in the immediate future. There are now fewer young nurses to look after an increasing number of elderly and sick people. That is the reality.

The letter from those doctors in Horsham told me that Horsham hospital is frequently full and closed to admissions. When I received the letter I made some inquiries of the Mid-Downs health authority, which sent me a full reply. I found that the rolls were short in the following ways: administrative and clerical staff by 12·5 per cent.; ancillary staff by 21·8 per cent.; nursing and midwifery staff by 7·6 per cent.; and works and maintenance staff by 25·8 per cent.

The district has 125 beds temporarily closed in the acute sectors, largely due to those staffing shortages. The situation is particularly acute at Crawley hospital, where waiting lists have risen by an average of 15 to 20 per cent.

I know that my hon Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) is keenly interested in this debate and he has asked me to mention those facts because, like me, he is waiting for the Minister's reply, which I know he will study with great interest in Hansard.

The acute shortage of staff in virtually every area of hospital staffing is made worse by the rapid turnover in labour. I am told that the turnover of administrative and clerical staff is 23·5 per cent.; for ancillary staff it is over 50 per cent.; for nursing and midwifery it is 19·8 per cent.; and for works and maintenance staff 20 per cent. Not only is turnover expensive—I believe that an additional £2,500 to £3,500 has to be paid for each additional employee; it is also disruptive in terms of the training that needs to be carried out.

In Crawley—my constituency is in the same travel-to-work area—vacancies exceed the number of unemployed people at the moment. Of course, that is a happy position to be in but when it comes to recruiting extra staff for the Health Service, real difficulties must be resolved. The effect of such competition in employment has been to increase pay rates. The Mid-Downs health authority is now adrift in comparison with the local employment market by as much as 50 per cent. in some categories. I do not know which categories are the worst, but I would expect that they are the ancillary and clerical departments.

Another factor which must be taken into account is the cost of property for nurses and ancillary workers. In my area a two-bedroomed flat costs over £70,000. The minimum salary to support a mortgage of that level would be about £15,000, which is well beyond the reach of single staff in nursing and other professions.

What can be done about that situation? The Mid-Downs health authority has an innovative scheme for providing low-cost accommodation for single staff with a housing association on its own land. That proposition is being studied by both the Department and the Treasury. If the health authority is to be able to recruit, it must offer accommodation in addition to the necessary level of pay.

In other areas of employment, such as in business, it is the custom to recruit people and then provide them with a form of tied accommodation. Some time ago it was the Government's policy to permit tenants to purchase their own accommodation within the health authority. In so far as that arrangement worked, it tended to exacerbate an already difficult situation. When one considers that health authorities are exempt from normal planning procedures, one sees that, if they are successfully to recruit the necessary staff, they must be able to offer suitable accommodation within their own grounds. I know that the matter is being looked at by my hon. Friend the Minister and her Department, and by the Treasury. It needs their sympathetic consideration, if health authorities are to have a realistic chance of recruiting the staff they require.

One must not forget, either, the reduction in the number of school leavers and the multiplicity of jobs available to them. I refer to a particularly favoured part of the country; the same situation is not true of others. However, there is no reason why the Mid-Downs health authority or my part of Sussex should be any less well treated than other areas. Regional pay variations are absolutely necessary, in addition to any special efforts that might be made to provide residential accommodation. Pay variations are essential if we are to solve the problem. That applies not only to nurses but to ancillary workers, technicians and other staff.

Yesterday, by coincidence, I received a copy of a letter from Worthing district health authority, as part of my constituency is in its area. That authority is almost as badly off in respect of recruiting as Mid-Downs. The letter was directed at my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health. Worthing is going through an extremely difficult time in trying to recruit the number of people that it needs. As to pay variations, I believe that my hon. Friend and the Government accept in principle that there should be regional variations according to supply and demand. Pay variations are accepted in the Civil Service in the form of the London weighting allowance, and in other parts of south-east England, in business and industry.

In Sussex, there are rent allowances for the police. The payment of such allowances and compensatory grants to Sussex police officers now exceeds £4 million per annum, and about 80 per cent. of all officers now live in their own homes and therefore are entitled to a rent allowance. If that can be done for one part of the public sector, it can be done for another. Careful consideration should be given to any scheme that can be arranged to overcome the severe shortage of nurses and other trained people required in the Health Service. The police scheme appears to be a good one. In Sussex, we are not short of the number of police we are permitted to recruit; we are short of the establishment of police required. I commend that system of allowances in the police force as an example of what might be done in the Health Service.

It is not enough to say that there can be regional pay variations for people who work for the Mid-Downs or Worthing health authority, but that they must expect the extra cost to come out of budgets granted by the regional health authority. It must be recognised that pay differential costs should be included in the regional health authorities' budgets. Even so, the case for that would not be made unless one could plainly show a relative disadvantage in manning in the Mid-Downs area compared with other parts of the country.

I have the advantage, because I have two letters written to me by my hon. Friend the Minister—one more than a year ago, the other much more recently. In these matters, it is important to be sure of the statistics. I must admit at once that I have run into considerable difficulty. I regret to say that the Health Service—this has been the subject of many PAC reports—is not very good at providing up-to-date statistics.

When my hon. Friend wrote to me on 1 December 1987, she stated:

> "I accept, however, that there is concern about the need for differential pay increases to reflect differing recruitment patterns in different parts of the country. I would certainly not rule out that possibility. But it would be important to target accurately any local premiums and to adopt a selective approach based on a full and up-to-date picture of the staffing position."

How very right she is. Just over a year ago, I put down a question to establish what was the relative staffing for nurses and midwifery staff. The figures I received were for the period at 30 September 1986—a year previously. Those figures concerned me because they showed that the South West Thames regional health authority's figure for nursing and midwifery staff was 8·21 per thousand population—the fifth lowest of the 14 regional health authorities.

However, as the Minister says, it is important to have up-to-date information. Imagine my surprise when my hon. Friend told me the other day:

> "Detailed staffing information is collected from the NHS annually on 30 September. Because of the necessity for detailed checking and validating of this data, the final figures are not normally available until some 11 months after the situation date."

I dare say that checking and validation are all very well, but what I have wanted to know for a long time is how it is that those manning level figures are so out of date. I agree with my hon. Friend's comment in her earlier letter that it is necessary to have up-to-date information, but how can it be up to date when the fully checked and validated statistics are already 11 months out of date?

The need for a proper system of calculating accurate manpower statistics in the National Health Service is as great now as it ever was. I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to do something about that. I may add that the latest figures, which are really one year out of date, show that the South West Thames health authority had an even lower manning ratio of 7·9 per 1,000 population, which makes it the fourth lowest out of the 14 health authorities.

If the resource allocation working party system, which is designed to even out services throughout the country, means anything, those figures show that the south-east of England, and Mid-Downs health authority in particular, needs more nurses—and that attention needs to be paid to the acute shortage of ancillary and secretarial staff as well. It cannot be counted as a satisfactory policy if our region is so very far behind other parts of the country.

[Sir Peter Hordern]

I want to emphasise the outstanding improvement in the National Health Service from the extra pay award. I devoutly hope that the increase, which will come through soon, will have a marked impact. I also welcome the huge increase in resources for the Health Service as a whole. That does not, however, invalidate the case for a regional pay policy: without such a policy, we shall not have equality of health treatment throughout the country. It is essential that a district health authority is not treated unfavourably because it happens to be in a regional health authority that has a London teaching hospital in its area.

This is a particularly vexed question. I have not been able to have a conversation with the regional health authority about it recently as the directors were not available, so I shall have to deal with it without their guidance. The truth as seen by the district health authorities is that the regional health authority has to spend a good deal on the teaching hospital—in the South West Thames authority it is St. George's—because it is new and very expensive. I believe—I hope that the Health Service review will accommodate this—that there is a strong case for taking all the London teaching hospitals together and not extending them so that they have a marked influence on the position in other parts of the country, as is the case in our region.

What we have found so unsatisfactory in the cases of both the Mid-Downs and Worthing health authorities is that money that should have been transferred to those health authorities has been extended to St. George's because it happens to be in our region. I dare say that it is all to do with not handing over resources too quickly, but my authority and Worthing have suffered because money has been handed over very tardily, if at all.

We have been accustomed to regional health authorities for some time. They draw up their own budgets and work out their capital expenditure and spending programmes, and I know that it is all done very carefully. To an outsider, however, it is extraordinary that a health authority should contemplate building a major hospital within two miles of an existing one. A visitor from abroad, if told that it was the policy of a regional health authority to take no notice of the presence of a satisfactory hospital in the neighbouring region which could be extended and to put up a brand new one within two or three miles, would conclude that we must be mad—as indeed we must be. But there is a proposal, which I believe is still under study, to construct a brand new hospital at Hove, within three miles of the existing Worthing hospital.

If there were no RHAs to compete with one another—if initiatives came from the ground—that could never happen. Alternatives could be provided. RHAs could say, "We wish to improve the facilities in other hospitals in our region now that we know that there is an existing general hospital within two or three miles of this one."

This affects my constituents particularly. We shall not have the facilities that we would have had if people had not taken leave of their senses in a peculiarly important matter. It is no small sum that the South-West Thames regional health authority proposes to spend. If only the two regions would talk to each other, things would go much more merrily, but what looks likely is a considerable waste of money.

I have given notice to no one, but this is not the first time that I have taken the matter up with the Department, and I shall continue to do so. As a matter of interest, I have sent the correspondence to the Comptroller and Auditor General, whose excellent report we have just been discussing. I hope that, if the RHA is seriously proposing to build the new hospital at Hove, it is aware that the CAG will be observing any transaction with the greatest interest, because it can only be concluded that it is a significant waste of public money, and the sooner it is turned down the better.

I must apologise in advance to my hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Mr. Sainsbury) for not informing him that I was going to say this, and I shall draw his attention to it in Hansard tomorrow. Nevertheless, he and I both know what is involved, and I think it absolutely necessary that we make the best and most economic use of our resources. These matters are much too important for rivalries to be allowed between one RHA and another. We must not only practise economy but devise a sensible system that will allow satisfactory facilities and increased pay on a regional basis in the way that I have described.

8.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mrs. Edwina Currie): Let me start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) on his success in the ballot. He is a doughty fighter for his consituents, and I commend his example to other, newer colleagues. They could do no better than follow his unfailingly courteous, thoughtful and constructive approach. I say that with some feeling, having listened to one or two other speeches from the Back Benches on health issues this week.

I note with pleasure what my hon. Friend said about the support given to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames), who also makes representations on Health Service matters in his constituency. I also note the presence of my hon. Friends the Members for Stevenage (Mr. Wood) and for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe)—whose own areas face similar problems—and my hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack). I do not think that the manpower problem has hit Blackpool yet, but no doubt it will.

It is a delight to see my very dear friend the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) who always graces the Chamber, and with such pleasure, when I am around. He is the only Member of the House who has offered me a personal compliment when I have been answering questions from the Dispatch Box. I am eternaly in his debt for that, and I shall not allow him to forget it either.

My hon. Friend the Member for Horsham has given the House the opportunity to discuss an important aspect of Health Service management, namely the need to recruit and retain staff in an increasingly competitive environment. The greatest asset of the NHS is its staff, and our ability to recruit and retain staff is crucial to the delivery of high-quality care. It is a measure of my hon. Friend's dedicated care for his constituents that he recognises that. He has, as he said, been in contact with Ministers in recent months about nurse staffing in the South West Thames region and the important points that he has raised about our pattern of knowledge of employment in the Health Service in general.

I am sure that my hon. Friend is looking to the near future, when the brand new 300-bed district general hospital will open at Haywards Heath. It will be known as the Mid-Sussex hospital. Of course there are considerable implications for staffing it: I am told that 30 extra trained nurses will probably be needed, partly because although this is a replacement hospital there will be more beds and partly because the design—as it is no longer Nightingale ward—will require more staff.

My hon. Friend spoke about employment data. It is worth remembering—this is no reproach to my hon. Friend—that the Health Service is the largest employer in western Europe, and that some 1·25 million names appear on its payroll. Any employment data that we might collect are bound to take some time to sort out. It is not simply a question of pushing a button on the computer and finding out how many staff we have. However, the computers are now in place, and—as I said in my correspondence with my hon. Friend—opportunities are arising to produce the information far more accurately and rapidly in future. Our slight difficulty at present is that the very process of generating for the first time the new data known as the Korner data is taking up an enormous amount of time and in itself is producing a delay, and I can only apologise to my hon. Friend.

Worldwide, we stand as one of the great employers. I understand that only the Indian railways and the Red Army are larger employers than the NHS, and if General Secretary Gorbachev is successful in some of the things that he is getting up to, the Red Army will end up smaller than the NHS—certainly if we continue to recruit at the rate of the recent past.

My hon. Friend asked about the review of the Health Service led by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I am sure that he realises that I cannot say much about it, but he has made some sensible points and I shall ensure that they are drawn to the attention of the members of that review group.

My hon. Friend also asked about resource allocation working party money and how it is allocated among the districts. We agree that it is not allocated fast enough and that we need better systems to ensure that the allocation reflects the pattern of care that has developed in the neighbourhood, perhaps without freezing for ever that pattern of care. I am told that most RAWP money is out of Wandsworth as a result of changes at St. George's and that about £500,000 is to come out next year, starting in April. Mid-Downs health authority is set to gain significantly.

My hon. Friend mentioned district general hospitals at Worthing, Southlands and Hove. I should like to stress that no decision has been taken although, like him, I hope that one will not be too long delayed. The proposal is receiving careful study and the arguments that my hon. Friend advanced are foremost in our mind. The content of the proposed new hospital will be studied carefully to ensure that there is no duplication.

It is worth remembering that, on the south coast, in several health authority areas, more than one quarter of the population is now over 65, and their number is set to rise. They are heavy users of hospital services. We must take account of the fact that the pattern of care will have to respond to the pattern of need. I noticed that when I visited Eastbourne yesterday, where about 27 per cent. of the population is elderly. Some of the advice that I tried to give was that we must try to gear services to the people the service is looking after now and those it is likely to look after in future, although when the Health Service was established there were relatively few elderly people. The pattern of care 40 years ago was very different.

South West Thames regional health authority, in common with other Thames regions, faces pressure on recruitment and retention. One would expect that from their geographical position. The nurse staffing ratios show that South West Thames is in a relatively poor position. That is why, in my review in February this year of the region's performance, the subject was a major item on the agenda. The discussion that we had then gave rise to a number of specific pieces of action to which the regional health authority has given attention since. For example, we asked it to report to us on wastage rates and on intakes of nurse learners to ensure that the pattern of the most basic education is integrated properly with manpower requirements and financial resources. It is no good planning to train people if one has neither the money to train them nor the money to employ them at some stage. We asked it to make reports to us by 30 September on its mechanisms for identifying and correcting problems and to ensure that the pattern of nurse training schools is in line with recommendations of its education strategy. We have just received that report.

So far, what we have got is an excellent analysis of the region's nursing situation. An analysis is one thing—it is substantial: there are pages and pages of it—action is another. We have therefore put the subject on the agenda again for this year's review of the regional health authority and my Department will monitor progress closely.

It is no longer good enough for us to say that such and such a region or health authority needs more nurses. The pattern of demography is such that, in the south-east, we may be employing virtually everyone that is available. There may not be a pool of people from which we can draw additional nurses, physiotherapists, operating department assistants or any other group.

We are already the largest employer in the country. We are almost certainly the largest employer in most districts. It follows, therefore, that it will not be enough simply to say, "We need more nurses." I have put this point strongly in every regional review that I have done recently—we must consider retaining the staff we have and managing the career break much more effectively, particularly as the majority of staff are women, many of them young women, and many of them married with young children. We must look much more closely at the skill mix to ensure that the staff we can recruit are able to take up as much of the work as is appropriate for their level of training.

Even more important, we must ensure that we get some upskilling. In other words, if we have dedicated staff who have not for various reasons been able to train, we may have to develop schemes to enable them to do that. Many of those whom we employ are women and women traditionally have not taken up their education opportunities when they had the chance. I feel quite strongly that we should follow up, as far as we can, the opportunities to enable our staff to improve themselves and therefore the employment position of health authorities.

The Mid-Downs health authority, which covers my hon. Friend's constituency, operates in an employment market which is about as competitive as any in the country. It shares its pool of labour with other employers such as Gatwick airport. There is full employment. Crawley and the surrounding travel-to-work area has the lowest rate of unemployment in the country, at 2·1 per cent. That puts pressure on all sorts of things including wage and housing costs.

I am extremely interested in this topic and I have done some homework on it. The next lowest level of unemployment—2·5 per cent.—is to be found at Winchester and Eastleigh. That puts Crawley in some difficulty. I asked the Department of Employment to give me an age analysis of unemployed people. I have the figures for 14 July 1988, which covers the Crawley travel-to-work area, which is not quite the same as Crawley town, but it covers the health authority area pretty well. It is a depressing picture for anybody hoping to recruit more staff.

The total number of people aged 18 and under unemployed for one year or more and who might therefore be regarded as available was 10. Aged 19 and under, that figure increased to 21. There were fewer than 4,000 people on the entire register. The total number of people aged 19 or under from whom we might expect to recruit was 110, of whom more than half had been unemployed for eight weeks or less, and were presumably between jobs. There is no pool of labour in that area. We should not, therefore, be surprised to find vacancies in the health authority.

I should like to give my hon. Friend a flavour of the health authority's vacancies as they are not as bad as in other areas, which suggests that Mid-Downs is a good employer and doing a good job at retaining staff, but nor are they entirely consistent, which is rather curious. The establishment for nurses and midwives is 1,872, and the number in post at 30 September 1988 was 1,730. That means that 142 posts are unfilled, which gives a vacancy rate of 8 per cent. The main gaps are in qualifed staff, especially in orthopaedics, registered sick children's nurses, intensive care units, theatres—including operative department assistants—and premature baby units.

The Mid-Downs health authority shares this problem with many other health authorities in the south-east, although, according to some indicators, the nurse employment pattern is not too bad. For example, the turnover and wastage rates for nurses are both better than the regional average. In 1987-88, the authority's wastage rate for qualified nursing midwifery staff was 17 per cent. of total staff in post. In Worthing and south-west Surrey, it was 23 per cent., so Mid-Downs is obviously losing fewer people. The number of long-stay staff who have been with the authority for more than a year is 88 per cent. of total staff in post. That is far higher than, for example, in south-west Surrey, where the figure is 74 per cent. The authority is therefore managing to keep its staff.

Nurses are not the most problematic staff group in Mid-Downs. At the end of September, the health authority had a shortfall of almost 22 per cent. in ancillary staff, 12·5 per cent. in administrative and clerical staff and 25 per cent. in works and maintenance staff, compared with 8 per cent. in nursing. Perhaps its establishments for some of these other types of activity are too high. I find it hard to believe that a health authority can function properly when it is down by a quarter on its maintenance staff and by almost the same figure on its ancillary staff, but it may be coping reasonably well on that.

It is interesting to note that medical and dental staff are well over establishment. I too saw the letter written by GPs and want to put on record the fact that the health authority believes it needs 193 medical and dental staff. It has almost 203 staff—that is, in whole-time equivalents—which means that it has 9·52 more people, again in whole-time equivalents, than it has 9·52 more people, again in whole-time equivalents, than it needs. That is 5 per cent. over establishment. At a rough guess, that is probably worth about £200,000 a year. If it is not, I stand to be corrected, but that is rather a lot of money for the recruitment of new doctors when the authority needs more nurses.

Sir Peter Hordern: My hon. Friend is right. I suspect that my figures come from the same source. However, my information goes on to state that the extra people are explained by an addition of directly employed locum staff to cover sickness, holiday and maternity leave. My hon. Friend is right in saying that the authority might save £200,000 by not having those staff, but are they to have no holiday, sickness or maternity leave?

Mrs. Currie: So far as I understand it, the data are collected in roughly the same way for all staff and I therefore wonder whether the shortfall in the other staff includes those staff mentioned by my hon. Friend. I merely put that on the record as I know that this debate will be read with great interest by Mid-Downs health authority tomorrow. The letter that the GPs sent to the local newspaper stated:

"Surgeons and anaesthetists are finding spare time on their hands because over 25 per cent. of the operating sessions are cancelled, again largely due to nurse shortages."

I wonder why, therefore, the authority is employing locums. I simply put that fact on the record; I do not criticise the authority. However, it does not seem quite right that it has more doctors than it needs but does not have as many other staff that it needs. If those figures are accurate, as I am led to believe, I hope that it will try to put that matter right.

The authority has taken the sad step of closing beds because of nurse shortages. That has a general effect on activity levels. I caution my hon. Friend about using performance indicators which are available in the Library because they refer to 1986-87. They show that the total nursing staff in the acute sector is, at 1·13 per bed, closer to the national average of 1·15. However, those figures are probably now out of date and I promise my hon. Friend that the latest data will be available as soon as possible.

I am told that the authority is dependent upon bank and agency nurses. At 30 September, it was employing 87 agency staff and bank staff out of a total nursing establishment of 1,100 qualified staff. It spends between 5 per cent. and 8 per cent. of its £17 million nursing services budget on agency and bank staff.

The health authority had to make some efforts to find those figures. I cannot tell my hon. Friend exactly how much it spends on agency staff alone, but it does not appear to be very much if the total amount that it spends on bank and agency staff is between 5 and 8 per cent. I am not as troubled about the use of bank nurses because they are Health Service staff and using one's own bank is a sensible way of enabling staff who do not want to work full time to come in when they are available.

However, I wish to put on record my dissatisfaction that senior officers of the authority did not have this information easily to hand when I asked them for it this afternoon. They did not know how many agency staff they employed or how much they spent on agency staff and were not able to give me the figures. The figures that I was given were for agency and bank staff and they are not the same thing. I met Mrs. Tovey, the district nurse adviser, and Mr. Peter Catchpole, the district general manager, today. I asked them a string of questions to which they should have had the answers, but they did not. I put that on record because it is appropriate for those managers to be asking those questions and to have those answers.

There is some evidence of an imaginative management response from the district. It has recently produced, as required by the region, a strategy for the recruitment and retention of staff. My officials tell me that this is a comprehensive and, in many ways, imaginative document. So far, it is still a document. It proposes action, much of which is already under way, and there are about 30 points in total. These include improvements in working conditions, including the provision of a creche, which I understand is already running. Another point is the improving of arrangements for collecting information on manpower. As my hon. Friend will realise, there is some feeling of soreness about that. Another point is recruitment campaigns, including job fairs and the reviewing of recruitment literature. Some of the literature is good. The health authority is discussing preferential mortgage terms. I understand that it has been recruiting in other countries. I understand also that one of the proposals before it is to revert to having matrons. I am sure that my hon. Friend will have a view on whether that is desirable.

I have collected a good deal of other data on the Mid-Downs health authority, and I shall be glad to share it with my hon. Friend. It occurs to me that it might be more helpful if I were to include some of it in a letter. Having been critical about the health authority, I am aware that there may be further discussions during the next day or two on how it will come to terms with the criticism and cope with it.

In my judgment, it is not good enough that the authority should divert the resources that it had for nurse training to other things and then be surprised that the English national board should stop its nurse training altogether. It is not good enough that it should not know how many staff it employs, nor how the balancing of the budget is worked out between its own staff and agency staff, overtime and so forth. There is a great deal that the Government are doing, and I am sure that my hon. Friend will be aware of it. This includes a central recruitment campaign for nursing, which was successful during August. We may well run the campaign during the winter.

Sir Peter Hordern: My hon. Friend will recall that I spoke of a scheme that the health authority would like to put into effect. It involves the development on its own land of quarters for its nursing staff. Could she give that scheme a fair wind?

Mrs. Currie: I must apologise to my hon. Friend for overlooking that issue. It was discussed this afternoon. As the scheme stands, it involves unconventional finance. I advised the staff that a different approach should be taken so that it involves conventional finance, and then the authority will be able to get on with it. I have asked my officials to visit the staff of the authority to discuss with them exactly how that might be done. Rather than wasting a great deal of time arguing with colleagues about bending or changing the rules, it might well be done within the rules. I hope that that satisfies my hon. Friend.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at seven minutes past Nine o'clock.

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

Pedestrian Safety (Stoke-on-Trent)

9.35 am

Ms. Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): I have a petition from residents in my constituency of Stoke-on-Trent, North who are very concerned about pedestrian safety. They feel most strongly that greater priority should be given by the Government to street lighting and to financial support for it. Their petition concludes:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your Honourable House does consider how the general deterioration in standards of street lighting can be arrested and pedestrian safety be given a far higher priority, and provision be made within the Transport Supplementary Grant for expenditure on street lighting and the grant restored to its 1985-86 status of being a contribution to both capital and current expenditure on transport, including highways.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Sea and River Pollution

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. John M. Taylor.]

Relevant documents: Third Report from the Environment Committee of Session 1986-87 on pollution of rivers and estuaries (HC 183), third special report of Session 1987-88 incorporating the Government's response (HC 543), first report of Session 1985-86 on radioactive waste (HC 191), the Government's second stage response (Cmnd. 9852), the ministerial declaration from the second international conference on the protection of the North sea, and the guidance note thereon.

9.36 am

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): I am most grateful for this opportunity to discuss the Environment Committee's third report for the Session 1986-87 on the pollution of rivers and estuaries. The House will have noted the date of publication of the report—13 May 1987—which was the very eve of the Dissolution of Parliament for the general election. Much burning of midnight oil was required to ensure the publication of the report before the Dissolution of Parliament and of the Committee, which otherwise might have meant that months of inquiry and research would never have seen the light of day.

I am indebted to the members of the Committe at that time for their co-operation and I am glad to see that a number of them are in their places today. I am also indebted to the staff of the Committee, who prepared and retyped revised draft after revised draft to make possible this publication, albeit originally in typescript without photographs or illustrations. The timing of the publication meant that the report was subsumed by the general election campaign in terms of media interest, although favourable comment was received from the specialist press.

After re-reading the report some 18 months later, I do not think that, even with the advantage of hindsight, I would wish to alter its thrust nor any of its 32 recommendations. If I may make this criticism, the Government have taken an inordinate time in which to reply to the report—just over 13 months—whereas the requirements of this House are a maximum of six months. However, the long interval has enabled the Government to put in hand or to announce a number of initiatives that suggest that the major recommendations in the report have been accepted.

The changes or announcements have included, for example, the proposal that there should be a National Rivers Authority to act as a regulatory and pollution control authority and to take such control away from the water authorities. That would be the implementation in due course of recommendation No. 8. Another proposal is for a "red list" of substances for which strict environmental water quality is to be established. In recommendation 35, we suggest that there should be a list of substances which should be subject to the strictest control against their discharge into rivers. Also, there are various measures relating to sea dumping of sewage sludge and contaminates, to which the Government agreed at the second international conference for the protection of the North sea in November 1987.

The Committee should not complain that the Government have required so much time to study our conclusions. It is clear that they have studied them seriously. It has been the experience of this Committee that the moment that it announces a subject for inquiry, there is immediately a reaction—an internal inquiry—within the Department of the Environment. The opening of cupboards and the falling out of skeletons is audible from Marsham street to this place.

It is inevitable that in an inquiry and report of this kind, the Committee focuses attention where things seem to be wrong and where correction and improvements are needed. However, in emphasising these matters, it would be quite wrong to lose sight of the fact that the record of the United Kingdom in the care of the quality of its waters is the best in Europe and possibly in the world.

I draw the attention of the House in particular to paragraph 6 of the report, in which the Committee says: "it is important to stress that river and estuary quality in this country is generally very high. Of . . .(18,750 miles) of river length in England and Wales over 90 per cent. is classed by the DOE as 'good' and 'fair', and a similar picture applies too to our . . . (1,875) miles of estuary length."

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): The Department of Environment measurements are based on water authority tests, which in turn are based on the amount of dissolved oxygen in the water. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that test does not include grade 1 chemical pollutants that might be in rivers?

Sir Hugh Rossi: There is an element of that, but the great test is the presence of oxygen and the ability of natural life to exist in those rivers, and it is on this basis that the tests are taken.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): Does my hon. Friend agree that the appointment of David Renshaw as the chief executive of the National Rivers Authority is a most inspired choice? Has my hon. Friend had time to consider the Salmon Advisory Council's report, published by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which shows that in 1985, the latest year for which figures are available, the catches of salmon exceeded those of 1952, 1955, 1976, 1979 and 1982? That shows that that most sensitive of fish is thriving because of the much clearer waters in our rivers?

Sir Hugh Rossi: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that information. As the Committee said in paragraph 4, the United Kingdom has a strong tradition of tackling water pollution and a good record to prove it. Even though the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) tends to denigrate the efforts made by this country in comparison with the rest of the world, it is generally recognised that the Thames estuary restoration is the great success story of the post-war period. That is repeated elsewhere—for example, the Trent, the Tees and the Tyne. Therefore, I ask the hon. Member for Bootle not to sell this country short.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Last week, the hon. Gentleman was attacking the Government for not accepting the recommendations of his report, and the Labour party for accepting them. Now, he is pre-empting or presupposing what I shall say in my speech. I assure him that I shall be telling the real truth about the condition of our rivers and their deterioration since the Government came into power.

Sir Hugh Rossi: The hon. Gentleman should not change his spots. He was a useful member of the Committee and made a helpful contribution, but, unfortunately, when he speaks from the Dispatch Box, he seems to lose all sense of proportion.

In the course of its inquiry, the Committee noted, from the river survey of 1985, that after 25 years of continuous improvement, there had been a slippage of some 2 per cent. in water quality compared with five years previously. This is partly due to spasmodic pollution incidents, because of agriculture, and—significantly and disturbingly—partly due to the water authorities themselves. Paragraph 25 of the report says:

"in 1986, of the 4,355 numerical discharge consents issued by the DOE to water authority sewage treatment works, no less than 22 per cent. were breached or in the WAA's own words were, 'unsatisfactory'. That is, in 1986, 22 per cent. of all sewage works failed to meet the requirements to comply with their discharge consents for 95 per cent. of the time. This is not an acceptable state of affairs."

In their response, the Government agreed that it was not an acceptable state of affairs, and informed us that they would be discussing with the water authorities

"the implications of bringing all works into full compliance by 1991."

Therefore, I ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to inform the House what progress has been made in these promised discussions and whether there has been any improvement in the level of compliance since those discussions took place.

The Committee had considerable sympathy with the water authorities over this unacceptable state of affairs, because, as we say in paragraph 27—I draw the attention of the hon. Member for Bootle to the political implications of this statement—

"from the mid-1970s until the early 1980s there was a steady drop in investment by the water authorities in sewerage and sewage disposal. This is now making itself felt in the overloading of existing sewage works and operational failure. Since 1981 . . . there has once more been a modest increase in water authority investment in sewage treatment".

Therefore, if the hon. Gentleman is to make great play of the fact that rivers have slipped in quality because of the water authorities' failure to maintain their sewage treatment systems in a satisfactory operating manner, he should pay close attention to the dates in that paragraph, which show when they were most under-capitalised.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Earlier, the hon. Gentleman said that river quality had improved. Now he is saying that it has deteriorated. Which is right?

Sir Hugh Rossi: I do not think that I should give way to the hon. Gentleman any more. Quite clearly he has not listened to what I have said. I will not spend any more time on him. I suggest that he reads Hansard, when he will see what I have said. There is nothing inconsistent in my statements today.

Mr. Roberts rose——

Sir Hugh Rossi: No, I am not giving way again.

The problems about historic pollution are more difficult. One of the witnesses at the Select Committee told us that the Victorians had a great saying, "Where there's muck there's brass." The Victorians took the brass and left us with the muck. Many water authorities face problems with historic pollution, a problem which is particularly acute in the Mersey basin.

Enormous sums are needed to correct that historic source of poor quality water in some rivers and estuaries. The Select Committee report states that about £3·6 billion is needed over 15 years simply to remove all the class 4 bad waters and some class 3 poor waters. Such a sum clearly cannot be found out of revenue. The impact on water charges would be enormous. The water authorities are against the Treasury conventions of annuality in relation to their borrowing. The authorities are virtually bound hand and foot when it comes to raising money. It is no surprise that some water authorities have asked the Government to privatise them so that they can be free to go out on the open market to borrow money to bring their clapped-out systems up to date and so make them satisfactory.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Is it not true that freedom could have been given to the authorities to borrow commercially and the present financial arrangements could have been relaxed while keeping the authorities in the public sector? It is not necessary to privatise them.

Sir Hugh Rossi: I am afraid that the dead hand of the Treasury has affected the Department of the Environment under Labour and Conservative Administrations. I agree that it need not. I am not a believer in annuality, because it leads us into terrible difficulties wherever public investment is required. However, that is another argument. Perhaps the Committee can consider the problem of annuality as it affects the construction industry. Much bad policy from both Administrations resulted from certain accounting conventions insisted upon by the Treasury, when no distinction was made between capital investment and revenue expenditure within a given 12-month period of a particular Budget.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The hon. Gentleman mentioned the Thames. Does he agree that, about 30 years ago, the London county council—of which I believe he was a member at the time—borrowed enormous sums from the Public Works Loan Board for the purification of the Thames, including the great purification works at Beckton in my constituency? That money attracted interest, but was kept within a public authority. Why does he claim that such investment elsewhere must perforce come from private sources and that regional water authorities must be privatised? He may believe that for other reasons, but that cannot hold up for the reasons that he has just advanced.

Sir Hugh Rossi: The local authorities used their rights to expend 2 per cent. of their money in whatever way they wanted, and Waterloo bridge is an example of that. That is how much of the expenditure was incurred. Much of the expenditure has been incurred more recently than the hon. Member for Newham, South implied. I remember the great drive made by Horace Cutler to clean up the Thames when he was leader of the Greater London council.

Another problem which has militated against the improvement of water quality is the fact that water authorities are both poachers and gamekeepers. They discharge into the rivers and they are responsible for ensuring that others discharge only to certain standards. It is clear that, because they have that dual role, they have been inhibited from being as rigorous in prosecution as they should be.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I entirely agree that the water authorities—the watchdogs—are far too closely identified with the burglars. The authorities are often responsible for pollution. However, the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) illustrated his argument by referring to the Mersey basin and the need for more than £3 billion investment. He was referring to the regional discrepancies. The Mersey is really a communal sewer which requires so much investment to correct. Does he believe that the capacity is available within the private sector to provide that kind of money to one authority alone to carry out such extensive work?

Sir Hugh Rossi: A sum of about £2·5 billion over 25 years to clean up the Mersey means a forward debt of a kind that might deter investors if the authority were privatised. Others will have to consider that problem; it is not a matter for the Committee.

The argument that I am trying to adduce is that the Treasury convention on water authorities restricting their ability to borrow under successive Administrations has meant that the modernisation of our sewage treatment works has not carried on to the extent that it should have; that has caused the slippage in recent years. The water authorities believe that privatisation is one way out of that problem, as it would provide freedom to borrow on the market to the extent that they think necessary to run their operations efficiently and correctly. Whether potential shareholders will share their enthusiasm is something that only time will show.

I have allowed myself to digress from the theme that I was trying to pursue; I want to return to the lack of sufficient prosecutions by water authorities. That is partly due to the inhibition that authorities feel because they are serious polluters. It is also due to the difficulty of going to court to prosecute someone when the authority is equally at fault. Therefore, we welcome the fact that the Government have agreed to set up a National Rivers Authority which will take away the functions of regulation, control and prosecution from water authorities.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that one reason why water authorities may have been reluctant to prosecute—their reluctance has been almost dramatic—is that the courts have inflicted such pathetically small fines that the authorities might have felt that the exercise was counter-productive?

Sir Hugh Rossi: I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman: that was one of the Committee's findings recorded in the report. I would go further: the problem is not simply the fines, but the costs awarded by the courts. The exercise of proving beyond all reasonable doubt that pollution in a particular stretch of river was caused by a discharge from a particular factory or farmer and by nothing else requires a great deal of collation of evidence and scientific and chemical testing of water above and below the point of discharge, possibly over many months. When the court awards nominal costs on a successful prosecution, a water authority might think that the exercise really is not worth its while. The House cannot tell the courts what to do, so our recommendation was that the Magistrates Association should review its policy for this sort of offence.

The National Rivers Authority will take over responsibility from the water authorities, for regulation and control, and in recommendation 10, we recommend that the regulation by this authority must be both vigorous and seen to be so. Next, will my right hon. Friend assure the House that water authorities will be treated by the National Rivers Authority the same as farming and industry for pollution offences, especially after privatisation.

I am glad to see that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is in his place because I have some criticisms to make of that Ministry. The Committee found that the attitude of the Ministry was disappointing. It was relaxed and complacent. It was clear to the Committee that the major incidents of accidental pollution came from farmers. It is true that a relatively small number of farmers are involved, but slurry and silage are damaging to water quality. The Committee must express its disappointment that its recommendations for a unified conservation and pollution division in the Ministry has not been accepted.

We feel that such a division within the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is necessary to focus greater attention on the harm that some farming activities can have on our general environment. We felt, too, and regretted, that the code of good agricultural practice is not to be enforceable by statute. We are disappointed that trial protection zones in selected sensitive catchment areas, and the control of land use around boreholes, have not found acceptance by the Government to the extent that we would want.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): In iterating his criticisms of MAFF, would my hon. Friend feel it appropriate to stress that silage liquor, as I believe it is called, is 200 times more polluting than untreated sewage? Unfortunately, the incidents of the former increased by, I believe, 60 per cent. in 1987. That gives a double-edged sword to the way in which we believe MAFF should take immediate priority measures.

Sir Hugh Rossi: My hon. Friend is right. It is because of the serious pollutant nature of effluents from farms, if they are not properly controlled, that we were so critical of the apparent complacency that we detected within the Ministry on those matters.

We know from the Government response that the code of good practice is to be redesigned, that initial advice to farmers will be free, and that protection zones are to be placed under review. However, I ask my right hon. Friend again to tell us how far he has reached in the review of those protection zones in especially sensitive areas, because the nitrates that are used in fertilisers are working their way down to the aquifers and could seriously affect the quality of the water. Therefore, I hope that my right hon. Friend can tell us how the Government intend to tackle the problem of modifying agricultural practice to limit nitrate input to vulnerable aquifers. Paragraph 2.31 of the response promises that that will be done, and I would like more information about it.

While my right hon. Friend is dealing with agriculture, perhaps he can tell us of the time scale for discussions with the water industry and agriculture and fertiliser manufacturing interests, which are mentioned in paragraph 2.34 of the response, and what progress has been made on that since the Committee reported.

On the question of industry, the visit of the Committee to Sandoz and down the Rhine impressed upon us the importance of containment measures for anything that is likely to find its way into the river because of an accident; and the need for notification of the pollutants being used by a factory, so that, if an incident did occur, it would be possible to detect or to know within a short time the nature of the chemical that had been discharged into the river. That is not easy to do because of the infinitesimal quantities in terms of volume compared with the water in the river, which makes chemical analysis difficult. Therefore, corrective measures can be delayed beyond the point when protection of the environment can take place.

I would further ask my right hon. Friend what progress has been made in the promised EEC discussions on the classification and labelling of substances being used by industry that could harm the quality of rivers, and in the regulations under consideration to deal with the containment measures which the Committee has recommended.

We made only a passing reference to sea pollution in the report, because we regarded it basically as outside our remit—as it is not covered by the Department of the Environment—but we were worried about the practice of water authorities dumping treated sewage sludge into our seas. We received evidence from Holland that this was leading to contamination and possibly harm to fish life, especially because of the presence of heavy metals which are inevitably found in this sort of sludge. We took the view that incineration was possibly the most effective, although possibly the more expensive, way of dealing with treated sewage sludge. We note in the Government's response that they do not rule out incineration as a possible option, although they speak of expense and say that plans are under consideration for incineration. I would like more information on that matter if it is available.

Ms. Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): I am worried about sewage sludge and what we do with it. I do not think that the North sea conference went half far enough in dealing with the matter. I believe that the Government have now said that containment to the 1987 level will be the important issue, but perhaps the Secretary of State will comment on the statement, after the North sea conference, by Lord Belstead, the Environment Minister, that the cost of all the measures would have to be absorbed by industry and the water boards. I believe that extra money should be available from the Government to pay for those measures.

Sir Hugh Rossi: I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend heard the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley), and that he will answer the question in his own time. The hon. Lady should bear in mind that the underlying principle in this matter is that the polluter pays.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): Perhaps my hon. Friend could help me by saying whether the next sewage sludge incineration plant should be placed in Stoke-on-Trent or Hornsey?

Sir Hugh Rossi: There is no room in Hornsey; I can say that with great confidence. I appreciate the difficulties that my right hon. Friend will encounter with the NIMBY—not in my backyard—syndrome, which he is extremely fond of quoting. I also appreciate that he might take refuge in NIMTOO—not in my term of office. I offered my right hon. Friend that new acronym last week.

Mr. Allan Roberts: The North-West water authority is building a sewage treatment plant in my constituency, which has a loading station where sewage sludge is placed on boats and taken out to the Irish sea. We believe that that practice is environmentally unsound. I would much prefer an incineration plant to be built in the docklands of my constituency instead of the Sandon dock complex.

Sir Hugh Rossi: I am sure that my right hon. Friend carefully read the remarks made in the House last week about possible disposal sites for radioactive waste and the suggested ways in which the problems of NIMBY might be met. He might have to find places for such incinerators when the Committee has reported on the problems of hazardous waste and the House discussed the disposal of waste.
